It is incapable of committing a crime, and exempt from punishment, except in a pecuniary way; because, being soulless, it cannot sin, although it has the attribute of immortality.

For this it is argued there can be no remedy by Congress, only at the expense of a violated Constitution.

We are asked to seek relief in State laws, which we have shown have not a sufficiently extended range; or in competition, which we have seen can be so successfully thwarted.

When it is sought to control these railroad corporations by State laws, they have always denied the power of the State Legislature to do so, and sheltered themselves under the Constitution of the United States, which alone possessed power to regulate commerce; and now, when we ask Congress for the relief, they tell us it is a flagrant violation of the vested rights of the States, an interference with State prerogatives.

Thus, while the people are demanding that these corporations shall be controlled, and asserting the existence of a power to do so, it seems we are unable to find where that power resides.

A convention recently held by a political organization in my own State has defined its position, and made an attempt to clear away the obscurity from this question.

The fifth article of its platform says:

That all corporations are subject to legislative control; that those created by Congress should be restricted and controlled by Congress, and that those under State laws should be subject to the control of the State creating them.

When I make an application of this rule to Iowa, where it was intended to operate for the benefit of the people, I find I am still confused. I instance its application to one road in that State, the Chicago and Northwestern. The line operated by it embraces the one known as the Chicago, Iowa and Nebraska road, and the one known as the Cedar Rapids and Missouri River Railroad, both of which were organized and constructed under the laws of the State, and upon their completion each leased its line to the first-named company, when they were made links in the through line from Chicago to the Missouri River.

This platform says that Congress shall not regulate this company, because Congress did not create it. The State cannot regulate it, because the State did not create it; but it was the creature of another State, whose control does not reach beyond its own limits. Under this rule the State may control the Cedar Rapids and Missouri River Railroad Company and the Nebraska Company; but these companies have long since leased their lines and passed out of the carrying trade.

The same is true of all the lines of road through the State on which the largest business is done—the Burlington and Missouri, the Dubuque and Sioux City, the McGregor Western, and the Mississippi and Missouri roads—all having leased their lines to corporations organized in other States, and engaged in interstate commerce.

Should this power of control operate upon the company who obtained the franchise, which merely owns the road-bed, having no interest in its business, except its annual rental; or should it operate upon the company which operates the road, owns its equipment, pays and controls its operatives, receives and contracts to deliver its freights and passengers, fixes the rates, and gets the money for their transportation?

In my opinion the regulation must depend upon the character of the commerce, which, when found to be of an interstate character, is clearly within the power of Congress.

I support this bill, not because I believe it contains every provision which might with advantage be inserted in it, but because it is a step in the right direction; and, if imperfect now, will inaugurate a system which may be perfected in time. I do not think an inflexible rule for the government of all roads would be successful, for all are not possessed of equal advantages. Hence the appointment of a commission, as contemplated in this bill, I deem a wise provision, calculated to facilitate an equitable adjustment of the subject under all circumstances.

It is no answer to the demand made for this legislative control to say that these railroads do not pay their owners, that their stockholders do not get large dividends. It does not alleviate the suffering of the farmer, who has been charged an extortionate rate by the railroad official, to be told that he has cheated his employers, and that the stockholder shares his sufferings.

We are asked to rely upon competition as a remedy for these evils; but I reply that competition will always be avoided as long as pools and combinations continue, and no power can be found to prevent or to regulate them.

This movement was the other day characterized by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STORM] as one emanating from the West. Let me inquire if the people of the West have not reason to complain, as every people have when they are unable to get a fair compensation for their labor.

I close these remarks by referring to some figures taken from the Agricultural Reports of 1866 and 1871, as showing the reason why the people of the West complain. I find that in 1866 Iowa produced of corn 52,283,184 bushels, for which she received $23,000,000. In 1871 the production of corn was 99,000,000 bushels, for which she received $22,774,000. Thus, while her production increased 46,000,000 bushels, her receipts fell off $225,000. The six States of Iowa, Kansas, Nebraska, Wisconsin, Illinois, and Missouri produced a corn crop in 1866 of 273,000,000 bushels, and in 1871 of 444,000,000 bushels. In 1866 their value was $130,000,000, and in 1871 their value was $132,000,000. Thus, for an increased crop of 171,000,000 bushels of corn they only get an increased value of $2,000,000. In these figures may be found the reason why the people of the West demand cheaper transportation.

In the passage of this bill I will regard one step as having been taken in the direction of securing a remedy for these evils.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, this bill in substance provides that railroads engaged in transportation of freight and passengers from one State to another shall not receive or demand more than a fair and reasonable compensation for the same, and for a violation of the act in this particular it provides a penalty in each case of not less than $500 nor more than $5,000; and it is made the duty of the United States attorney, in the proper district, to prosecute by appropriate action for the recovery of the same, and also renders the company liable to parties injured for damages caused by such violation, including a reasonable sum for attorney's fees; and further, for the appointment of nine commissioners by the President, by and with the advice of the Senate, who shall assist in the enforcement of the law, and make a separate schedule for each road of reasonable rates of charges for such transportation of freight and passengers from State to State; and if it shall appear upon trial of any suit that defendant has charged more than the rate fixed by schedule for such transportation, then such defendant shall be held guilty of extortion, unless he or it shall show affirmatively that the rate charged was nevertheless fair and reasonable.

This legislation is proposed to be had under that clause of the Federal Constitution which provides that Congress shall have power to regulate commerce between the States. Those who oppose the bill declare that Congress has no power in the premises, or, having the power, that it is not expedient to exercise the same. I desire briefly to advocate both the power of Congress to legislate in the premises, and the expediency of the legislation, and to answer such objections as are urged against the bill, at the same time submitting a few remarks upon transportation by water.

At the time of the adoption of the Constitution, and for many years after, commerce between the States was carried on by sailing-vessels and tow-boats, upon the navigable waters and rivers, and by coaches, carriers' carts, and wagons, on the land; and although from the means of transportation charges were high, competition was sufficient to regulate charges for services performed in the carrying trade, so that there was no extortion, for so far as transportation by land was concerned, if the same was profitable, any man who owned horses and a wagon could become a carrier, and compete successfully with others engaged in the carrying trade, and when such carriage ceased to be profitable he could convert his property and invest his capital in some other business, or could use it in tilling the soil, as might prove most profitable.

So as to water transportation. The coasts and rivers being natural highways of commerce, and free to all, it did not take a large amount of capital to provide vessels for the trade; and when a particular carrying trade ceased to be profitable, the vessels could be transferred to other lines or service. So competition was practicable, for the reason that the business in some shape or other was within the reach of the masses of the people.

When steam was applied to navigation it was within the power of individuals with small capital to place vessels in the trade, and in time vessels were attracted from one line to another by good rates, and almost any required number of vessels could be placed in a given trade within a few months. So competition was still sufficient to regulate prices for carriage of freight and passengers. So in making regulations for commerce between the States there was no necessity for providing additional penalties for refusal upon the part of common carriers to carry at a reasonable rate, as competition was practicable, did exist, and was sufficient to regulate the same.

Next the era of railways was inaugurated, and as they stretched their iron arms in every direction throughout the country, as the country was developed, settlements extended, and commerce increased, the former class of carriers by land disappeared, and the railroads do now substantially all the carrying except that which is done on the water.

Prior to this time the law of competition, as affecting demand and supply, had been effective, and naturally the people relied upon the same law to regulate prices of transportation by rail, and the General Government and many of the States granted lands and gave subsidies to assist in their construction, and very generally the counties, towns, and cities throughout the country gave large subsidies for the same purpose, hoping thereby that the law of competition would regulate charges for transportation in the future as it had in the past, and now we have in this country sixty thousand miles of railway in operation. Vain hope; for as the years have passed away it is demonstrated that railway corporations combine and consolidate with greater rapidity than they can be constructed, and to-day there is less competition between railroads than there was ten years ago. Experience, which is always a valuable school, but ordinarily an expensive one, has shown that we cannot hope for such competition; and if it be necessary to assign a reason for this, which all feel, from the merchant who ships his thousands of tons annually, to the humblest producer of the land, it is done concisely in the last report of the railroad commissioners of Massachusetts, as follows:

> It may now be taken as very generally conceded that railroads are, and from the very nature of things must always remain, practical monopolies; that the operation of the law of competition as affecting supply and demand can exercise a very limited control over them, and that even this limited control is rather of a disturbing than of an equalizing character. The supply of competing railroads is not and cannot be indefinite; nor does the increase in their number tend to diminish the cost of transportation; nor, when unprofitable in one place, can they be moved to another; nor can any excess of capital invested in them be released at will and otherwise used; nor can they be made to feel the influence of competition equally at all points which they serve.
> Competition is, however, made up of these very elements here wanting; it is their presence which supplies its effective regulating force to the operation of the natural laws of supply and demand. The popular mind has been slow to realize that they were here wanting; but, once the obvious fact is conceded, it follows that all the dealings of railroads with the community must either be unregulated, except by the intermittent action of a disturbing force, or else that they must be carried on under a greater or less degree of governmental interference.

I do not mean to say that the railways never have competitors as carriers. On the contrary, at all points adjacent to reliable water navigation, as soon as the same opens in the spring, and the vessels begin to carry their enormous loads of the products and manufactured articles of the country to market, the railways that have been carrying freights, while navigation was closed, at their own prices, under agreements between them, find that if they get business to do they must compete with boats and vessels; and while navigation lasts the rates are ordinarily reasonable from favored points; but no sooner does the ice king lay an embargo upon shipping than the managers of railways get together and by agreement arbitrarily advance the prices for transportation, and so they remain until navigation again opens.

Now, then, I know but two ways to regulate this carrying trade: one is by law, and the other by competition; and I think it wise to rely upon each. I have shown, however, that we cannot rely upon competition as between the railways, for if corporations operating sixty thousand miles of railway will not compete, pray how many miles of railway must be operated before they will compete? Then we must rely upon carriage by water for competition, for experience demonstrates that heavy, bulky articles can be transported most economically by water.

Professor William J. McAlpine illustrates this matter of transportation by water as compared with rail, as follows:

With many persons there is an idea that the railway has superseded the canal, and that the former now performs the chief part of the traffic of the country. While the latter is true in regard to interior short lines of trade, it is a serious error in reference to the great transportation between the agricultural West and the Atlantic. The Erie Canal, during the season of navigation, conveys more of this traffic than all the railroads together; more than all the trunk lines from the Saint Lawrence to the Potomac. The boats which come to tide-water have an average cargo exceeding that carried by the longest freight train on the Central Railway. During the busy season more than 150 such boats arrive daily, and their tonnage would require more than 150 freight trains. The greatest number is but 30 per day on the Central Railway. The Erie Canal, therefore, is performing more than five times as much business as the Central Railway. Yet the slow, plodding canal-boat attracts no attention, though burdened with more tons than the bustling, noisy, whirling freight train, which creates a sensation in every village through which it passes. The 4,000 canal-boats, of an aggregate of 1,000,000 of tonnage, moving 5,000,000 tons of cargo per annum, exceed the tonnage of the vessels engaged in the foreign commerce of this city [New York] even before the war.

The interests of the country demand that the products of the Mississippi Valley shall go free, by the way of the great lakes, to the markets of the world, without breaking bulk or reshipment, and that the great inland sea, Lake Michigan, shall be connected with the rivers of the West by making a ship-canal from Chicago to the Mississippi River, and the improvement of the Mississippi River should be immediately looked after by making a liberal appropriation to overcome the obstructions at its mouth. This is of especial importance, when we consider that from Cairo south navigation is open the whole year; and with this improvement made there would be substantial competition, by water, with railways for a great portion of the West and South in the winter as well as in the summer.

But I am reminded that those improvements will cost money, and that retrenchment is the order of the day. No man can or will go further than myself in that direction, so far as the same can be done without injury to the public service, but the country does not demand, nor will it sanction, a penny-wise and pound-foolish policy that would save an appropriation of cents for these improvements, for the want of which the loss to the people would be dollars. Yes, let us retrench; let us stop making appropriations for the erection of massive public buildings, and make them for the improvement of natural water-ways of the country; and if we will spend in the improvement of the Mississippi River a sum equal to what has been spent since 1865 in the erection of public buildings alone in the District of Columbia, ($14,000,000,) it would assist in the development of the country, and save untold millions of dollars to the whole people by way of saving upon freights. No one disputes the power of Congress in the premises, and the expediency of exercising that power is patent to all.

I now desire to call the attention of the House for a few minutes to the proposed legislation to compel railroads engaged in carrying from State to State to do so at a reasonable rate. It is a well-settled principle of the common law, that, I believe, is not controverted by any, that common carriers are bound to carry at a reasonable rate; and so far as the enforcement of that liability is concerned, as to commerce exclusively in a State, the power is in the State, and not in the Federal Government. In my State (Illinois) the constitution declares:

The General Assembly shall pass laws to correct abuses and prevent unjust discrimination and extortion in the rates of freight and passenger tariffs on the different roads in the State, and enforce such laws by adequate penalties, to the extent, if necessary for that purpose, of forfeiture of their property and franchises.

But the laws of a State cannot be enforced outside of its own limits, and when shipments are made, say from Illinois to New York, or vice versa, in transit, they must pass through many States; and even if it were practicable to agree in the enforcement of the obligation resting upon common carriers to carry for reasonable rates, we have no assurance that they would all do so. For instance, if the shipment was made by the way of the Pennsylvania Central, New Jersey or some other State might in the interest of her own citizens or corporations in her own territory permit or authorize them to charge excessive rates upon goods transported over her territory; and to remedy evils of that kind that existed under the Articles of Confederation, the Constitution provides—

That Congress shall have power to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the States.

Many of the States since the adoption of the Constitution have attempted to affix burdens for their own benefit upon interstate commerce. For instance, Pennsylvania, in 1864, by an act of her Legislature, enacted that every railroad company should pay two cents per ton to the State for every ton of freight transported over her territory. Upon a hearing of a case arising under the law, the courts of Pennsylvania sustained the law. On appeal, however, the Supreme Court of the United States held that the State of Pennsylvania had no authority to enforce such law, for the reason that it was a regulation of commerce between the States, a burden upon goods shipped through the State, and that Congress had that power, and not the State. Justice Strong, in delivering the opinion of the court, used the following language:

Beyond all question the transportation of freight, or of the subjects of commerce for the purpose of exchange or sale, is a constituent of commerce itself. This has never been doubted; and probably the transportation of articles of trade from one State to another was the prominent idea in the minds of the framers of the Constitution, when to Congress was committed the power to regulate commerce among the several States. * * * Nor does it make any difference whether this interchange of commodities is by land or water; in either case the bringing of the goods from the seller to the buyer is commerce.

But we are told by some gentlemen who oppose this bill that true it is the State of Pennsylvania cannot collect a tax from the carrier of two cents per ton on freight passing through her territory from or to other States, but that the State of Pennsylvania (I only speak of that State as an example) has created railway companies which in connection with other railway companies are engaged in commerce between the States, and that such companies can, without reference as to whether the charges are reasonable, advance the charges, and so far practically as the producer and consumer are concerned (who in any event have it to pay) can lay a tax not of two cents per ton but of ten or twenty cents a bushel, in the way of a charge for transportation upon grain being transported over the territory of that State; and still we are told that Congress has no power, in the regulation of commerce between the States, to prohibit such extortion.

If that position be correct, then Pennsylvania can authorize a creature of her own creation to do indirectly that which she cannot in her sovereign capacity do directly, and if that can be done, then the power of Congress to regulate commerce between the States is a cheat, a fraud, a delusion. Pray, if Congress has not this power, what remedy has the producer or manufacturer when he is the subject of extortion? Shall he travel from State to State and litigate in the courts for the successive violations of the law by the railroad companies in refusing to carry at reasonable rates? That is not practicable. For instance, a citizen of Illinois shipping a car-load of grain from Illinois to New York, if he obtained redress under such regulation, then under conflicting and dissimilar laws, and sometimes in hostile courts, he would have to litigate in Indiana, Ohio, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, and New York. Such regulation would practically amount to a denial of justice.

My colleague, [Mr. EDEN,] and other gentlemen who claim that Congress has no power to compel railroads engaged in interstate commerce to carry at reasonable rates, cite in support of that position the remarks of Justice Strong, in the case last referred to, (15 Wallace,) which is in substance "that it is conceded that the owners of artificial highways have the right to exact what they please for the use of their ways."

In reply I have to say, if that is the law, it applies to States as well as the Federal Government, for the remark is made without qualification; but it is not the law. The question of the power of the State or Federal Government to control railways so as to make them carry at a reasonable rate was not before the court for consideration, and the remark of the justice was by way of argument and illustration; and he took the pains, no doubt for fear that some one would seize upon what was said incidentally as an announcement of the law, to especially state in the same connection (15 Wallace, page 278) that "all this, however, is abstract and apart from the case before us." And if further proof is needed that he did not intend to announce a principle of law, it can be found in the opinion of the same court afterward given by the same judge, and reported in 16 Wallace, in which it is said, in speaking of a railroad, "The use can be defined; its tolls and rates for transportation may be limited."

My colleague also claims that the common-law liability resting upon common carriers, to carry at reasonable rates, can only be enforced by the States, as the common law is not a part of the Federal law, and further, that he has been taught to look at the enumeration of powers in the Constitution for authority for congressional action.

In reply, Mr. Speaker, to that argument, I admit that the Federal Government is one of special powers, but when jurisdiction and power are given to it by the Constitution, as to such powers it is supreme. Section 8 of article 1 of the Constitution not only gives, in so many words, power to Congress to regulate commerce among the several States, but also authorizes Congress—

To make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof.

So, then, by express provision of the Constitution, as plain as words can give it as to this matter of commerce between the States, Congress has the power to adopt the common law in whole or in part, or to enact any other legislation that it may see proper, or that may become necessary, to regulate the same; and if it requires a decision of the Supreme Court to establish that which the common sense of every man tells him as to what commerce is, we have it, as before shown, namely, the Supreme Court has expressly held that "the bringing of goods from the seller to the buyer is commerce," and in the case under consideration commerce consists of the transportation of goods from a consignor in one State to a consignee in another State, by a railroad, for a price to be paid. That is the whole transaction, and is subject in all its parts to regulation by Congress.

The opponents of this bill say that Congress may regulate as to the kind of car, as to safety, &c., that shall be used, and that stock shall be watered at certain intervals, and matters of that kind; but as to the practical, most material part of the transaction, the price to be paid, as to whether it shall be reasonable or not, Congress has no power in the premises. If they be correct, then Congress only has power to make partial regulations as to commerce between the States; whereas the grant covers commerce in that case as an entirety.

My colleague also claims that the railroads were built under charters granted by the respective States, and that the charter is a contract between the State and company building the road; and that, now the roads are built, the United States cannot step in and regulate charges of same for transportation.

In reply I say, it is not claimed nor does the bill under consideration provide for the regulation of commerce in any State; on the contrary, it is admitted expressly that such commerce is wholly under the control of the State where it is carried on; but the Constitution was in force at the time these roads were built, and their charters and rights are subject to the same; and when roads built under charters from different States form connections, or make consolidations, and engage in commerce from State to State, then that commerce is subject to regulation by Congress; and that is what is sought to be done by this bill.

Some gentlemen who concede the power of Congress in the premises deny the expediency of exercising that power, saying that it is not practicable to legislate upon this subject; that reasonable rates can only be ascertained by railway experts, and that it is placing too much power in the hands of nine commissioners to permit them, in their ministerial capacity, to ascertain what rates shall be prima facie reasonable.

I acknowledge that the enactment of practical legislation is not without difficulty, and I have no doubt but it will take time and experience to perfect the same, and in the ever-varying necessities of the country, no doubt additional legislation will, from time to time, be demanded. It is demanded upon almost all other matters that are subjects of legislation, and for that very purpose we have annual sessions of Congress; and he is but a poor statesman who refuses legislation upon a given subject when it is required, because of the difficulty in perfecting the same. The truth is, the longer it is deferred the more difficult it will be, and the sooner we start the sooner we will come to the journey's end.

My colleague [Mr. MCNULTA] has well said that it is safer to trust nine men without interest in the business, sworn to perform their duty, subject to removal by the President and under the supervision of Congress, to ascertain what charges shall be prima facie reasonable, than it is to trust five men, the controllers of the great trunk lines, whose chief desire in many instances is to make dividends upon watered and fictitious stock, to absolutely fix unreasonable rates amounting to extortion, and if Congress refuses or fails in the premises, then in the future, as in the recent past, the country is at the mercy of the sixty thousand miles of railroad now in operation.

Mr. Speaker, this question will be solved; if this Congress does not take a step forward the next will. The people have put their hands to the plow and will not look back.

I do not mean that it would be right or proper to oppress the railroad interest by onerous legislation. There is no such demand made. If the railway interest of this country is to be permanent it must have a fair living compensation for use of capital actually invested, (not dividends upon watered or fictitious stock,) and it would be suicidal to pursue a policy that would unjustly discriminate against that or any other interest. On the other hand, if the railway interest thrives unduly at the expense of the agricultural and manufacturing interests of the country, then those interests will deteriorate; and if the railways could succeed in perpetuating extortion, like the man in the fable who killed the goose that laid the golden egg, they will have destroyed the very interests that support and protect them.

Mr. Speaker, I am tired of hearing intimations that a large portion of the producers of the West are desirous, in the teeth of the Constitution and the laws, of depriving the railway interest of rights under the same. Such is not the case; nowhere can you find greater respect and love for the Constitution and the laws than you find among them. Nowhere can you find greater respect for the rights of all. This is sufficiently evidenced by the willingness with which they, in common with the masses elsewhere, periled their lives and spent their treasure in the late war in defense of the same. They are only seeking under the Constitution self-preservation. Even the worm when stepped upon as it crawls in the path before you, for its preservation turns and strikes at you.

We have tried competition and litigation for relief, and have failed; and now ask—not only ask, but demand—legislation by Congress in the exercise of its power under the Constitution.

Mr. Speaker, let us inquire for a moment who are opposing this legislation, and I will have done. The late war was precipitated by a party of men who, in their devotion to State rights and their enmity to what they chose to style the tendency to centralization, struck hands with the slave power and sought to overthrow the Federal Government and destroy the Constitution. They failed; and now we find extreme State-rights men acknowledging the abuses to be corrected, declaiming against centralization, and striking hands with the great railroad corporations, who have their advocates upon this floor seeking to defeat legislation upon this subject.

I, too, believe in the sovereignty of the States in their sphere. At the same time when the Congress is expressly authorized by the Constitution to do a certain thing—as it is in this case to regulate commerce between the States—then of necessity that power is plenary, and I for one feel that if we fail to exercise it we shall be recreant to the trust reposed in us.

Mr. MCCRARY. I move that the House now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at nine o'clock and thirty minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following memorials, petitions, and other papers were presented at the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. ADAMS: A paper for a post-route from London to Green Hall, Kentucky, to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

By Mr. ARCHER: The petition of the trustees of Maryland Agricultural College, for relief, to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. ARMSTRONG: The petition of Margaret Clune, for a pension, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. AVERILL: Resolutions of the Legislature of Minnesota, for an appropriation to improve the harbor of Du Luth, to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. BANNING: The petition of Andrew J. Vandegrift, of Covington, Kentucky, for extension of his patent No. 20,525, for a new and useful improvement in grain-separators, to the Committee on Patents.

By Mr. BUFFINTON: The petition of Hannah Mother, of Fall River, Massachusetts, for a pension, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. CALDWELL: Resolutions of the Medical Society of Madison County, Alabama, in favor of the bill to increase the efficiency of the Medical Department of the Army, to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. CHIPMAN: The petition of Edward P. Torrey and William B. Tilton, for extension of patent, to the Committee on Patents.

Also, the petition of William Mass, of Washington, Hempstead County, Arkansas, to be compensated for preserving the public archives of the United States land office at Washington, Arkansas, to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. CLEMENTS: The memorial of the Western Steamboat Association, asking that lights may be maintained upon the Grand Chain, near the mouth of the Ohio River, to the Committee on Appropriations.

By Mr. COX: The petition of John Ericsson, to be reimbursed for services rendered in planning and superintending the construction of the machinery of the United States steamer Princeton, to the Committee on War Claims.

Also, the petition of George C. Jenks, for relief, to the Committee on Claims.

Also, the memorial of Peter Cooper, Cooper, Hewitt & Co., and others, of New York City, asking such legislation as will insure the full success of the centennial celebration, to the Select Committee on the Centennial Celebration and the Proposed National Census of 1875.

By Mr. CRUTCHFIELD: Papers relating to the claim of William F. H. Fugua, of Rome, Tennessee, to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. DANFORD: The petition of citizens of Irondale, Ohio, for the repeal of the second section of the act of June 6, 1872, which reduced certain duties, to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. DUNNELL: The petition of Charles Thimmons, for relief, to the Committee on Claims.

Also, the petition of H. K. Balding, for relief, to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. DURHAM: The petition of citizens of Boyle and Mercer Counties, Kentucky, for the appointment of a commission to inquire into the alcoholic liquor traffic, to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. FORT: The memorial of John W. Strevell and 380 other citizens of Livingston County, Illinois, in regard to the insufficiency of the present volume of the currency, and asking an increase of the same, to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

By Mr. GARFIELD: The petition of Samuel Brooks, of Painesville, Ohio, to be restored to the pension-rolls, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. GIDDINGS: The petition of Pierce H. McBride, of Galveston, Texas, for relief, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. GUNCKEL: The petition of Elias Anderson, late of the Twenty-second Ohio Artillery, for relief, to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, the petition of James Rounsfell, for a pension, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, the petition of Selden M. Averill, for a pension, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, the petition of sundry citizens of Ohio, for the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic, to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. HAGANS: The petition of Rev. J. R. Hamilton, to be reimbursed for commutation money improperly paid, to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. HAILEY: Numerous petitions of citizens of Idaho Territory, for the passage of the Portland, Dalles and Salt Lake Railroad bill, to the Committee on Railways and Canals.

By Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois: Resolutions of the board of supervisors of Lee County, Illinois, in favor of the construction of a canal connecting the waters of Lake Michigan with the Illinois, Mississippi, and Rock Rivers, to the Committee on Railways and Canals.

By Mr. HAYS: The petition of the Medical Society of Madison County, Alabama, for the passage of the bill to increase the efficiency of the Medical Department of the Army, to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin: The petition of citizens of Jefferson County, Wisconsin, for an increase of duty on imported hops, to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Also, the petition of Aaron Taylor, for a pension, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. HERNDON: The petition of O. M. Roberts and B. H. Epperser, for themselves and colleagues, praying Congress to appropriate a sum sufficient to cover the expenses of the Senators and Members elected to Congress in 1866 from the State of Texas, and who failed to obtain their seats, to the Committee on Elections.

Also, papers accompanying the bill for the relief of J. A. Warren, of Tyler County, Texas, to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. HOLMAN: Papers relating to the claim of Emanuel Mason, to the Committee on Claims.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, March 17, 1874.

Prayer by Rev. E. D. OWEN, of Washington, District of Columbia.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday last was read.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a letter of the Secretary of War, transmitting to the Senate and House of Representatives a letter from the acting Chief of Ordnance relative to the adoption of the Gatling gun; which was, on motion of Mr. PRATT, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested:

A bill (H. R. No. 2451) to improve the mouth of the Mississippi River;

A bill (H. R. No. 2452) to equalize pensions in certain cases;

A bill (H. R. No. 2453) to amend an act entitled "An act to revise, consolidate, and amend the laws relating to pensions," approved March 3, 1873;

A bill (H. R. No. 2454) to amend section 13 of an act approved March 3, 1873, entitled "An act to revise, consolidate, and amend the laws relating to pensions;"

A bill (H. R. No. 2455) granting an allowance to soldiers who have lost an eye;

A bill (H. R. No. 2456) to amend an act entitled "An act to revise, consolidate, and amend the laws relating to pensions," approved March 3, 1873;

A bill (H. R. No. 104) for the relief of James Coats, of Jackson, Mississippi;

A bill (H. R. No. 735) to increase the pensions of soldiers and sailors who have been totally disabled;

A bill (H. R. No. 2092) for the relief of John W. Divine, late assistant surgeon of the Eleventh Regiment of Tennessee Cavalry; and

A bill (H. R. No. 2190) to amend the act entitled "An act granting pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the war of 1812, and the widows of deceased soldiers," approved February 14, 1871, and to restore to the pension-rolls those persons whose names were stricken therefrom in consequence of disloyalty.

The message also announced that the House had passed the bill (S. No. 360) making an appropriation for a topographical survey of the Capitol grounds, and plans for improving the same, with an amendment; in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested.

The message further announced that the House had agreed to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 1577) for the relief of Susan D. Galloway.

The message also communicated a concurrent resolution passed by the House in regard to the Government Printing Office.

The message further announced that the House had agreed to the amendments of the Senate to the joint resolution (H. R. No. 29) authorizing the Secretary of War to detail medical officers of the Army to inquire into and report upon the causes of epidemic cholera, with an amendment; in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolution; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (S. No. 302) for the relief of Dr. Edward Jarvis;

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 6) in relation to the bronze statue of Jefferson, presented to Congress by Uriah P. Levy, late an officer in the United States Navy;

A bill (H. R. No. 919) to provide for the issuing and recording of commissions to postmasters appointed by the President by and with the consent of the Senate; and

A bill (H. R. No. 1577) for the relief of Susan D. Galloway.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Minnesota, praying an extension of time to complete certain lines of railroad in that State; which was referred to the Committee on Railroads.

He also presented a memorial of the Legislature of Wisconsin, in favor of the protection of the navigation of the Saint Croix River and the improvement thereof; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a memorial of the Legislature of Wisconsin, in favor of a preliminary survey of the water-route between Lake Superior and the Falls of Saint Croix; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented resolutions of the Union League of New York City, in honor of the late CHARLES SUMNER; which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented the memorial of the Legislature of Wisconsin, asking for the necessary appropriations to complete the improvement of the harbors on the west shore of Lake Michigan, and of the Fox and Wisconsin Rivers; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented the memorial of the Legislature of Wisconsin, praying for an equalization of soldiers' bounties; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented the memorial of the Legislature of Wisconsin, asking for the repeal of the bankrupt law; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a memorial of the Legislature of Wisconsin, in behalf of William Hodson, late proprietor of a distillery in that State, for a rehearing as to the alleged wrongful collections of revenue from him; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a memorial of the Legislature of Wisconsin, with accompanying papers, asking the removal of the charge of desertion from George Schwartz, late a private of Company F, Fifth Regiment Wisconsin Infantry; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. TIPTON presented a petition of citizens of North Carolina, Good Templars, praying for a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic in connection with pauperism, crime, the public health, and general welfare; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. WRIGHT. I present the petition of Dennis & Keyes, F. R. West, Hoyt Sherman, and a large number of others, the best merchants, bankers, attorneys, and business men of Des Moines, Iowa, asking for such an increase in the circulating medium of the country as will remove the present stagnation in business of all kinds, assist and not retard the settlement and opening up of millions of the most fertile acres in the world, the growth of the cities and towns of the West and South, as will facilitate the removal of the immense products of the soil; a circulation which shall be, as far as possible, flexible and elastic, and in some measure equal to the wants of the whole country now and its promise for the future. I move the reference of the petition to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WRIGHT. I also present a petition of J. W. Morse, T. P. Treynor, D. C. Bloomer, Samuel Haus, and many other business men and good citizens of Council Bluffs, Iowa, asking for the same legislation. I move the reference of this petition to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. So much effort has been made to represent to the country that money is very abundant in the city of New York, the great commercial and financial center of the nation, that it would seem that the business men of the city are arousing to present their own views, and to show that it is a perversion of the true sentiment of the business men of that city, notwithstanding the expressions of the chambers of commerce and other organized forms that have been presented here formally through their immediate representatives. I hold in my hand a petition bearing some four hundred names of leading business men of the city of New York, some doing a business of millions annually. They have been pleased to commit this petition to my hands, and I very cheerfully present it. I will name some of the signers, that it may be known who they are. It is the memorial of H. W. Vincent, Goodwin & Brothers, George I. Forest, J. Kingan, C. H. Ludington, G. H. Bissell, Caswell, Hazard & Co., and 395 other merchants and business men of New York, protesting against the efforts being made to induce Congress to stop the issue of legal-tenders, and to increase the bonded indebtedness of the Government, and praying "that the volume of the currency be increased, especially the legal-tenders, and that provision of elasticity be made, so that business may again be safely resumed." I move that the memorial be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan, presented the petition of Warren Hopkins and 7 others, disabled soldiers of the late war, praying Congress to so amend the homestead laws as to grant a soldier whose disability entitles him to not less than six dollars per month pension three years', and those whose disability is equivalent to the loss of a limb, four and a half years' time after entry in which to commence settlement on their homesteads; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also presented the petition of Thomas Smith, a disabled soldier of the First Regiment of Michigan Light Artillery, praying that a pension be granted him; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented the petition of Oscar F. Brinton and others, citizens of Wayne County, Michigan, praying Congress to substitute in lieu of the national-bank notes a full legal-tender currency, issued directly from the Treasury, declared equal with coin and interconvertible with Government bonds, bearing interest at the rate of 3.65 per cent. per annum; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. THURMAN presented the memorial of Ruth Vaux, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. SCOTT presented the petition of S. M. Reynolds, late paymaster United States Volunteers, praying to be relieved from liability for certain moneys lost by him; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also presented the petition of Michael Quarry, a citizen of the county of Huntington, in the State of Pennsylvania, praying for an act of Congress granting him a pension from March 4, 1872; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented the petition of Mrs. Susan McGoldrick, praying that she be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented the petition and papers of Philip J. Buckey, praying relief for losses sustained by him by reason of the occupancy of his property situated near Tenallytown, District of Columbia, by United States troops engaged in the suppression of the southern rebellion, from October, 1862, to December 1, 1865; which were referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. LOGAN. I present a petition of a number of citizens of the town of Rankin, Illinois, asking for an increase of the currency; also a petition of citizens of Paxton, Illinois, with the same prayer; also a petition of citizens of Livingston County, Illinois, with the same prayer. I move their reference to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. LOGAN. I also present a petition numerously signed by business men and merchants of the city of New York, which I will read:

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled:

Your petitioners beg leave respectfully to represent that they are greatly alarmed at the efforts being made by money-lenders to induce your honorable body to put a stop to the further issue of legal-tenders by the Secretary of the Treasury, and to compel him to increase the bonded indebtedness of the Government, in order to cancel and destroy the too limited and only currency on which the whole people draw interest; thus increasing taxation for the benefit of the foreign bondholder, while reducing the means and ability to pay.

The rapid and immense increase of the industry, resources, and wealth of the country, under the beneficent influence of this safe currency, in which all have confidence and interest, demands its increase rather than destruction. The experience of the last few years, especially in the fall, when the agricultural products of the year must be marketed, has demonstrated that there is insufficient currency to do the legitimate business of the country. Hence there has been increasing stringency in the market, causing great distress and alarm, by which money-lenders have been able to profit for weeks and months, to the extent of ½ to ¾ of one per cent. per day, and in extreme cases even as high as 2 per cent. per day, or from 45 to 700 per cent. per annum, and this in the money center of the continent. This has enabled a few men at such times, by locking up money, to aggravate the difficulty, and thus command their own terms, not a few of whom are now asking your honorable body to contract the currency that they may more effectually ply their infamous traffic.

These causes produced the late disastrous and ruinous panic, which will undoubtedly be reproduced with still more prostrating effects unless relief be afforded.

Your petitioners therefore respectfully ask that the volume of the currency be increased, especially the legal-tenders, and that provision of elasticity be made, so that business may again be safely resumed.

This is signed by about 200 of the business men doing the largest business in the city of New York. Through me they ask to have this petition presented and referred to the Committee on Finance.

The petition was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. WINDOM presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of Minnesota, in favor of the improvement of the harbor of Du Luth; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of Minnesota in favor of an extension of time to complete certain lines of railroad; which was referred to the Committee on Railroads.

He also presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of Minnesota, in favor of the establishment of a post-route from Saint James, in Watonwan County, via Cedarville, Lone Cedar and Dunnell, in Martin County, Minnesota, to Estherville, in Emmett County, Iowa; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

He also presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of Minnesota, in favor of the establishment of a post-route from Marshall, Minnesota, to Dell Rapids, Dakota Territory; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

He also presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of Minnesota, in favor of the cancellation of certain conveyances of land granted to the State of Minnesota in aid of the construction of certain railroads and for the relief of settlers thereon; which was referred to the Committee on Railroads.

He also presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of Minnesota, asking that Government lands in that State to the amount of twenty sections be granted to the State in lieu of the twenty sections on the Winnebago Indian reservation, in Waseca and Blue Earth Counties, heretofore sold and conveyed by the General Government to private parties; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. CHANDLER. I present a petition, numerously signed by citizens of Detroit; and as it is very brief I will read it:

We, the undersigned, citizens of Detroit, Michigan, respectfully represent to your honorable body that we are opposed to any inflation of the currency, and in favor of the return to specie payments at the earliest practicable moment.

This is signed by every class of citizens in Detroit, by money-borrowers and money-lenders, by ship-builders and ship-owners, by merchants and by lawyers; and the letter accompanying it says that 95 per cent. of the whole business community of Detroit are in favor of this petition. It is very numerously signed, and represents substantially the whole city of Detroit. I move its reference to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. RAMSEY presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Minnesota, in favor of a preliminary survey of the country between Saint Croix Falls and the Upper Mississippi River and Lake Superior, with a view to establishing water communication, by canal and locks and dams, between the navigable waters of said rivers and lake; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Minnesota, respecting United States pension claims; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Minnesota, relating to the mission to Sweden and Norway; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Minnesota, in favor of the improvement of the Minnesota River; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a memorial of the Legislature of the State of Minnesota, in favor of an appropriation for the improvement of the Mississippi River from Saint Anthony's Falls to Sauk Rapids; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a memorial of the Legislature of the State of Minnesota, in favor of the improvement of the Red River of the North; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Minnesota, respecting the improvement of navigation on the Mississippi River; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Minnesota, requesting their Senators and Representatives in Congress to procure such an amendment of the revenue laws of the United States as will permit the importation of all text-books free of duty; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. PRATT. I present the petition of sundry citizens of the city of Washington, who say that they are greatly wronged and aggrieved by the terms, conditions, and operation of an act of the Legislature of the District of Columbia, creating drainage and sewer sections in the city of Washington, approved June 29, 1873; and, therefore, they say, "as faithful citizens, in duty bound, we do in good faith and earnestness ask your honorable bodies to immediately repeal or modify said act so that taxation shall be in accord with interest and valuation." I move the reference of this petition to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PRATT. I present in the same connection another petition, numerously signed by citizens of this District, on the same subject, with certain accompanying papers; and still a third petition, numerously signed, on the same subject. I move their reference to the same committee.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I present a petition of citizens of Indiana, in which they state that in view of the happy issue of our late arbitration with Great Britain, now so promptly and faithfully fulfilled, and the recent address of the British House of Commons to the Queen, praying her to instruct her principal secretary of state for foreign affairs to enter into communication with foreign powers, with a view to the further improvement of international law and the establishment of a general and permanent system of international arbitration, they earnestly pray the President of the United States and the honorable Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled to use all suitable endeavors for the attainment of this great and beneficent object, and, as a preliminary measure in the interest of general security, the reduction of national armaments, and they seek an express stipulation between nations that they will not resort to war until peaceful arbitration has been tried, and never without a full year's previous notice. I move the reference of this petition to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I also present two other petitions, numerously signed by citizens of Indiana, to the same purport; also three petitions from citizens of New Hampshire, to the same purport; also three petitions from citizens of Ohio, one of them quite numerously signed, to the same effect. I move the reference of all these petitions to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I present also the petition of Pliny T. Sexton, requesting that the forty-first section of the national-currency act be changed, because it taxes national banks in the several States in an unjust and inequitable manner. I move the reference of this petition to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont, presented the petition of Mary Ryan, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. WEST presented the petition of J. B. Chandler, of New Orleans, praying compensation for the transportation of the United States mails between certain points in Mississippi; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. STEWART presented the memorial of William B. Wilson, asking compensation for transporting the United States mails between certain points in Nevada in 1865, 1866, and 1867; which, with his papers already on file, was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN presented the memorial of citizens of Utah, members of the bar of Salt Lake City, in favor of such necessary enactments as will enable the courts in that Territory to administer the law without confusion and embarrassment; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented the petition of James T. Barclay, praying the adoption by the Mint of the United States of his improvements to prevent the abrasion or counterfeiting of coin; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. ALLISON presented a memorial of citizens of Dubuque, Iowa, protesting against any increase of currency and in favor of an early resumption of specie payments; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a resolution of the Legislature of the State of Iowa, in relation to a proposed canal from Rock Island, Illinois, to the Illinois River, at Hennepin: which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

He also presented five petitions of citizens of Iowa, praying for an appropriation to complete water communication between the Mississippi River and the great lakes, by the way of the Fox and Wisconsin Rivers; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. HAMLIN presented a memorial, numerously signed by shipmasters, ship-builders, and ship-owners in the town of Searsport, in the town of Stockton, and in the cities of Bangor and Belfast, Maine, praying for an appropriation for the erection of close fog-bells upon the coast; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented additional papers in the case of Colonel Joshua Harrick, praying to be allowed a pension; which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM presented a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, addressed to the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, proposing an amendment to the twentieth section of the act regulating trade and intercourse with the Indians, approved June 30, 1834; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. HARVEY presented a concurrent resolution of the Legislature of Kansas, memorializing Congress to pass an act to give to all United States district courts of districts bordering on the Indian Territory concurrent jurisdiction with the western district of Arkansas; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a resolution of the Legislature of Kansas, requesting Congress to enact a law that will compel the perfecting of the title to land claims under railroad grants and the issuing of patents therefor; and, in case of failure of compliance with terms to be provided by law, that all lands so claimed shall be forfeited and revert to the Government of the United States for homestead and pre-emption purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also presented resolutions of the Legislature of Kansas, requesting Congress to make provision for auditing and paying the claims of citizens of that State for the loss of property taken or destroyed during the late civil war, by invasion of rebel armies or raids of guerrilla bands into the State; which were referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also presented a concurrent resolution of the Legislature of Kansas, requesting the Congress of the United States to appropriate $500,000 to pay claims of citizens of Kansas, awarded to them by a commission, for losses of property during the territorial troubles of 1855 and 1856; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. BOGY presented the petition of Fayette McMullen, in behalf of Mary J. McMullen, praying that her alleged claim against the Government for money seized by the military authorities thereof may be referred to the Court of Claims for adjudication; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. HAGER presented a concurrent resolution of the Legislature of California, in favor of the establishment of a mail-route in Sonoma County; also for the establishment of a post-office at Donahue, in that county; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

He also presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of California, relative to the mail-route from Shasta City, Shasta County, to Lake City, in Siskiyou County; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

He also presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of California, in favor of restoring to the public domain, certain lands reserved for the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad in the State of California; which was referred to the Committee on Railroads.

He also presented a concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of California, relative to the survey of the mountain grazing-lands of that State; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also presented a concurrent resolution of the Legislature of California, in favor of the relinquishment of a portion of the Presidio reservation for a public park to the city and county of San Francisco; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. HITCHCOCK presented a petition of citizens of Richardson County, Nebraska, praying for an increase of the legal-tender notes; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented the petition of L. H. Felt, late of the Seventh Kansas Cavalry, praying to be allowed additional bounty; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine, presented the petition of Elizabeth Davis, praying that she may be restored to a pension on account of services of her son, William L. Davis, late of Company E, Twentieth Regiment Maine Volunteers; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. SCOTT, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers of Catherine E. Small, praying for a pension, be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. WRIGHT. During the last Congress the petition and papers of John S. Corlett, of Hamilton County, Iowa, were presented and referred to the Committee on Pensions, and they reported adversely. There was an accompanying bill which went on the Calendar and was pending at the adjournment of the last Congress. I supposed that I had had an order already to withdraw those papers from the files and have them referred to the Committee on Pensions. It seems the order, if made, has been overlooked. I now ask that the order be made.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The order will be entered, copies of the papers being retained.

Mr. WRIGHT. I ask, is there a necessity that copies shall be retained, where they are withdrawn to be referred to a committee?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The order will be entered without requiring copies, as the papers are to be referred at once.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. I am instructed by the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the memorial of the Legislative Assembly of Montana Territory, asking protection to the citizens of several counties there against the inroads of Indians, to ask to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, inasmuch as it asks for military protection.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan, from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 259) for the relief of James W. Glover, postmaster at Oxford, in the State of New York, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Benjamin Cooley and James W. Boswell, praying compensation for carrying the mails to the United States troops in and around Poolesville, Maryland, from 1861 to 1864, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 595) for the relief of Benjamin Cooley and James W. Boswell.

The bill was read and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. MERRIMON, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 243) for the relief of Charles W. Denton, of Oregon, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of H. W. Read, praying compensation for superintending the transportation of money belonging to the United States from Saint Louis to Santa Fé, New Mexico, in the year 1863, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 596) for the relief of H. W. Read.

The bill was read and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. MERRIMON also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of William A. Griffin, late superintendent of the national cemetery at Andersonville, Georgia, praying to be reimbursed for expenses incurred and losses sustained while in charge of said cemetery, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 597) for the relief of William A. Griffin.

The bill was read and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. DAVIS, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the memorial of Charles F. Sampson and others, principal owners of the schooner Ada A. Andrews, praying to be indemnified for losses sustained by them in consequence of the sinking of the said schooner by the United States steamer Ticonderoga, May 1, 1871, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Joseph San Roman, administrator of James B. Armstrong, deceased, of Cameron, Texas, praying the appropriation and payment of balance of a certain judgment of the Court of Claims against the United States, reported adversely; and the committee was discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

Mr. CONOVER, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 95) for the relief of the heirs of Colonel Francis Taylor and Dr. Charles Taylor, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. ALLISON, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 582) for the relief of A. B. Fisher, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. STEVENSON. I ask unanimous consent of the Senate to take up a bill for the benefit of the Louisville and Bardstown Turnpike Company.

Mr. PRATT. I have no objection to the consideration of that bill. I should be glad, however, to submit a few reports before it is taken up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is in the nature of an objection.

Mr. PRATT, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Sarah F. Stapler, in behalf of the heirs of the late John Ross, praying compensation for property destroyed by rebels during the war of the rebellion, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the committee was discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the memorial of Samuel Jamison, of New Orleans, praying compensation for the use and occupancy by the United States of certain houses and lots in the city of New Orleans, from July, 1862, to October, 1865, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the committee was discharged from the further consideration of the memorial.

WILLARD DAVIS.

Mr. WRIGHT. The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1956) for the relief of Willard Davis, have had the same under consideration, and have instructed me to report it back without amendment.

Mr. INGALLS. I presume on the indulgence of the Senate to ask the present consideration of that bill. It has been reported by the House committee favorably, and by the Senate committee also, and there are certain reasons in connection with proceedings pending in the courts in Kentucky that render it desirable that the bill should be immediately passed.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I should like to hear some explanation of that bill before it is taken up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator object to its present consideration?

Mr. SAULSBURY. Not if I can have a satisfactory explanation.

Mr. WRIGHT. I will state for the benefit of the Senator from Delaware that Mr. Davis was a collector in Kentucky during the war, and during that time guerrillas were constantly in his district, and at times portions of his papers were taken by them and destroyed. It is, therefore, impossible to make a settlement with the accounting officers of the Treasury by reason of the absence of those papers. He has satisfied the accounting officers of the Treasury that he is entitled to about this credit, and they wrote a letter to the committee advising the passage of this bill, saying that they believe it right and just to Mr. Davis under all the circumstances; and upon the report of the committee in the House, together with the letter of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to the House committee, and also to the Senate committee, this report was made.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill; which directs the proper accounting officers of the Treasury Department to pass to the credit of Willard Davis, late collector in the second and fifth collection districts of Kentucky, the sum of $14,338.33.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask if there is a report in that case?

Mr. WRIGHT. There is a report accompanying the bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. And that sets out in full the facts?

Mr. WRIGHT. It does.

Mr. SHERMAN. Very well.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

TURKISH AND EGYPTIAN TRIBUNALS.

Mr. CAMERON. The Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1015) to authorize the President to accept, for citizens of the United States, the jurisdiction of certain tribunals in the Ottoman dominions and Egypt, established, or to be established, under the authority of the Sublime Porte and of the government of Egypt, have instructed me to report it back favorably, and I am requested to ask for its immediate consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

It provides that whenever the President of the United States shall receive satisfactory information that the Ottoman government, or that of Egypt, has organized other tribunals on a basis likely to secure to citizens of the United States, in their dominions, the same impartial justice which they now enjoy there under the judicial functions exercised by the minister, consuls, and other functionaries of the United States, pursuant to the act of Congress approved the 22d of June, 1860, entitled "An act to carry into effect provisions of the treaties between the United States, China, Persia, and other countries, giving certain judicial powers to ministers and consuls, or other functionaries of the United States, in those countries, and for other purposes," he is authorized to suspend the operations of that act as to the dominions in which such tribunals may be organized, so far as the jurisdiction of said tribunals may embrace matters now cognizable by the minister, consuls, or other functionaries of the United States in said dominions, and to notify the government of the Sublime Porte or that of Egypt, or either of them, that the United States, during such suspension, will accept for their citizens the jurisdiction of these tribunals over citizens of the United States, which has heretofore been exercised by the minister, consuls, or other functionaries of the United States.

The bill also authorizes the President, for the benefit of American citizens residing in the Turkish dominions, to accept the recent law of the Ottoman Porte ceding the right of foreigners possessing immovable property in those dominions.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THE CIVIL-RIGHTS BILL.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, the Senate will remember that some five weeks since, on a discussion pending in the Senate as to the reference of the civil-rights bill, on my statement that if the bill was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary it would probably be reported back in a fortnight, the lamented Senator from Massachusetts, Mr. Sumner, without a vote, acquiesced in that proposition. I feel it due to the committee and to myself to state, that the committee have spent two days when the Senate was not in session, and two of their regular meetings, in considering and perfecting the bill, and that it is now ready to be reported by a majority of the committee; but, as the author of the bill has been taken away, I propose not to report the bill, or to call it up, until the chairman of the committee, [Mr. EDMUNDS,] who favors the measure, is here to take part in the debate, unless his absence should be protracted unreasonably, in which event the bill will be called up. Having made the proposition publicly, I have felt it due to myself and to the committee to make this explanation.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. NORWOOD asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 598) to refund to the State of Georgia certain moneys expended by said State for the common defense in 1777; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

LOUISVILLE AND BARDSTOWN TURNPIKE COMPANY.

Mr. STEVENSON. I now ask the Senate to take up the bill for the benefit of the Louisville and Bardstown Turnpike Company.

There being no objection, the bill (S. No. 384) for the benefit of the Louisville and Bardstown Turnpike Company, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to direct the Quartermaster-General of the United States Army to audit, adjust, and pay such sums as he may deem proper and just to the president, directors, and company of the Bardstown and Louisville Turnpike Road Company for two bridges on that road, one over Salt River, the other over Floyd's Fork, burned and destroyed by the order of General Nelson, in command at the time of the United States troops in Kentucky, as a military necessity, on the 22d of September, 1862; but the whole amount allowed under the act is not to exceed $13,600.

Mr. SHERMAN. That bill touches upon very delicate ground, and I should like to have the report read or an explanation made which will take it out of the ordinary case. The burning of a bridge by a public enemy, or by our own people during the war, to injure the enemy, ought not to be paid for, as a rule.

Mr. STEVENSON. This bill has been fully investigated by two or three Committees on Claims and unanimously reported.

Mr. SHERMAN. I would rather that the report be read.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. SCOTT on the 25th of February, 1874:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 384) for the benefit of the Louisville and Bardstown Turnpike Road Company, submit the following report:

This claim was formerly reported upon in the first session of the Thirty-eighth Congress, by the Committee on Military Affairs of the House of Representatives, (report No. 121,) and again by the Committee on Claims in the Forty-second Congress, second session, (report No. 30,) when it passed the House, and was formerly reported by the Senate Committee on Claims, but failed to receive final action.

The report made in the Forty-second Congress was as follows:

"The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the claim of the Louisville and Bardstown Turnpike Road Company, submit the following report:

"That the petitioner is the owner of the turnpike road leading from Bardstown toward Louisville to the junction with the road of the Louisville Turnpike Company, ten miles from the city of Louisville, in the State of Kentucky.

"That on the 22d day of September, 1862, two bridges on the complainant's road (one over Salt River and one over Floyd's Fork) were, by order of Major-General Nelson, commanding the United States forces, destroyed for the purpose of hindering and retarding the movements of the enemy, then on his celebrated march toward Louisville from the South. The destruction of the bridges fully appears by the orders of General Nelson, in the hands of the committee, and the certificates indorsed thereon by the officers who executed them.

"The company, immediately after these transactions, made a claim before the Quartermaster-General for compensation for the bridges destroyed, but the Quartermaster-General was of opinion that he had not the necessary legal authority to pay such a claim, and for that reason the claim in that form was abandoned. It was at the same time, however, suggested to the Quartermaster-General that the immediate rebuilding of said bridges would be of imperative necessity to the military service, to which he assented, and himself proposed that the turnpike company should proceed at once to rebuild the bridges, and rely on Congress to repay it for the outlay. This course seemed necessary on account of the dangerous floods to which those streams are subject, which rendered it inexpedient to build temporary bridges, as the Quartermaster's Department was in the habit of doing. All these facts appear in the communication from the Quartermaster's Department.

"The committee find that a report was made by Hon. Mr. Schenck, from the Military Committee, in the Thirty-eighth Congress, fully sustaining this claim, but which was not finally acted upon by the House. The report is printed, and this committee fully concur in its statements and conclusions. The passage of the accompanying bill is therefore recommended, upon the ground that the two bridges were rebuilt by the petitioner, to the great advantage of the military service, in pursuance of the recommendation of the Quartermaster-General, fully believing that Congress would repay the outlay thus incurred, and having good reason so to believe.

"The amount claimed to have been paid for the reconstruction of the bridges is $14,057.37, which is probably correct; but the committee prefer that the amount to be paid for replacing the bridges shall be audited by the Quartermaster-General, and paid by him. They have, therefore, adopted the bill of the Committee on Military Affairs, reported to the Thirty-eighth Congress, and recommend its passage."

This is a correct general statement of the case, and is concurred in by the committee, with this modification, that instead of allowing the company the cost of rebuilding the bridges, the sum to be paid should not exceed the actual value of the superstructures at the time they were burned; and they, therefore, report the bill with the limit fixed by the amendment recommended by the Senate committee in the Forty-second Congress, of $13,600, as the maximum sum that may be allowed, and recommend its passage.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DISTRICT GOVERNMENT INVESTIGATION COMMITTEE.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, on the 13th of March—Friday last—just as the Senate was about to adjourn, the President pro tempore appointed me "chairman of the joint select committee on the part of the Senate to inquire into the affairs of the District of Columbia, in place of Mr. BOUTWELL, excused." A question having been raised as to the authority of the Chair to make that appointment, after examining the precedents I came to the conclusion that it was involved in great doubt, if in fact there was any authority at all for it, and I have declined to act, and have not acted under it. It seems important that the record of the Senate should be corrected in this respect. At all events, I do not feel warranted in acting under it. I submit the question to the Senate for their action.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, I wish to make some observations upon this order which was made by the President pro tempore appointing the Senator from Nevada. I suppose I may say that it is a privileged question; but if not, I ask unanimous consent of the Senate to be heard upon it.

The order is in these words, as it is upon the Journal:

The President pro tempore appointed Mr. STEWART chairman of the joint select committee on the part of the Senate to inquire into the affairs of the District of Columbia, in place of Mr. BOUTWELL, excused.

Now, the first interpretation that would be given, I suppose, by everybody that read that order, or who saw it as it was in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, in somewhat different terms than it appears upon the Journal, would be, that the President pro tempore had assumed the power to appoint a chairman of a joint select committee. If that had been the intention, the objection to such an appointment would be too obvious to need any argument. The Senate itself could not appoint the chairman of a joint select committee. To do so would be an infringement of the privileges of the House of Representatives. Nor could the House itself appoint the chairman. A fortiori, neither the Presiding Officer of the Senate nor of the House could make such an appointment.

But I understand that the true intent and meaning of this order was to appoint the Senator from Nevada chairman of what has been called the Senate branch of that committee; and that raises an extremely important question, one to which the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTT] at a former session called the attention of the Senate, and for the remedy of certain evils connected with it introduced a bill which, it is much to be regretted, has not passed and become a law in order to remove the difficulty. If the intent of the Chair was to appoint a chairman of the Senate branch of that committee, such an appointment assumes this: that a joint committee consists integrally of two committees, that it is not integrally one committee but is integrally two committees; a committee of the Senate which has an integral existence, and a committee of the House which has an integral existence, but acting together in their consultations and coming to joint conclusions. If this be true, it necessarily follows that in every vote taken in the committee, in order to carry any proposition, there must be a majority of each of the committees. It further necessarily follows that in order to constitute a quorum, there must be a quorum in attendance of each of these committees, and in this particular instance there must be at least two Senators present and three Representatives, to make a quorum. Nothing less can make it; and in order to arrive at any conclusion, there must be an affirmative vote of two Senators and of at least three Representatives.

I am not going to argue the question whether a joint committee of the two Houses is integrally one committee, or whether it is integrally two committees, because that very question is now being discussed by learned and diligent counsel before this very committee itself. And, sir, great questions turn upon it; for on the resolution, perhaps, of that question depends the further question whether your acts of Congress in regard to the production of papers and in regard to the testimony of witnesses, and exempting them from any prosecution for anything that they may testify before a committee, apply in this case. Nay more, sir, the question as to who shall administer oaths, whether there is any power to administer oaths, would arise, not in this particular instance it is true, because the joint resolution appointing this particular committee gives it the power to administer oaths and relieves it from all difficulty in that respect; but, looking at all these statutes, which are peculiar and which apply to the examination of witnesses before either House of Congress, or, to use the language of the statute, "before a committee of either House," not using the term "joint committee" at all, whether or not they apply to an investigation by a joint committee, will depend upon the solution of this very question whether a joint committee is integrally two committees sitting together and acting together, but still preserving each its separate autonomy. Therefore the appointment, if the Chair intended to appoint the Senator from Nevada as chairman of the Senate branch of that committee, assumes to decide this very question, this great and grave question, which has never yet been decided by either the Senate or the House of Representatives, nor, so far as I can find after some considerable research, by either House of Parliament. It assumes to decide that question, and rules that a joint committee consists of two separate and distinct committees. I do not know whether the Chair, in making that appointment, had considered that question and intended to decide it, and, as I said, I shall not argue against that decision in case such was the intention of the Chair, and that for the reason I have already stated. But I have this to say, that if it were admitted that the Senate branch of this committee is integrally a committee of the Senate, then, according to the well-established usage of the Senate, and according to well-established parliamentary law, the President had no power whatever to appoint a chairman of that committee. In other words, I deny the right of the Chair, unless specially authorized by the Senate, to appoint the chairman of any committee whatsoever. He may be authorized to appoint a committee, and then he names the committee, and they take rank in the order in which they are named; and by courtesy, not of the Senate, not of the Presiding Officer, but of the committee itself, according to parliamentary usage, the first named on the committee is generally permitted to act as its chairman; but that is mere courtesy, and the committee may at any time elect its own chairman.

In this very instance the joint committee yesterday, upon the Senator from Nevada declining to act on the committee and upon my statement that I declined to preside over the committee, proceeded to elect and did elect, as chairman, the Senator from Iowa, who was a member of the committee from its organization, [Mr. ALLISON.] The right of the committee to appoint a chairman will be questioned by no one, it is perfectly plain; and the same right which that committee had to appoint its chairman to preside over the joint deliberations, each branch of that committee has to appoint its chairman, if, in point of fact, we are two committees and not one; and it is mere courtesy, and nothing but courtesy, that allows the first named to act as chairman and preside over the deliberations.

But, sir, further than that, I deny the power of the Chair not only to appoint a chairman of this Senate branch of the committee, if it is to be considered as integrally a committee of the Senate itself, but I deny his right, in the light of the usage of the Senate, to put the Senator from Nevada or any other Senator above the Senators heretofore appointed on that committee, without the authority of the Senate. The Senate of course can do as it pleases; it may say that this man who is now at the head shall go to the foot, or shall go to the middle, or go anywhere, or be taken off the committee altogether; but the President of the Senate, I maintain, has no such power whatever; and that raises the question.

And now let us see how the matter stands; and I wish to do this, first, for a better understanding of the question, and secondly in justice to myself.

This committee was appointed under a resolution originating in the House of Representatives, as follows:

Resolved, (the Senate concurring,) That a joint select committee be raised, consisting of —— Senators, to be appointed by the President of the Senate, and five members of the House, to be appointed by the Speaker of the House, whose duty it shall be to inquire into the matters specified in the petitions of W. W. Corcoran and others; whether unlawful contracts have been made for public improvements in the District of Columbia; whether unlawful assessments and taxes have been levied; the actual cost of such improvements; the amount agreed to be paid therefor; whether correct measurements have been made; the existing indebtedness on account thereof, and what, if any, portion of such indebtedness was created on account of Government property, and may be properly paid out of the Treasury of the United States; and inquire and report what amendments of the organic acts, if any, are necessary to further protect the rights of citizens or regulate the disbursements and collection of moneys; that said committee shall have power to employ a clerk and stenographer, to administer oaths, and send for persons and papers, and shall report to the Senate and House of Representatives.

The message from the House showed the names of the members of the House who had been appointed on the committee. These proceedings took place upon that resolution being received in the Senate:

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution at the present time? If so, the first question will be on filling the blank.

After some remarks by the Senator from Maine [Mr. HAMLIN] the Chair announced that there was no objection to the consideration of the resolution, and then, on motion of the Senator from Maine, [Mr. HAMLIN,] the blank was filled with the word "three," and the Senate agreed to the resolution. Then follows:

The PRESIDENT pro tempore subsequently appointed Messrs. FRELINGHUYSEN, BOUTWELL, and THURMAN the committee on the part of the Senate.

There is no designation of a chairman; the resolution authorized no designation of a chairman; it was simply an appointment in the usual form; and if all the members appointed had served, by courtesy the Senator from New Jersey, being the first named, would, undoubtedly, have been allowed to preside over the deliberation; but the Senator from New Jersey declined to serve. He asked to be excused on the same day, and then these proceedings took place:

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senate excuse the Senator from New Jersey?

The question being put, Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN was excused.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In consequence of the vacancy occasioned on the joint select committee on the affairs of this District by the Senate excusing the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN,] the Chair will appoint the Senator from New York, Mr. CONKLING.

Now, mark it, the Chair did not assume to appoint Mr. CONKLING to the chairmanship of the committee, or to fill the place on the committee that had been occupied by Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN, but simply appointed him a member of the committee. Then Mr. CONKLING asked to be excused, and he was excused. The Senator from Maine [Mr. MORRILL] was next appointed, but he declined and was excused. Then, on the 11th of February, the Chair filled up the vacancy—a vacancy, mark it, that had been created by the Senator from New Jersey first declining to serve, and then by the Senator from New York declining to serve, and then by the Senator from Maine declining to serve. The committee at that time stood in the order of rank, so to speak, BOUTWELL first, THURMAN second, and a vacancy. The Chair thereupon appointed as follows:

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Before the Senate proceeds to the consideration of the bankrupt bill, the Chair will state, in regard to the vacancy on the joint select committee, on the memorial of W. W. Corcoran and others, created by the Senate excusing the Senator from Maine [Mr. MORRILL] from service, that he appoints the Senator from Iowa, Mr. ALLISON—

so that the committee now, under the rules of the Senate, will stand: the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL,] the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. THURMAN,] and the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. ALLISON.]

That is, Mr. ALLISON, instead of being put in the place of Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN, or Mr. CONKLING, or Mr. MORRILL of Maine, was put at the foot of the committee, as the President declared, in accordance with the rules of the Senate; and that statement was literally correct, as I will now proceed to show; for such is the rule and determination of the Senate, and has been always, with, I believe, but one single exception to be found in the history of the Senate. I find in the Manual, on page 144, this statement:

The Vice-President requested the sense of the Senate whether, in appointing a member of a committee in the place of a chairman resigned, he was to understand it to be the appointment of a chairman, or of a member to fill up the number of the committee; and it was determined that the filling of vacancies by the Vice-President should be only filling the vacancies in the number of the committee.

I have the debate before me when that took place, and the decision; and as it is not very long I will ask the Senate to hear it, for this is an important matter that touches the privileges and feelings of Senators.

Mr. HOWE. Will the Senator be good enough to tell me when that decision was made?

Mr. THURMAN. I have it here; it was made on the 25th of January, 1848. I read from the Congressional Globe for that year, page 209:

On motion, Mr. Bradbury was excused from serving on the Committee on Printing; Mr. CAMERON from the Committee on Commerce; Mr. Yulee from the Committee on Private Land Claims, and Mr. Dickinson from the Committee on Patents.

Some of these gentlemen were chairmen of the committees that they asked to be excused from service on.

The PRESIDING OFFICER stated that he was somewhat embarrassed as to the intention of the Senate in regard to these appointments; whether the chairmen were to be designated by him, or merely appointed to complete the number.

That brought up the precise question whether, where a chairman resigned, the Chair could appoint a chairman or only appoint a member of the committee.

Mr. MANGUM. I understand that the practice of the Senate has been that the Chair simply appoint a member of the committee. I believe that, under parliamentary rules, every committee has a right to make its own chairman; but it has been the invariable practice here to accede to the rule, when the appointment is given to the Chair, that the first named on the committee shall be chairman. Still I think it is within the competency of the committee to displace that chairman at any time and appoint another. But when a vacancy occurs the usage, I think, has been simply to appoint a committeeman.

Then followed Mr. Sevier, who stated the only exception to that usage that I have been able to find; and he did it thus:

Mr. SEVIER. In regard to the practice of the Senate, I happen to recollect one instance which occurred, in relation to a committee of which I was a member—I mean the Committee on Indian Affairs. Judge White had been our chairman for many years. I happened to be the second on that committee. When Judge White resigned his seat in the Senate, the then Presiding Officer of the Senate appointed Mr. Tipton to be chairman.

Mr. CALHOUN. I think the practice has been different—

That is, different from this appointment of Tipton—

I know there have been cases where the chairmen have been appointed by the Presiding Officer; but I think the principle is, that the Chair appoints the committeemen, and it belongs to the committee, where it is not otherwise provided for, to say who shall be chairman.

Mr. YULEE.

Now, I ask particular attention to what Mr. Yulee said, because he had carefully examined the question.

Mr. YULEE said that he had occasion recently to make some little examination of the subject. A vacancy occurred in the Committee on Naval Affairs, and a motion was made, in the terms usual on such occasions, and a member was appointed in the usual manner, and the committee, on examination of the question, found that the precedents were unbroken, that when appointments were made to fill vacancies by the Presiding Officer, under the authority of the Senate, the member appointed takes his place at the foot of the committee. The committee always appointed their chairman unless the Senate thought proper to designate the chairman. This was the case with the Committee on Foreign Relations; but the Committee on Naval Affairs, referring to the precedent of the Committee on Finance and an unbroken series of precedents, considered that to be the rule existing. The case referred to by the Senator from Arkansas did not fall under the observation of the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. SEVIER read from the Senate Journal the case to which he had referred, to show that it was competent for the Vice-President to appoint any Senator he pleased.

The PRESIDING OFFICER then put the question—

The matter was brought directly before the Senate for its decision, whether he could appoint a chairman in place of a chairman resigned, or whether he could only fill up the committee and the member appointed by him go to the foot of the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER then put the question, "Shall the appointments be limited to filling up the number?" and

It was decided in the affirmative——

Without, so far as appears, one single dissenting voice.

Mr. SCOTT. Will the Senator from Ohio permit me to ask, for information, at that point, whether before the announcement of the vacancy was made any questions were made as to the power of the President to appoint a member on the committee to fill the vacancy without previous authority from the Senate? That is, was there any decision of the question between the power of the Chair to appoint a chairman and his power to appoint a member, without the previous action of the Senate?

Mr. THURMAN. My impression is that at that time, January 25, 1848, under the rule of the Senate, all committees were appointed by the Presiding Officer. That had originally been for a little while the practice of the Senate. Afterward the Senate took the appointment of committees into its own hands, and very properly, upon the ground that the President of the Senate, the Vice-President of the United States, was not appointed by the Senate and not amenable to the Senate; and therefore the Senate saw fit to take the appointment into its own hands. That has generally been the rule ever since. That was the rule all the time during General Jackson's administration, when the whig party was in a majority in the Senate. It would not trust the democratic Vice-President with the appointment of the committees; it took the appointment into its own hands; and that continued pretty generally to be the rule. But my impression is that under Mr. Polk's administration, when a majority of the Senate were democrats, and the Vice-President, Mr. Dallas, of Pennsylvania, was also a democrat, the old usage for a time was restored, and the Vice-President appointed the committees. At all events it is very certain here that authority was given to fill up these committees.

Mr. President, only a few words more, for I know I am trespassing on the time of my friend from Illinois, [Mr. LOGAN;] but as I have taken very little of the time of the Senate this session, I hope he will forgive me, and I shall not trespass on his time long.

What is the parliamentary law on this subject? It is perfectly plain. In Jefferson's Manual, which will be found in our Manual at page 221, it is said of committees:

Standing committees, as of Privileges and Elections, &c., are usually appointed at the first meeting, to continue through the session. The person first named is generally permitted to act as chairman. But this is a matter of courtesy; every committee having a right to elect their own chairman, who presides over them, puts questions, and reports their proceedings to the House.

That is, every committee is entitled to elect its own chairman, unless it is otherwise ordered. In regard to our standing committees, we know that they are appointed by the Senate itself, under special order, by election, and therefore the committee has no power to elect a chairman; the Senate does that for the committee. But in regard to select committees it is otherwise, and the committee has a right to select its own chairman.

I wish to say one word further on this subject, to show how improvident it would be if a person to be appointed were not placed at the foot of the committee, if he were to be placed at the head of the committee, to be made the chairman of that committee; and I cannot illustrate it better than by this very case. Here this joint committee has been in session off and on for nearly four weeks; it has taken a large mass of testimony, and accumulated a much larger mass of documentary evidence. It has acted with perfect harmony, and according to a system of investigation that was fully discussed at the early meetings of the committee, and determined on and acted on steadily ever since, and I may be allowed to say that no one yet has been found to question the fairness and the propriety of the proceedings of that committee. Now, would it not be strange if, after the committee had thus acted for between three and four weeks, heard testimony, heard counsel, accumulated documentary evidence, studied it and the laws, at this late hour a Senator, perfectly ignorant of what has been done, and having no means of knowing except by trying to catch up by reading four or five hundred pages of print, should be put at the head of that committee?

It does seem to me, therefore, that the wisdom of the rule is perfectly apparent, that when a new man is appointed on a committee he goes to the foot; but he goes to the foot of the committee for another reason. What is the parliamentary law? The parliamentary law is that the committeemen take rank, so to speak, in the order of their appointment; the man first appointed is by courtesy allowed to act as chairman by the committee itself; if he is absent the second man on the committee presides and acts as chairman, and so on; and now if the Senator from Nevada is appointed a member of this committee, when was he appointed? He is the last named; he is not the first named, nor the second named, nor the third named, but he is the last named, and he must take his place below those who were named before. Of course the rights of every member are equal. There is no superiority of right or power in one over the others; but as a question of their rank and of their presiding in the absence of the chairman elected by the committee, and where they preside by the courtesy of the committee according to the order in which they were named, the Senator last named must be at the foot of the committee.

I say, further, that it is essential to the Senate and to the preservation of that good feeling in the Senate which, I am happy to say, has marked the Senate ever since I have been in it, and to that courtesy which is due to the members of the Senate, that men who have served on a committee shall not be overslaughed in this way. I have no interest in it myself. This committee, in the exercise of its undoubted power, appointed a chairman yesterday, a chairman with whom every member of the committee is content, and with whom I venture to say the Senate, the House, and the country will be content—the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. ALLISON.] And I wish to say that so far from having any desire to preside over this committee, the moment the Senator from Massachusetts who had become the head of the committee [Mr. BOUTWELL] was excused, I let it be known, as members of the committee can bear me witness, that I did not intend to preside over the committee, but that as soon as the committee was filled I should ask the committee to elect a chairman.

Why did I not want to preside over the committee? I was not disqualified from presiding over it, but I did not want the additional labor and responsibility that devolve upon the chairman of such a committee. But there was still another reason why I did not want to preside. I had not sought a place on the committee; I would have been glad to have been excused from it; but I did not feel at liberty to ask to be excused, and I did not want to add to my labors by being presiding officer of that committee. But I say there was still another reason. Although there is not, so far as I know, any political question or party question whatever involved in this investigation, and so far as I am concerned there shall be none—although no such question has yet shown its head in that committee, nor do I know that any such will, and none such shall influence me, and I believe none such will influence the other members of the committee, yet I recognize the right of the dominant party in Congress to have the chairmanship of that committee. I recognize the right of the dominant party to have the chairmanship of any committee before which political questions may arise; and therefore, as soon as the Senator from Massachusetts asked to be excused and was excused, I signified my purpose to ask for the appointment of a chairman of the committee as soon as that committee should be filled, and to decline being voted for or receiving any such appointment myself. And yesterday, I may say, as the record of the committee read in open session this morning will show, when the Senator from Iowa was appointed chairman, it was after I had distinctly declared to the committee that I did not wish to continue to preside over it. I have, therefore, no feeling about this matter; but I do think that the privileges and the feelings of members of the Senate are concerned in this business, and that it is contrary to the usages of the body, and contrary to propriety, and contrary to that good feeling which ought to exist in this Senate, to overslaugh members who have served on a committee, and served for weeks upon it, engaged in laborious duties, by the appointment of somebody to go above their heads.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nevada asks to be excused from further service on the committee.

Mr. STEWART. No; I decline to act under this appointment, and ask to be excused from acting at all under it. I said that I did not think the appointment was regular, and had so stated to the committee after my attention was called to the subject. I want my position exactly understood. The appointment made me chairman. I did not choose to act at all on the committee under the appointment, or have anything to do with it, and I have called the attention of the Senate to the fact. I believe the Senate will come to the same conclusion that the Senator from Ohio has, that the appointment was irregular; but I may be mistaken about that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Chair understand the Senator from Nevada as asking to be excused?

Mr. STEWART. From acting under that appointment.

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope the Chair will be instructed to fill the vacancy on the committee without excusing the Senator. I suppose there is a question of parliamentary law, a mere technical question, as to whether he is chairman of the committee or a member of the committee. I think it is scarcely worth while for us to discuss that here, though my colleague has expressed his opinion. I hope the vacancy will simply be filled, and that the Senator from Nevada will serve as a member of the committee.

Mr. HAMLIN. It seems to me this whole matter has been solved, and in a manner satisfactory to the Senate, by the action of the committee itself. I certainly concur in the view expressed by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] as to the question of the power of the Chair; I believe he has stated the practice of the Senate aright, that unless there be an express order of the Senate authorizing the Chair to appoint the chairman of a committee, he cannot do so; and unless that be expressly granted by the Senate, the man who is first named is only chairman by courtesy; and if there be none of those powers given to the Presiding Officer, it is within the power of the committee to elect its own chairman. They have done so in this case. It seems to me that ought to end this matter; and if there be any necessity for correcting the record the Chair can reappoint the Senator from Nevada, or let us amend the record and have his appointment stand on the Journal simply as a member of the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate will indulge the Chair one moment on this subject. The Chair has no doubt that he will be believed when he says that he has no desire, and has had no intention, to usurp any authority, or to do more than he was compelled to do in regard to this committee of investigation. He has appointed several Senators, who have been excused by the Senate, and has appointed others to fill their places. The resolution provided that "a joint select committee be raised, consisting of —— Senators, to be appointed by the President of the Senate, and five members of the House, to be appointed by the Speaker of the House." The opinion of the Chair was, without much reflection upon the subject and utterly unaware that he was entering upon doubtful ground, that the power possessed by the Senate in creating its committees was by this resolution conferred upon the Chair, and that if the Senate could elect a chairman, the Chair had power under this resolution to appoint a chairman for the committee on the part of the Senate; though the two committees might elect any one of either committee to preside over their joint deliberations and proceedings.

In the first appointment that was made the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] was not designated in words as chairman; but, what was exactly equivalent to that, he was placed at the head of the committee, which, according to all usage, made him chairman, if there could be any chairman of the Senate branch of the committee. The Chair was under the impression that there were two committees and not one; that they met and acted jointly, as a committee of conference meets and acts jointly; but that each committee represented its own House; and, as the Senator from Ohio has well said, if that be not so, there is no statute whatever, as I understand, to punish perjury or to authorize this committee to send for papers or do anything else. It is upon the theory that there is a committee of the Senate and a committee of the House jointly at work in the investigation of a fact, that the law authorizes witnesses to be sent for, papers to be demanded, and denounces the penalty of perjury for false swearing. That was the impression of the Chair, and it was the intention of the Chair in each appointment to appoint a chairman of the Senate branch of the committee.

The Senator from Ohio reads from the RECORD that when Mr. ALLISON was appointed the Chair announced that the committee, according to the usages of the Senate, would then stand: Mr. BOUTWELL, Mr. THURMAN, and Mr. ALLISON. If that be so, it was an inadvertence on the part of the Chair; the Chair intended to say that the committee would stand, Mr. BOUTWELL, Mr. ALLISON, and Mr. THURMAN, supposing that the Chair had authority to reappoint to the first place or the chairmanship of the committee, and Mr. ALLISON having requested not to be made chairman. But of course the Chair will be very glad to be directed by the Senate in this matter, and will obey its direction cheerfully and gladly.

Mr. THURMAN. I certainly did not intend to impute any wrong motive to the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair did not understand the Senator to do so.

Mr. THURMAN. The Chair knows me too well to suppose I could do such a thing as that. But I wish to say that the original appointment of a committee is one thing, and the filling up a vacancy on that committee is another thing. If the Chair was right in its interpretation, whenever the appointment of a committee was given to the Chair the Chair, would have a continuing power to appoint a chairman of that committee forever, as long as the committee had an existence.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will allow the Chair at that point to make a suggestion to him for his consideration. The present impression of the Chair is that, technically, the Chair had no power to do anything under this resolution, except to make the first appointment of the committee. The resolution does not authorize the Chair to fill a vacancy that may occur after the original appointments; but the Senate excused Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN, and the Chair appointed another, who was also excused, and so on.

These subsequent appointments were made by the Chair, upon the theory that what the Senate could do in regard to any of its committees the Chair was authorized by this resolution to do in regard to this committee. And the Chair is still inclined to think that if the Senate can name the chairman of a committee, and subsequently, on the resignation, appoint another chairman, of which the Chair entertains no doubt, the Chair had authority to do the same thing in this case, provided he had any authority under the resolution to do more than make the first appointment. But upon this point the Chair is inclined to think he erred, and for that reason the appointment of Mr. STEWART as chairman in this instance was irregular. The Senate can, however, direct an amendment of the record so as to show that Mr. STEWART was appointed to the committee, and this will be a ratification by the Senate.

Mr. THURMAN. I beg leave to say that I think the Chair is in error in that opinion. There is no such power as that of the Senate devolved on the Chair, except in the first instance to appoint the committee. In regard to the appointment of Mr. ALLISON, who came in afterward, that was perfectly proper, because the Senate wing of the committee never was full until the appointment of the Senator from Iowa. The whole thing was in fieri until then; everybody had been excused who was appointed except the Senator from Massachusetts and myself. But to put an end to all trouble upon this, I ask leave to move that the Chair do now fill up that committee by appointing a member.

Mr. SHERMAN. It seems to me it is only necessary to change the Journal. I am rather disposed to do that.

Mr. THURMAN. Very well; I prefer that.

Mr. SHERMAN. Let the Senator from Nevada stand as a member of this committee, and by the parliamentary custom laid down in Jefferson's Manual he takes his place on the committee as a member, and the committee have the undoubted right to elect a chairman.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. It seems to me that the logic of the law of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] raises a difficulty which has not been contemplated. According to his notions of the constitution of this joint committee, there had been in fact no committee; there had been no legal chairman of the committee until the committee chose a chairman the other day. In the mean time the proceedings have advanced some two or three weeks; and if the difficulties that occur to the Senator now as being involved in the appointment of the Senator from Nevada are real, then the committee is already involved in those difficulties.

Mr. THURMAN. By courtesy, the first named acts as chairman.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. If by courtesy, or by law, or by usage, he was chairman, then he was chairman to all intents and purposes. Now, how was this committee constituted? By a joint resolution; but this part of it which pertains to the Senate of the United States, and the appointment of the committee on its part, was absolutely and unqualifiedly the act of the Senate of the United States. So far as the resolution is concerned, as it came from the House, it proposed a committee of five for that body, leaving a blank to be filled by the Senate of the United States, as to its committee, to correspond. When that act was performed by the Senate, then the committee was instituted; but it should be remembered that by the proposition, as it came from the House, the Senate committee takes the precedence, is first named in order in the resolution; and being first in order it is first in precedence; and being first in precedence, the party first named, necessarily, in the institution of that committee, became chairman of it; became chairman of it by the precedents read by the Senator from Ohio. Therefore Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN, being first named, was chairman of that committee, which had, by the action of the Senate, become an entirety; a joint committee to be sure, but by precedents and by the principles of parliamentary law, being first named, he was chairman of the joint committee. Otherwise, if it was not so to be treated, you will see that all the proceedings thus far are irregular, and the witnesses must be sworn over again, and their whole testimony retaken, so far as I see, upon the reasoning of the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. THURMAN. The Senator certainly misunderstands me more than I ever knew him to misunderstand anybody before. The first named on a committee acts by courtesy as chairman of that committee; so the books say; and all its acts are perfectly regular and correct. They permit him to preside, and put questions, and so on; but, as the authorities say, the committee at any time it sees fit may elect a chairman of its own. If they do not do it, this principle of courtesy recognizes the person first named as the presiding officer.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. It is not simply in the courtesy of the committee, I submit to my honorable friend; but being named first, he is named by force of parliamentary usage, which has the force of law. He is instituted, therefore, by force of law, and he may exercise all the functions of chairman. Now, what makes this somewhat imperative, in my judgment, is, that this body in the institution of committees is peculiar. It does not confide to its Presiding Officer, for reasons that are obvious enough, the appointment of committees; and therefore, whenever he is specially so authorized, it is presumed that he is authorized to exercise all the powers in the institution of a committee which the body itself is authorized to do. My honorable friend will not deny that it is competent for this body to institute a committee and indicate the chairman, and that it is not in the power of the committee afterward to change it.

Mr. THURMAN. I deny that the Senate can appoint a chairman for a joint committee. It would be a breach of the privileges of the House.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. That is not my proposition now; I will come to that in a moment. But I say it is competent for the Senate to appoint a committee and name its chairman, and he does not hold the place by courtesy of the committee afterward. Then, in this particular case, I submit that the Senate having given the order of precedence by the resolution instituted by the House, is placed in the attitude indicated.

Mr. THURMAN. Allow me to interrupt the Senator one moment, to show where this matter will run to.

Mr. LOGAN. If this debate is to go on in this way, I shall have to ask for the special order. I have been very generous, I think, this morning.

Mr. THURMAN. I will occupy not two minutes, just to state a fact.

Mr. LOGAN. I have no objection to that, but I do not like to be postponed until late in the afternoon.

Mr. THURMAN. I only wish to look at the history of this committee to see how the idea of the Senator from Maine would run us into difficulties. The Senator from New Jersey was first appointed. He stood at the head of the committee, if he were to be considered from that fact as chairman, technically, of the committee. Then when he resigned there was a vacancy in the chairmanship and no vacancy in the membership, because the Senator from Massachusetts and myself did not decline. Then when the Senator from New York was appointed, if he was appointed to fill that particular vacancy, it was the vacancy in the chairmanship, according to the Senator's reasoning, and he would have been chairman, and when he declined and the Senator himself was appointed, then he would have been chairman if he had accepted, because his appointment would have been to fill the vacant chairmanship, according to his reasoning. But he declined. Then the Senator from Iowa was appointed, and according to this reasoning the Senator from Iowa ought to have been appointed chairman of the committee, because according to that reasoning there was only one vacancy, and it was a vacancy not in the membership of the committee, but in the chairmanship of the committee, and therefore the Senator from Iowa ought to have been appointed to the chairmanship, for the Senator from Massachusetts and myself had not declined, we had continued to serve; but instead of that the Senator from Massachusetts became the presiding officer over that committee.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. My answer to that is, that that would depend altogether on this general fact, whether in appointing the committee we were appointing it by virtue of the principle of parliamentary law or whether it was to be appointed by the Chair by an express authority conferred upon him to institute this committee as this body could have done it. That is all.

Mr. THURMAN. There was no more authority than is given in any other case.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I am admonished by the Senator from Illinois, very properly, that this whole proceeding is out of his time; and as there is nothing practical in what I am saying, and as the suggestion made by the Senator from Nevada himself obviates the whole difficulty, and that is that he does not decline to serve on the committee but suggests that he is unwilling to serve with this complication, it seems to me that a correction of the Journal is all that is needed in this case. That obviates the whole difficulty. By appointing him on the committee he stands simply as a member of the committee and not as chairman.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands the Senator from Ohio to move that the Journal of Friday last be so corrected as to show the appointment of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] as a member of the joint committee.

Mr. THURMAN. That is it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Before the Senator from Illinois proceeds on the special order, the Chair will ask the indulgence of the Senate to dispose of business on his table from the House of Representatives.

The following bills from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Pensions:

A bill (H. R. No. 2190) to amend the act entitled "An act granting pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the war of 1812, and the widows of deceased soldiers," approved February 14, 1871 and to restore to the pension-rolls those persons whose names were stricken therefrom in consequence of disloyalty;

A bill (H. R. No. 2452) to equalize pensions in certain cases;

A bill (H. R. No. 2453) to amend an act entitled "An act to revise, consolidate, and amend the laws relating to pensions," approved March 3, 1873;

A bill (H. R. No. 2454) to amend section 13 of an act approved March 3, 1873, entitled "An act to revise, consolidate, and amend the laws relating to pensions;"

A bill (H. R. No. 2455) granting an allowance to soldiers who have lost an eye;

A bill (H. R. No. No. 2456) to amend an act entitled "An act to revise, consolidate, and amend the laws relating to pensions," approved March 3, 1873; and

The bill (H. R. No. 2092) for the relief of John W. Divine, late assistant surgeon of the Eleventh Regiment of Tennessee Cavalry, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The bill (H. R. No. 2451) to improve the mouth of the Mississippi River, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The bill (H. R. No. 104) for the relief of James Coats, of Jackson, Mississippi, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

TOPOGRAPHICAL SURVEY OF THE CAPITOL GROUNDS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. No. 360) making an appropriation for a topographical survey of the Capitol grounds, and plans for improving the same.

The amendment of the House of Representatives was to strike out the word "five" before "thousand" and insert the word "three;" so as to make the appropriation $3,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Let that lie on the table for the present; and after the Senator from Illinois gets through I shall ask for action on the part of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That course will be pursued.

CAUSES OF EPIDEMIC CHOLERA.

The action of the House of Representatives, concurring in the Senate amendment of the joint resolution (H. R. No. 29) authorizing the Secretary of War to detail medical officers of the Army to inquire into and report upon the causes of epidemic cholera, with an amendment, was read.

The amendment of the House of Representatives was to add to the amendment of the Senate—

And the Surgeon-General is hereby authorized and directed to report to the Secretary of War, for publication, such information on the subject as he may have or shall obtain.

The amendment of the House was concurred in.

INVESTIGATION OF THE GOVERNMENT PRINTING OFFICE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a concurrent resolution from the House of Representatives; which was read, as follows:

Whereas it is alleged that grave abuses exist in the Government Printing Office; and whereas the abolition of the franking privilege will largely reduce the amount of public printing: Therefore,

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That the Joint Committee on Printing be required to report, by bill or otherwise, whether the Government Printing Office cannot be discontinued, and whether large sums of money cannot be annually saved by a change in the method of doing the public printing; and that said Joint Committee on Printing have power to send for persons and papers.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The chairman of the Committee on Printing [Mr. ANTHONY] being absent, if there be no objection, the resolution will be laid aside until his return. ["Agreed."]

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. E. BABCOCK, his Secretary, announced that the President had, on the 11th instant, approved and signed the following acts:

An act (S. No. 353) for the relief of David Braden; and

An act (S. No. 365) for the relief of Matthew Woodruff, late sergeant of Company G, Twenty-first Missouri Volunteers.

NATIONAL-BANK CIRCULATION.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 432) to amend the act entitled "An act to provide for the redemption of the 3 per cent. temporary-loan certificates, and for an increase of national-bank notes," the pending question being the motion of Mr. BUCKINGHAM to refer the bill to the Committee on Finance, with the instructions adopted on the motion of Mr. MERRIMON.

[Mr. LOGAN addressed the Senate. His remarks will appear in the Appendix.]

Mr. FLANAGAN. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at five o'clock and thirty-one minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, March 17, 1874.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by Rev. GEORGE P. HAYS, D. D., of Washington and Jefferson College, Washington, Pennsylvania.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

DEPARTMENTAL ADVERTISING.

Mr. COX, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Whereas the act of Congress approved July 15, 1870, contained the following provision: "That no advertisement, notice, or proposal, for any Executive Department of the Government or for any Bureau thereof. or for any office therewith connected, shall be published in any newspaper whatever except in pursuance of a written authority for such publication from the head of such Department; and no bill for any such advertising or publication shall be paid unless there be presented with such bill a copy of the written authority aforesaid;" and whereas it is alleged that a bill or bills for advertising done in defiance of this provision of the act of July 15, 1870, is now pending before the accounting officers of the Treasury Department: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to furnish this House with said bill or bills, and also copies of all correspondence on the subject.

Mr. COX moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PRESERVATION OF TIMBER TREES.

Mr. DUNNELL, by unanimous consent, reported back from the Committee on the Public Lands, as a substitute for bill H. R. No. 2497, the bill (H. R. No. 2540) for the appointment of a commissioner for inquiry into the destruction of forests and into measures for the preservation of timber; which, with the accompanying report, was ordered to be printed and recommitted, not to be brought back on a motion to reconsider.

IMPROVEMENT OF WATER-ROUTES.

Mr. SHEATS. On Monday of last week I introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2382) to provide for the opening and improvement of the navigation of certain water-routes therein named, and for other purposes. I asked its reference to the Committee on Railways and Canals, but it was erroneously referred to the Committee on Commerce. I ask unanimous consent that the reference be changed.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the bill will be referred to the Committee on Railways and Canals.

There was no objection.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE ARKANSAS RIVER.

Mr. NEGLEY, by unanimous consent, reported back from the Committee on Commerce, with amendments, the bill (H. R. No. 2541) in the nature of a substitute for bill H. R. No. 372, giving the consent of Congress to the erection of a bridge across the Arkansas River at Pine Bluff, Arkansas; which was ordered to be printed and recommitted.

CORRECTION OF LAND BOUNDARIES.

Mr. TOWNSEND, by unanimous consent, reported back from the Committee on the Public Lands the bill (H. R. No. 2414) to authorize the correction of boundaries of certain lands, and moved that said committee be discharged from the further consideration of the same, and that it be referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

DEVELOPMENT OF MINING RESOURCES.

Mr. TOWNSEND also, by unanimous consent, reported back from the Committee on the Public Lands a resolution of the Legislature of the State of California, protesting against the passage of the bill amending an act to promote the development of the mining resources of the United States, and moved that said committee be discharged from the further consideration of the same, and that it be referred to the Committee on Mines and Mining.

The motion was agreed to.

OFFICIAL FEES, SOUTHERN DISTRICT OF GEORGIA.

Mr. COOK, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

The Attorney-General having called the attention of Congress to the continued violation of the third section of the act of 1853, requiring the district attorneys, clerks of the district and circuit courts, and marshals, to make returns in writing, embracing all the fees and emoluments of their respective offices, of every name and character, on the part of said officers, for the southern district of Georgia: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice be instructed to inquire specially into said charge, and into the expenditure of the public funds of said Department, and to send for persons and papers.

RECONSIDERATION OF REFERENCES.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont, moved to reconsider the various votes to-day upon reference, recommitment, &c.; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JONAS WARREN.

Mr. CALDWELL, from the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions and War of 1812, reported back the petition of Jonas Warren, for relief, and moved that the said committee be discharged from the further consideration of the same, and that it be referred to the Committee on War Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour now begins at fifteen minutes after twelve o'clock, and the call of committees will be resumed.

IMPROVEMENT OF MOUTH OF MISSISSIPPI.

Mr. STONE. I am directed by the Committee on Railways and Canals to report back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 2342) for the improvement of the mouth of the Mississippi River. As this bill contains an appropriation, I suppose it must go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be so referred.

PUBLIC LANDS IN CALIFORNIA.

Mr. LOWE, from the Committee on Mines and Mining, reported back adversely the bill (H. R. No. 738) relating to the public lands in the State of California, and moved that the same be laid on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

PLACER-MINING LANDS IN CALIFORNIA.

Mr. LOWE also, from the Committee on Mines and Mining, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2542) relating to placer-mining lands in the State of California; which was read a first and second time.

The bill was read.

The first section provides that public lands in the State of California, other than those containing veins or lodes of quartz or other rock in place, bearing gold, silver, cinnabar, lead, tin, copper, or other valuable mineral, or lands containing coal, shall not be excluded, as mineral, from pre-emption or homestead entry, unless it shall be shown that bona fide mining claims exist thereon, or that the land is necessary for outlet or other mining easements; and the price of both agricultural and placer mineral lands outside of the limits of railroad grants shall be $1.25 per acre; provided that nothing therein contained shall be construed to change any presumption now existing, either by law or Department regulations, that lands within railroad grants are mineral in character; and provided further that nothing therein contained shall be so construed as to in any way enlarge or modify any grant heretofore made to any railroad company or corporation, or to allow any such railroad company or corporation to take in satisfaction of any such grant any placer-mining lands; and provided further that none of the provisions of the act shall be construed to apply to, or affect in any manner, title to any lands now in controversy or being litigated before any State, territorial, or Federal court, or in any Department of the Government.

The second section provides that where two or more settlers have improvements on the same legal subdivision, whether agricultural or placer mining, or both, it shall be lawful for such settlers to make joint entry of their lands at the local land office, or for either of said settlers to enter into a contract with his cosettlers to convey to them their portion of said land after a patent is issued to him, and, after making such contract, to file an application for such land, and prove up and pay for such land, in the same manner and to the same effect as is provided by law for agricultural settlers upon the same legal subdivision; provided that proof of occupation and improvement under mining rules of the portion of said land claimed as a mining claim may be made in said proceeding by the applicant as now provided by law; and notice of said application, where patent of a mining claim is sought, shall be given and have the same effect as is now provided in cases of application for mining claims.

The third section provides that in cases where placer-mining claims are duly located under mining laws, it shall be lawful for the parties applying for a patent for the same to make their application to purchase lands to the extent of the smallest legal subdivisions containing the said claims when such application does not conflict with the rights of other parties, and patent shall issue accordingly; provided that nothing therein contained shall authorize any person or company to locate more than one hundred and sixty acres as a mining claim.

The fourth section provides that all ex parte affidavits and proofs required by law to be made before the local land officers in mining or pre-emption cases may be taken before any officer authorized to administer oaths, in the land district where the claim may be situate, or out of such district before the judge or clerk of any court of record; and in all cases of contest the testimony or proofs required may be taken before any clerk of a court of record in the land district where the claim may be situate, on personal notice of at least ten days to the opposing party; or, if said opposing party cannot be found, then by publication of at least once a week for thirty days in a newspaper to be designated by the register of the land office as published nearest to the location of such land; and the register shall require proof that such notice has been given; and such affidavits and proofs, when filed with the register and the receiver, shall have the same effect as if taken before those officers; provided in such cases of contest the testimony of any witness residing out of the land district may be taken in the county of his residence in the mode therein prescribed. Effect shall be given to the act by regulations to be prescribed by the Commissioner of the General Land Office.

Mr. LOWE. I will briefly state the provisions of the bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. This bill is subject to the point of order, but I do not desire to make it until the gentleman has been heard.

Mr. LOWE. I hope the gentleman from Indiana will not make the point of order. Do I understand that he makes it?

The SPEAKER. He proposes to reserve it to hear the gentleman's speech. That can be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. LOWE. By the mining act of 1872 rules and regulations are provided to facilitate the purchase and working of mining veins in the Territories of the West. In the mining districts their operations have been found in most respects satisfactory to the miners and satisfactory to the Department. But this bill proposes to utilize the experience of the last two years, and makes some changes which, in the opinion of the committee and in the opinion of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, will facilitate the development of mining interests, and harmonize the mining operations and acquisition of titles to mining lands with the necessities of the case and the general policy of the country in this regard.

The first section of the bill substantially performs the office of placing the price of the placer-mining lands the same as agricultural lands. Under existing laws, with respect to mining lands, they are sold at $2.50 an acre, while agricultural pre-emption lands in the same locality are sold for $1.25 per acre. This causes conflict and inconvenience between the two interests. As a matter of fact, it is found that, so far as the value of placer-mining lands is concerned, it is no greater than that of the agricultural pre-emption lands in the same locality. Hence it is the opinion of those who have examined the question, and the opinion of the Committee on Mines and Mining, supported by the advice of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, that these placer-mining lands should be placed upon the same basis as to price with agricultural lands in the same vicinity. It will have the effect, among other things, to dispense with very much of the contest of titles between placer-mining claims and agricultural claims, and facilitate the convenience of entry.

A subsequent section of the bill provides the placer-mining claims may be taken up to the extent of one hundred and sixty acres of land, thus making a change in the present provisions of the mining law which only allows individuals to take up twenty acres. But it does not at all interfere with the opportunities of companies to increase the amounts of public lands which they may take up.

The subsequent sections of the bill make some alterations in respect to the mode of proof, giving greater facilities for the taking of testimony and the making of proof in placer-mining claims. The bill does not interfere at all with the act of 1872 in reference to quartz-mining claims of lodes and veins, strictly so called. It has been carefully considered by the committee, and I believe has the approval of the Delegates and Representatives from the mining Territories and States. It has been carefully examined by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and has been approved of by him. If no one wishes to debate it, I will call the previous question.

Mr. WARD, of Illinois. I ask the gentleman to yield to me for a few minutes.

Mr. LOWE. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. WARD.]

Mr. WARD, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call the attention of the House to the peculiar wording of the first section of this bill. Having done so, I take it, my duty will have been discharged. It reverses the order in which lands shall be entered as to proofs. Heretofore these lands were not subject to entry.

Mr. LOWE. Before the gentleman proceeds further I wish to say to him that the committee have reported a substitute for the bill, and a slight change has been made in the last section of the bill as to testimony.

Mr. WARD, of Illinois. I do not care as to that. That part of the bill to which I desire to call the attention of the House reads as follows:

That public lands in the State of California, other than those containing veins or lodes of quartz or other rock in place, bearing gold, silver, cinnabar, lead, tin, copper, or other valuable mineral, or lands containing coal, shall not be excluded as mineral from pre-emption or homestead entry unless it shall be shown that bona fide mining claims exist thereon.

That is a surrender by the Government of all control over these mining lands; vacant lands not occupied at all in California, yet unentered and reserved under the previous laws. Grants made to railroad companies have heretofore excluded mineral lands. All the legislation of the country in relation to homesteads has steadily excluded mineral lands. I need but call the attention of Congress to that fact for the proof of the assertion I make. This bill reverses that rule. It provides that all lands shall be subject to entry, unless it be shown that bona fide mining claims exist thereon. The reverse ought to be the case. Before these lands are to be entered as agricultural lands the reverse ought to be proved. Having once been reserved as mining lands, they ought not be permitted to be entered until some satisfactory evidence is offered that they are not mineral lands, or else you surrender the whole mineral lands of California to be entered as homesteads.

The result is this—and that, I take it, may be the purpose of some who are interested in this bill—that it practically opens all the unsettled mineral lands of California to entry at $1.25, and this will enable those who are so disposed to carry out still further and extend their operations in such a way as practically to gobble up much of the untouched valuable placer-mining lands of California. I do not object to the selling of mining lands; on the contrary, I have introduced into Congress, and at the proper time I shall press upon the attention of Congress, a law which provides for the entry of mineral lands. But they should be entered as such. Under this bill they may be entered as agricultural lands unless it is shown that no bona fide claims exist thereon. It subjects them to sale and transfer, and to aggregation and accumulation in the hands of a corporation, or of one man, in the same way that agricultural lands may now be massed and controlled by wealthy individuals or corporations.

Now, if Congress is prepared to say to the people of the country that the mining lands henceforth shall stand precisely on the same basis as agricultural lands with reference to entry, then this bill is right. But it seems to me a fair way to look at this bill in view of the important fact—and it is more important than gentlemen here ordinarily think, unless their attention has been specially called to it—that scattered all along at the foot of the mountains in California, along its gulches and streams, are hundreds of thousands and millions of acres of placer-mining lands which, under this bill, will be entered without the Government receiving any benefit from them beyond what is provided in this bill; and what is worse, entered in such a way that a corporation can gobble a whole gulch or a whole stream upon the foot of a mountain and exclude all enterprises conducted by the private persons who engage in mining in these regions.

I have no interest on earth in this question. My attention has been called to it because I am to some extent familiar with the mining laws and with miners, and because I know their struggles, and know the tendency there is for everything to be aggregated and managed by monopolies and great corporations.

And this bill, whether it be projected for that purpose or not, actually does produce the effect of allowing them to buy these lands, consolidate them, get control of a river or gulch, and keep out the prospectors and miners now engaged in developing the riches of the mines of California. It relates only to California, and I am glad of that; but I do not desire that it shall be passed in relation to that State.

I will say, in addition to this—for I think it a proper matter for me to refer to—that since this bill has been introduced, I have received from many persons interested in mining matters on the Pacific coast, repeated letters making suggestions in reference to this particular provision. Reverse it by putting in an amendment which I suggest, and I have no objection to the passage of the bill. So amend it as to require anybody, before he is permitted to go on and enter lands reserved as mineral lands, to prove, in some satisfactory way, that they are not mineral lands within the true meaning and intent of the law by which they are reserved. By this bill you reverse that, and provide that where a man goes to a land office and wishes to enter a section or quarter-section of these lands, the Government officers shall themselves hunt up proofs, and show that no bona fide mining claim exists thereon, and if not, he has a right to enter it. The reverse should be the rule.

If gentlemen, with the statement I have made, are prepared to vote away this grand patrimony of the country and make it possible that it may be gobbled up by a few men and controlled by monopolists, and shut out the miner with his pick and pan, then place the mineral lands in the condition in which this bill places them, and you will have succeeded in doing it.

Mr. LOWE. I yield now to the gentleman from California, [Mr. PAGE.]

Mr. PAGE. Evidently the gentleman from Illinois misconstrues the provisions of this bill. If an experience of over twenty-two years in the mining regions of the State of California gives me a right to speak understandingly upon this question, I think that the remarks I have to offer ought to have some consideration by this House.

It is well known, Mr. Speaker, that no State in the Union is as much in need of legislation by Congress for the settlement of the land questions in that State as California is. We have a great variety of public lands there. We have placer-mining lands; we have quartz or rocky lands; we have timber lands, and we have lands appropriate only for agricultural purposes. Now, in 1866 Congress passed the first law in reference to the mines of California, the tenth section of which I send to the Clerk's desk and desire to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 10. And be it further enacted, That wherever, prior to the passage of this act, upon the lands heretofore designated as mineral lands, which have been excluded from survey and sale, there have been homesteads made by citizens of the United States, or persons who have declared their intention to become citizens, which homesteads have been made, improved, and used for agricultural purposes, and upon which there have been no valuable mines of gold, silver, cinnabar, or copper discovered, and which are properly agricultural lands, the said settlers or owners of such homesteads shall have a right of pre-emption thereto, and shall be entitled to purchase the same at the price of $1.25 per acre, and in quantity not to exceed one hundred and sixty acres; or said parties may avail themselves of the provisions of the act of Congress approved May 20, 1862, entitled "An act to secure homesteads to actual settlers on the public domain," and acts amendatory thereof.

Mr. PAGE. Now, Mr. Speaker, by that law just read at the Clerk's desk, it is provided that lands in California, on which no bona fide mining claims exist, shall be open to homestead and pre-emption entry at $1.25 an acre. That is in the tenth section of the law of 1866. But under the construction given to that law by the Commissioner of the General Land Office any person would be permitted to claim what is known as mineral land, either one section or a number of sections of land, and thereby compel the agricultural applicant to go into court or go before the register and receiver, and disprove the mineral character of the land; and under the construction given to that section the Commissioner of the General Land Office, or the Secretary of the Interior, withdrew five counties in my State from homestead and pre-emption entry, without any knowledge of the fact that they contained mineral lands; but simply compelling the parties to disprove what somebody had said, that these lands were mineral in character. I refer to the report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office for 1872, in which he stated that certain townships had been withdrawn from homestead and pre-emption entry on the supposition that they might be mineral lands.

Now what was the effect of that decision? Why, sir, I hold in my hand a paper published in one of the counties of my district, and it is only one of many hundred in the State, or in what are known as the mining counties, which contains notices and citations at an expense of twenty-five dollars each to the persons who desire to obtain titles to the lands. What for? Why to disprove that the lands sought to be pre-empted or purchased are mineral lands. There was no evidence that they were mineral lands; but, as I say, the lands had been withdrawn under the construction given to the tenth section of the act of 1866. I send to the Clerk's desk, and desire to have read, a copy of the citation and notice; and I understand that it costs every applicant for a homestead in these districts from one to three hundred dollars, he being compelled to take his witnesses to the land office, and the question is to be decided by the preponderance of testimony on the point whether it is agricultural or mineral lands, in favor of one or the other. And in every case it has cost, as I said before, from one to three hundred dollars to disprove that they are mineral lands.

The Clerk read as follows:

NOTICE AND CITATION.

Before the register and receiver of the Stockton, California, land office.

Whereas James F. Morgan, D. S., No. 5494, whose post-office address is Millerton, Fresno County, California, did on the 16th day of January, 1874, apply at this office to enter as agricultural land the fractional north half of northwest quarter, southwest quarter of northwest quarter, and northwest quarter of southwest quarter of section No. 1, township No. 11 south, range No. 22 east, Mount Diablo meridian, which was reserved as being mineral in character, and more valuable for mining than for agricultural purposes, by letter marked "N," dated December 7, 1871, from the honorable Commissioner of the General Land Office: Therefore,

In compliance with instructions of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, it is hereby ordered that on the 23d day of February, A. D. 1874, at ten o'clock a. m., you, each and every person claiming the above land, or any part thereof, appear before us in the United States land office, in the city of Stockton, with your witnesses, prepared to testify as to the mineral or agricultural character of the above-described land, or any part thereof, and show cause, if any there be, why James F. Morgan should not be allowed to enter the aforesaid land, or certain portions of the same. Herein fail not, or the said land will be awarded to said James F. Morgan, upon his furnishing the proper proof of compliance with the pre-emption law.

Witness our hands this 16th day of January, 1874.

OTIS PERRIN, Receiver.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to have the point of order settled. When this bill was introduced the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] said that it was amenable to a point of order, and that it should go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, but that he would wait until he heard the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LOWE] explain the bill. The Chair stated that that could be done by unanimous consent. That unanimous consent was given, and the gentleman from Kansas finished his explanation, and then yielded to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. WARD,] who made an argument against the bill. He was followed by the gentleman from California, [Mr. PAGE,] who is now making an argument for the bill. The gentleman from Indiana still maintains his point of order to be good. The Chair holds that it is not good, and that the bill is now before the House. The time to make a point of order against a bill, if any gentleman desires to do so, is when the bill is introduced; the rules provide that it shall then be done. But a gentleman cannot have a point of order hanging in the air, midway, pending the discussion of the merits of the bill. That cannot be done under the rules of the House. The bill is now before the House.

Mr. SCOFIELD. If we had had that decision in the beginning, when the point of order was first raised, then it would have been fair to the House. But to make that ruling now is depriving other members, who would have made the point of order at the time, of an opportunity to do so.

The SPEAKER. What point does the gentleman make?

Mr. SCOFIELD. I am not making any point of order, but rather complaining, perhaps, of the ruling of the Chair.

The SPEAKER. What did the gentleman understand the point of order raised by the gentleman from Indiana to be?

Mr. SCOFIELD. I understood the gentleman from Indiana raised the point of order, and the Speaker decided that by unanimous consent it should be pending while explanation was made.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman questions the decision of the Chair he should have an accurate knowledge of the facts. What does the gentleman from Pennsylvania understand that the gentleman from Indiana requested?

Mr. SCOFIELD. The gentleman from Indiana raised the point of order on the bill that it should go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, but stated that he would wait, without enforcing the point of order, until he should hear from the gentleman who had the bill in charge.

The SPEAKER. Precisely.

Mr. SCOFIELD. The Speaker then decided that that could be done by unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. Certainly.

Mr. SCOFIELD. Under that unanimous consent the debate upon the bill has been going on since.

The SPEAKER. Precisely. But the gentleman from Indiana said that he would reserve his point of order until he heard from the gentleman from Kansas. The gentleman from Kansas spoke, finished his remarks, yielded the floor to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. WARD,] who proceeded to make an argument on the other side, and then was followed by the gentleman from California, [Mr. PAGE.] Now, if the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOFIELD] is correct, this bill, being in the morning hour, at what point to-day or six weeks hence would the right of the gentleman to interpose his point of order cease?

Mr. SCOFIELD. At any time until the gentleman from Kansas who had charge of the bill surrendered the floor.

Mr. HOLMAN. That is the point I was about to make. The gentleman from Kansas still has the floor. The Chair, by uniform practice, has allowed explanations to be made on a bill before a point of order against it is enforced.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has uniformly discouraged, in every way he could, the suspending of points of order. The Chair will rule—and if gentlemen desire to appeal from his ruling the Chair will be glad to have it done—that points of order cannot be held suspended, for the practice tends to great irregularity of business.

Mr. LOWE. If the point is not renewed at the time suggested, then it is to be considered as waived.

The SPEAKER. The Chair waited for the gentleman from Indiana to insist upon his point of order.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman from Kansas had not yielded the floor.

The SPEAKER. He had, so far as he himself was concerned.

Mr. HOLMAN. But he still holds the floor. It is exceedingly important for us to know what the measure is.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman heard the bill read from the Clerk's desk.

Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly; but an explanation of its provisions is important.

The SPEAKER. The point of order obviously lies against the bill, and the Chair looked around expecting some gentleman to raise the point. The gentleman from Indiana indicated that he would raise the point, but proposed to suspend it until the gentleman from Kansas had made an explanation of the bill. The gentleman from Kansas finished his speech, was followed by a gentleman in an adverse argument, then by another on his side. And then the gentleman from Indiana maintains that he is still able to make his point of order against the bill. If so, he has that right six weeks hence.

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust that, inasmuch as this ruling is now so rigorously enforced——

The SPEAKER. The Chair rules rigorously. If a gentleman has a point of order against a bill he should make it when the bill is introduced, and stick to it. The bill is now before the House.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I am glad of that, if the Chair will stick to it.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania will show any instance in which the Chair has varied, his remark may then be courteous.

Mr. SCOFIELD. Perhaps the remark was not courteous in any way. I stated it impulsively, and did not mean it. But I think if I had time I could show a great many instances.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hopes the gentleman from Pennsylvania will state some instance when the Chair has not been consistent in his ruling. Otherwise he hopes the gentleman from Pennsylvania, after examination, will state to the House that he was in error.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I think the Chair will admit that he has always decided that a gentleman to whom the floor is assigned by the Chair holds it for an hour, and that the yielding of it to other members is to be regarded, under the rules, as a portion of his own remarks. That is all I am contending for.

The SPEAKER. That does not apply to this case at all. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] suspended his point of order until an explanation had been made by the gentleman from Kansas. It was a point opposed to the bill, obviously not at all in the line of the point which the gentleman from Pennsylvania now makes.

Mr. SCOFIELD. Still the gentleman might yield a portion of his time to somebody else to explain.

Mr. PAGE. I certainly have no desire, and I think no member of the committee has any desire, to press this bill, if a point of order against it be considered sufficient by the Speaker to send it to the Committee of the Whole. It is a bill which members of the Committee on Mines and Mining present to the House in the belief that it is meritorious, and ought to pass. Representing in part the State of California on this floor, I wish to say that the bill now under consideration has been discussed by all the newspapers published in the mining counties of my State, and, with a single exception, has been cordially approved by them.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WARD] says that this bill, if it becomes a law, will throw all the placer-mining lands of California into the hands of corporations; that it will prevent the honest miner from mining, as he has done in years past. Why, sir, this bill does not change the present law as to quantity, or as to the manner of acquiring title under local mining laws. It simply provides for reversing the present ruling of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, under which lands upon which there is no bona fide mining claim are presumed to be mineral lands. I know of no reason and no logic by which five counties in my State should be withdrawn from homestead and pre-emption entry simply because there may have been a mine there, or might be in the future. I do not recognize the policy of continuing a law that compels the people of the mining regions of California to pay five times the Government value of their lands in the form of expenses for obtaining title to the same.

The existing law provides that no person or association of persons can take one hundred and sixty acres of placer-mining lands. This bill makes a change in this single particular: that one person may obtain a title to one hundred and sixty acres of the public lands where no bona fide placer-mining claim exists.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Illinois claims to know a great deal about mines in California. Why, sir, it is true that he has introduced into this House a bill on the subject; and one of my colleagues has been hung in effigy on the supposition that it was his bill. As a Representative of California, I believe I am disposed to guard the interests of that State as carefully as is the gentleman from Illinois. I know very well the necessities of that community. I know that the people of the mining districts demand the passage of this bill. I know that it will not prevent any miner from going upon any of the unoccupied public lands, discovering mines there, and holding them, as he does now, under the local mining law. But it will prevent this wholesale withdrawal of public lands from homestead and pre-emption entry, unless they are proved to be mining lands; and there is no better proof of the fact that lands contain valuable placer mines than the existence thereon of a bona fide mine.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Speaker, I have not considered this question as carefully as I should have been glad to do had I appreciated its importance; but looking at the bill hastily, since it has been brought before the House, I am satisfied that it involves a reversal of the policy of the Government as to mineral lands; and I trust that it will receive ample consideration before it shall be finally acted upon. Therefore, if opportunity offers, I shall move to refer it to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, that it may be fully considered.

I have believed for years that the tardy development of our Pacific coast results from the holding of land purely agricultural in very large tracts. I remember to have ridden through a farm there of 30,000 acres, with its own roads and its own villages, and to have heard of other farms of 20,000 acres and more. My observation in three several visits to the Pacific coast has satisfied me of the fact I have indicated, that the progress of development in that region is retarded by the concentration of large tracts of land in the grasp of a few hands. This bill, on its face, seems to remedy that evil, and in that view would invite my sympathy and the approval of my judgment. But upon examination it is found to relate not merely to agricultural lands, but also to mineral lands. If it should become a law, these lands will be taken up, under many names, to be concentrated in a few hands. It will open the way to all the large capitalists and corporations of California and the Pacific coast to employ mere creatures to possess themselves of homesteads, which shall be surrendered for a nominal consideration to those who hold the mineral lands of that coast. At least, sir, these are fears that oppress me.

Mr. PAGE. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him a moment?

Mr. KELLEY. I have but five minutes. I am trying to plead for such a disposition of the bill that the gentleman and myself, as well as other members, may have the fullest opportunity for discussion. I therefore ask that the final result to-day shall be the reference of this bill to the Committee of the Whole, so the gentleman from California may have the amplest opportunity to convince the House my fears are unfounded; and, if they be well founded, that I and others may press them upon the House. I simply ask (and I do not wish to be discourteous to the gentleman from California) such reference be given the bill that he may have ample time to show all its merits to the House; and if they be as great as he seems to indicate, he will doubtless prevail and carry the bill.

Mr. LOWE. I now yield for five minutes to the gentleman from Nevada.

Mr. KENDALL. Mr. Speaker, I think I may say, with all deference to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY,] who has just resumed his seat, that I know something in regard to the present condition of the mineral lands of the State of California over which this bill is intended to take effect; for gentlemen will see it applies exclusively to that State. Now, it has been my fortune to have been a resident of that State for many years, and during a great part of that time to have been engaged in the occupation of mining in the placer-mineral sections. I therefore think I can say very properly that I have some little knowledge of the wants and requirements of the people of that section, and of the condition of the mineral lands of that part of the country.

Now, sir, what is the condition of the mineral lands—the placer-mineral lands of California? They have been examined, dug up, and turned—prospected, as the term is there—for the last quarter of a century. All over that extensive mineral belt, which extends among the foot-hills of the Sierra Nevada, bands of eager and adventurous prospectors have scoured the entire region for twenty-five years past. I assume that in that period of time they have discovered and have worked out, or are now working out, all the placer of any value—all the placer-mineral lands worth occupation and profitable for mining. If my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] should go over that extensive mineral belt, as I did last summer, and see the utter lack of thrift and permanent improvement—mining claims and machinery and cabins abandoned and desolate; see the stagnation of industry, while around is a soil ready to spring into fruitfulness, and over all is the finest climate in the world—he would be made painfully aware of the condition of affairs that makes a law of the kind proposed a necessity.

To the question, what is the cause of all this want of enterprise and industry, of improvement, and of permanence in homes, and all the social institutions of society, the answer would be seen around him. The gentleman would hear it from the first person with whom he entered into conversation. The answer would be found in the single consideration—true in all ages and in every country—the people have no certain title to the land upon which they dwell. This land is exhausted of its precious metals. Why not let it be owned in fee by its possessors and made the seat of happy homes; of gardens and vineyards and farms and cultivated fields?

I affirm that the people throughout that great extent of country—the miners themselves, agriculturists, horticulturists, men of every class and occupation—all desire that they may have some certain title to these lands upon which they dwell; not that they may work the lands in mining operations, for that is not what they desire, but only that they may cultivate their gardens and their farms without fear of molestation; that they may build up for themselves secure, comfortable, quiet homes. Why, sir, that whole region is to-day infinitely more valuable for the cultivation of vineyards than all the gold which may be contained in its alluvial deposits. Allow that people, occupying this mineral section, to obtain secure title to their homesteads, and then you will have there a fixed, instead of a nomadic, population; instead of bands of roving prospectors, having no fixed place of abode, you will see schools and farm-houses, roads constructed, trees planted, cultivation everywhere.

Now, Mr. Speaker, these in general are the reasons why I advocate the bill here, and why I supported it in the Committee on Mines and Mining, of which I have the honor to be a member.

I believe this bill as applicable to California is demanded by the entire people of that State. It is demanded by the miners themselves. If I am to judge from the tone of the press I must be convinced of the fact that the bill is desired by the whole people.

While I do not think that the provisions of a bill like this ought to apply to a new mining section of country, while I do not think it would be advisable to apply them to our mining Territories where the placer mines are still in a great measure productive, yet I do think in these old mining sections of California, which are so utterly and thoroughly exhausted, that a law like this will work great benefit to the people and to all concerned.

It has been said by my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] that this will allow these mineral lands to be taken up and absorbed in large tracts by speculators. I say no. How is it now under the mining law already on your statute-book? Placer-mining lands may be taken up in tracts of twenty acres to each individual. A company of eight persons associated together can take now up one hundred and sixty acres of placer-mining lands, as the gentleman well knows.

Mr. LOWE. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON.]

Mr. KASSON. I wish to call the attention of the gentlemen who advo cate this bill, and of the members of the House generally, to this fact, that it is only a few days since we abolished the law authorizing the pre-emption of the public lands, so far as a vote of this House is concerned. This bill includes a restoration of the pre-emption law touching all the public lands of California having any relation to placer mines. And if nothing else existed in the bill to render it obnoxious to the adverse judgment of this House, I think the restoration of the pre-emption provision should do so. I refer to the seventh line of the first section of the substitute, in connection with the first words of the section—

> That public lands in the State of California, other than those containing veins or lodes of quartz or other rock in place, &c., shall not be excluded as mineral from pre-emption or homestead entry, unless it shall be shown that bona fide mining claims exist thereon, or that the land is necessary for outlet or other mining easements, &c.

A subsequent provision also contemplates the sale of these lands, by fixing the price at $1.25 per acre. I appeal to the gentleman from Kansas, [Mr. LOWE,] who I know sympathizes with me in the effort to keep the lands of the United States, mining or otherwise, from the grasp and grab of speculators, either to allow this bill to go to the Committee of the Whole, or else to allow it to be amended here and now in this respect.

Of course I have no time, in the few moments allowed me, to speak of the general mining policy of the United States. I have studied it, and been extremely interested in it, and desire, whenever the opportunity offers, to assist in putting our mining system on the only basis on which, in any country, it can be made to flourish; and that is, to let the men have the mines who will work them, and when they cease to work them let them be restored to the Government, and go back to the use of the people whenever anybody shall undertake to work them. But for the present, I have merely desired to call the attention of the House to this restoration of the pre-emption law.

Mr. LOWE. In reply to the suggestion of the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON,] in reference to the section of the bill which fixes a price on agricultural as well as placer-mineral lands, I will say that this bill was matured in committee before the passage of the new homestead bill, which has been referred to by the gentleman.

And to make this bill correspondent with the now understood sentiment of the House on that subject, I shall consent to the striking out of the word "agricultural," so that this shall merely fix the price for placer-mineral lands.

Mr. KASSON. But why should that be retained in regard to the placer-mineral lands?

Mr. LOWE. The opposition to this bill seems to be predicated on the idea which has been urged both by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] and the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. WARD,] that this legislation would be in the interest of monopolies, and against the humble miners and agriculturists of the West. Certainly no man on this floor would be less disposed than myself to stand here and advocate any such legislation. The fact is that this bill is in the interest of those small miners of the West who have not facilities nor the capital to enter upon those large mining operations which are conducted by the wealthy corporations of the mining regions. Both the agriculturists and the small miners are in constant trouble and constant terror from day to day by reason of the conflict of interest between the agricultural settlers and the great mining interests. It is to do away with that conflict; it is to place them upon the same basis; it is to give an opportunity for the natural and gradual development of industry and wealth, that the committee agree to this bill.

Sir, it is said that this will give opportunities for great companies and wealthy men to grasp the mining resources and obtain possession of the mining localities of California. To the extent which it is possible that has already been accomplished. The question of fact upon which the propriety of the passage of this bill is depending has been the subject of careful inquiry on the part of the Committee on Mines and Mining and of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and the result of that inquiry is that these placer-mining localities have been so far exhausted or already purchased that there is nothing remaining of them in that State which is of greater value than the agricultural lands themselves. The very question which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WARD] have so strongly urged has especially attracted the serious attention of the committee, and in conversation and communication with the Commissioner of the General Land Office, whose attention had been particularly directed to this question, he said that his examination of the subject, his conversation with those familiar with it, the records of evidence in contested claims, all show that, as far as the mineral resources of the placer mines of California are concerned, they have been either exhausted or purchased and titles acquired under existing law, and that the distinction between placer-mining lands and agricultural lands ought now to be abolished.

The question occurred to us as to the application of this bill to other States and Territories, and it was the opinion of the committee and of the Commissioner of the General Land Office that, while this measure was appropriate to the State of California, it would not be an appropriate method of legislation for those States and Territories which had not been so thoroughly prospected and exhausted as the State of California has been.

Now, Mr. Speaker, inasmuch as I have been appealed to by gentlemen here especially interested in this bill, I am willing that the bill shall take the widest scope for discussion, for I believe that the better it is understood the more strength it will have; and I now move that it be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was referred; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

WATER FOR NEVADA.

Mr. KENDALL, from the Committee on Mines and Mining, reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 988) to provide for a board of commissioners to report a system for obtaining water for mining and agricultural purposes in the valleys of the State of Nevada; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

MINERAL LANDS IN MISSOURI AND KANSAS.

Mr. LOWE, from the same committee, reported (as a substitute for House bill No. 930) a bill (H. R. No. 2543) relating to mineral lands in the States of Missouri and Kansas; which was read a first and second time.

The bill provides that within the States of Missouri and Kansas deposits or mines of iron and coal shall be excluded from the operation of the act entitled "An act to promote the development of the mining resources of the United States," approved May 10, 1872, and that said act shall not apply to the mineral lands situate and being within the said States. It provides further that said lands shall be declared free and open to exploration and purchase according to the legal subdivisions thereof as before the passage of the said act, and that any bona fide entries of such lands within the said States since the passage thereof may be patented, without reference to the provisions of said act.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I hope the gentleman from Kansas will give us some explanation of this bill.

Mr. LOWE. The bill is very simple and plain upon its face. It exempts the States of Missouri and Kansas from the operation of the mining act of 1872. That act was enacted for the express purpose of providing for the disposition of public lands containing valuable minerals, such as gold, silver, cinnabar, &c. At the last session of Congress an act was passed, of which this is almost a transcript, excepting the States of Michigan, Wisconsin, and Minnesota, from the operations of the act of 1872. I understand that my friend from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] now desires that Iowa shall be included in this bill, and I have no objection to its being placed in the bill.

Mr. KASSON. The gentleman from Kansas is mistaken. I did not ask him to include the State of Iowa; I asked him to make some explanation of the bill, for it seemed a remarkable one that applies to two States only.

Mr. LOWE. As I have said, it has already been applied to the States of Michigan, Wisconsin, and Minnesota.

Mr. LAWRENCE. How will the coal and iron lands be disposed of in Missouri and Kansas, if this bill shall pass?

Mr. LOWE. Just as they were before the act of 1872 was passed. No inconvenience, no trouble, whatever, is apprehended or has ever existed. The object of this bill is to leave those States which do not contain valuable mineral lands exactly as they were before the act of 1872 was passed.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Will the gentleman state how the lands are to be disposed of?

Mr. LOWE. Generally, under the homestead and pre-emption law.

Mr. LAWRENCE. They are liable to pre-emption?

Mr. LOWE. They are. I now call for a vote on the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. LOWE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Mr. NEGLEY, from the Committee on Mines and Mining, reported back adversely the following bills, which were laid on the table:

A bill (H. R. No. 405) relating to the entry of homesteads and pre-emptions in California; and

A bill (H. R. No. 1601) to repeal the fifth section of the act entitled "An act to promote the development of the mining resources of the United States," approved May 10, 1872.

ASSAY OFFICE, HELENA, MONTANA.

Mr. HARRIS, of Georgia, from the Committee on Mines and Mining, reported back House bill No. 998 to establish an assay office at Helena, in the Territory of Montana, and moved that the committee be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures.

The motion was agreed to.

MINING CLAIMS.

Mr. PAGE, from the Committee on Mines and Mining, reported back, with an amendment, Senate bill No. 16, supplemental to the act entitled "An act to promote the development of the mining resources of the United States," approved May 10, 1872.

The Senate bill was read.

The first section provides that where applications for patents for mining claims have been filed in the proper district land office, and legal notice thereof given without the appearance of an adverse claimant, and in which cases no further proceedings have been had for the purpose of perfecting title, such applicants shall make final proof and payment on said claims within one year from the date of the passage of this act; and in cases of like applications for patents hereafter filed, the applicants shall, in the absence of an adverse claim during the notice, make said final proof and payment within one year from the date of filing such application, in default of which the proceedings for patent so had by such applicants shall be considered void and without effect.

The second section provides that all affidavits required to be made under this act, the act to which this is supplemental, or the act to which said act is amendatory, may be verified before any officer authorized to administer oaths, and all testimony and proofs may be taken before any such officer, and when duly certified by the officer taking the same shall have the same force and effect as if taken before the register and the receiver of the district land office; provided that when such affidavit or proofs are taken at any place other than within the land district, it shall be by the clerk of any court of record in the United States.

The amendment reported from the committee was to strike out the second section, and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

That all ex parte affidavits and proofs required by law to be made before the local land officers in mining or pre-emption cases may be taken before any officer authorized to administer oaths in the land district where the claim may be situate, or out of such district before the judge or clerk of any court of record; and in all cases of contest the testimony or proofs required may be taken before any clerk of a court of record in the land district where the claim may be situate, on personal notice of at least ten days to the opposing party, or if said opposing party cannot be found, then by publication of at least once a week for thirty days in a newspaper to be designated by the register of the land office as published nearest to the location of such mine; and the register shall require proof that such notice has been given; and such evidence and proof, when filed with the register and the receiver, shall have the same effect as if taken before those officers: Provided, That in such contest-cases the testimony of a witness residing out of the land district may be taken in the county of his residence in the mode herein prescribed. Effect shall be given to this act by regulations to be prescribed by the Commissioner of the General Land Office.

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire to offer an amendment to the first section of this bill.

Mr. PAGE. I cannot yield for any amendment.

Mr. NEGLEY. I understood my colleague on the committee [Mr. PAGE] to agree to permit me to offer an amendment.

Mr. PAGE. I will allow it to be read.

Mr. NEGLEY. I desire to offer an amendment to the first section; which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read Mr. NEGLEY's amendment (intended to come in after that proposed by Mr. HOLMAN) as follows:

And provided further, That all persons, companies, or corporations owning veins or mines on said Comstock lode shall make application for patents within six months from the date of the passage of this act, and, in the absence of a bona fide adverse claim during the notice, make final proof and payment and file a receipt for such patents in the same manner as hereinafter provided within six months from the date of filing such application, or, if already filed, from the date of the passage of this act; and in default thereof, or in default of filing with the register of the land office at Carson City in all cases where patents have already been issued, an acknowledgment of the receipt of such patent subject to the conditions therein contained within ninety days from the passage of this act, such claims or mines shall be open to relocation by other parties in the same manner as if no location of the same had ever been made, always subject, however, to the conditions of the Sutro Tunnel act, approved July 25, 1866.

Mr. PAGE. I have no objection to that amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire to amend the first section by adding what I send to the Clerk's desk to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided further, That nothing herein contained shall affect or make void the proceedings for patents had by applicants for claims or mines in the Comstock lode in the State of Nevada, nor shall it be construed to repeal, impair, or in any way affect the provisions of the act granting to A. Sutro the right of way and other privileges to aid in the construction of a draining and exploring tunnel in the Comstock lode in the State of Nevada, approved July 25, 1866.

Mr. PAGE. I have no objection to that amendment.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the amendments will be considered as adopted.

Mr. KENDALL. I wish to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. NEGLEY] to explain the purpose and object of the amendment which he has offered. It goes on to state that certain parties shall be required to make application for certain mining claims. What is the object of making these requirements of parties who may be in possession of mining claims, whether they desire to perfect their titles or not? I make the inquiry merely for information.

Mr. NEGLEY. The object of the amendment is simply to prevent mining companies from holding title to lands and depriving the Government of the revenue to be derived from payment for the patents. The object is to prevent such companies from permitting their titles to lapse and then taking them up again, thus, perhaps, interfering with the vested rights of others. It is a very simple proposition, merely a restriction for the protection of rights guaranteed by a previous act of Congress.

Mr. KENDALL. Inasmuch as this amendment proposes to change entirely the features and character of the bill, I shall insist, as a member of the Committee on Mines and Mining, that if the amendment is pressed the bill shall go to the Committee of the Whole or be recommitted for a more complete consideration of this provision. If gentlemen will look for a moment at the phraseology of this amendment, they will see that it may be very sweeping and dangerous in its scope. Why, sir, the Comstock lode has yielded $200,000,000 since it was first opened. That lode is now in possession, to a large extent, of certain mining companies. This amendment proposes to compel these companies now in possession of that mining property to come forward and make application for patents to their mining claims within six months, and perfect their title, whether they desire to do so or not.

Now, upon examination I may be in favor of this amendment. It may be all right. But as one member of the Committee on Mines and Mining, I am not willing to stand in my place here and legislate hastily and loosely upon interests of such vast magnitude. I ask gentlemen to pause and consider before they act hastily upon this amendment. I for one want time to consider a proposition of such moment; and unless the gentleman having charge of the bill will allow it to go to the Committee of the Whole for further consideration, I move its recommitment.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. The morning hour has expired, I believe. This is evidently a matter that will occupy further time.

Mr. KASSON. I ask that the amendments be printed, in order that we may have them before us to-morrow morning.

Mr. POTTER. What amendments?

Mr. KASSON. The amendments to the Senate bill. Let them all be printed.

Mr. SPEER. I raise the point of order whether a gentleman having charge of a bill can accept an amendment when any other member of his committee objects. As I understand, the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. KENDALL] objects to this amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state the position of the bill. The gentleman from California [Mr. PAGE] reported a bill and admitted an amendment of the gentleman from Indiana, and one of the gentleman from Pennsylvania. The Chair, thinking there was no objection, declared that the amendments would be considered as agreed to; but if the House did not so understand, the amendments had better be regarded as still pending. The same result could of course be reached by reconsidering the vote on adopting the amendments.

Mr. PAGE. I stated that if the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. KENDALL] did not object to the amendment, I had no objection to it.

The SPEAKER. The amendments will be regarded as pending; and if there be no objection all the amendments will be ordered to be printed.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. NEGLEY. What are we to understand as the position of the bill?

The SPEAKER. The bill is pending, and will come up the first thing in the morning hour to-morrow; the question being upon the several amendments.

Mr. NEGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I regret very much that the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. KENDALL] should claim so much from the courtesy of the House. My amendment was offered and read at the desk; its terms are very simple; and I do not understand why, simply because he is a member of the Committee on Mines and Mining, the gentleman from Nevada should object to any gentleman on this floor offering an amendment of this kind openly, and having it accepted, as this was, by the gentleman from California [Mr. PAGE] in charge of the bill; and when such an amendment has been agreed to, to ask that the question should be reopened and the amendment be considered as still pending. It is, I think, asking a great deal.

Mr. KENDALL. I disclaim most distinctly and unequivocally all intention of discourtesy toward my friend from Pennsylvania; but upon a measure of this importance, involving, as it unquestionably may, millions of dollars to my fellow-citizens and my constituency, I will not consent to this unseemly haste.

Mr. KELLEY. Does not the objection, as to hasty legislation, apply to the whole bill?

Mr. NEGLEY. The argument of the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. KENDALL] would be my argument in support of the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has expired.

OFFICERS AND CREW OF THE SHIP WYOMING.

Mr. MYERS, by unanimous consent, reported back from the Committee on Naval Affairs the bill (H. R. No. 782) for the relief of the officers and crew of the United States ship Wyoming, and the Ta Kiang; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

PLACER-MINING LANDS IN CALIFORNIA.

Mr. LOWE. I ask that the bill reported by me, relating to placer-mining lands in the State of California, be ordered to be printed.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

NAVIGATION OF THE POTOMAC RIVER.

Mr. RICE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2544) to secure unobstructed navigation on the Potomac River; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. RICE. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and be ordered to be printed.

Mr. NEGLEY. The bill should be referred to the Committee on Commerce. It relates to the navigation of one of our rivers.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. Allow me to say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. NEGLEY] that this bill refers to the obstruction to navigation by the Potomac bridge. Counsel and parties have been heard very fully on this subject before the Committee on the District of Columbia, and as the question has received a great deal of consideration from that committee, I hope that this bill will be referred to them.

Mr. NEGLEY. It is not my purpose at all to antagonize the bill; but I desire to reserve to the Committee on Commerce its rights in regard to the question of bridges upon the navigable streams of the United States.

Mr. RICE. This subject has been very fully considered by the Committee on the District of Columbia, and a report upon it has been prepared. It is the object of the committee to bring the bill before the House on Friday next and ask its passage, as the time has now arrived when the passage of such a measure is necessary, as every one must see who is acquainted with the subject.

Mr. NEGLEY. No legislation has been passed by this House for a number of years which has imposed so much hardship upon navigation interests as the construction of bridges across navigable streams. It has imposed on the sub-committee of the Committee on Commerce a labor few gentlemen in the House are aware of. I beg of gentlemen (and I make the request in no querulous mood) to allow the Committee on Commerce to offer their bills with such amendments as experience and the recommendation of the Engineer Department may propose.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. Allow me to say that the whole matter of obstruction in the Potomac River has been fully heard before the Committee on the District of Columbia. That committee has had eminent engineers before them. They have had witnesses and counsel before them. They have had a sub-committee appointed to consider the question in every point of view. That committee has been examining it for a month. It seems to me, therefore, that committee, with the report of engineers before them, having heard witnesses and counsel, having considered it, and being now ready to report, should have the consideration of the bill introduced by the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. NEGLEY. Let the gentleman agree to the proposition I suggested, that this bill shall be referred now to the Committee on Commerce, and I will agree they shall consider it in time to act on it and make such disposition as their judgment may determine.

Mr. RICE. Then I understand there is no objection to the bill being referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The bill was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

AMENDMENT TO PENSION LAWS.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I am instructed by the Committee on Invalid Pensions to report back a bill to amend section 1 of an act entitled "An act to revise, consolidate, and amend the Army and Navy pension laws," approved March 3, 1873.

Mr. McCRARY. Has the morning hour expired?

The SPEAKER. It has.

Mr. McCRARY. I demand the regular order of business.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. McCRARY] claims the floor to proceed with the consideration of the transportation bill, and the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. STARKWEATHER,] representing the Committee on Appropriations, desires to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the legislative, executive, and judicial bill. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HYDE] desires both to be postponed in order that he may call up the contested-election case of the fourth congressional district of Georgia. The question will first be on the motion of the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. STARKWEATHER] that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. Mr. Speaker, it is now four weeks since the Committee on Appropriations have been allowed to have the floor for the purpose of getting forward with their appropriation bills. They have for four weeks held back in order to give opportunities for the prosecution of other business, and especially for the consideration of the transportation bill. It is now necessary we should have business sent over to the Senate, and we think that this important appropriation bill, the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, which has now been waiting for four weeks, shall be taken up and passed, and sent over to the Senate.

I therefore suggest to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. McCRARY] that we be allowed to-day to go forward with this appropriation bill. The chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. GARFIELD] has requested me to say that he is earnestly anxious this appropriation bill should make some progress.

Inasmuch as the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. McCRARY,] chairman of the Committee on Railways and Canals, has already taken up much time with his bill during the last two weeks, I trust he will now allow us to make some progress with the appropriation bills. I am aware there is great interest taken in the bill reported from the Committee on Railways and Canals. I am also aware that those who are interested in that bill can vote down any other matter of business if they choose to do so. I am aware they can vote down any motion to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on an appropriation bill; but I hope they will allow us to proceed with this business to-day; and if we take it up it will be out of the way in a little while, or we will have evening sessions for one committee or the other. I therefore move, in view of the long delay we have had, and at the earnest solicitation of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, to take up the appropriation bill. The business of the country requires it. The Senate are now waiting for us to send bills over to them.

Mr. McCRARY. I wish to say, if the consideration of the special order is continued with without interruption, I think we shall reach a vote, at the farthest, by day after to-morrow. This appropriation bill will requre considerable time. I see no possible reason for pressing it to the exclusion of all other business. The country is not suffering for the passage of the bill at all. It does not take effect, even if it be passed, until July next. The passage of appropriation bills is something Congress must attend to before they adjourn. We have considered this special order for several weeks; we are almost through with it, and I do not think it should be laid aside for the purpose of entering upon a discussion of this appropriation bill, which will continue for a long time.

I am sure the Senate will find something to do for a considerable time, even if we send them no bill whatever. I hope the House will vote down the motion to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, in order that we may dispose of this bill as soon as possible. I propose to have a session this evening, and with that I think we can conclude the debate to-morrow, or, at the farthest, by the morning of the next day.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. It is true the appropriation bills must be passed before Congress adjourns. There are twelve of them; we have disposed of three in the House, and there are nine left. If we delay the appropriation bills until the close of the session we will have the same trouble we have had in former years. They will be hurried through committees of conference on the very last days of the session, and will be swelled largely in their amounts. A great deal of wrong legislation will be passed by them, and the country will be put to a serious disadvantage by the delay. This ought to go through in season so that it may be passed in an unobjectionable form.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HYDE] desires to have a day set apart for the consideration of the contested-election case in the first congressional district of Georgia.

Mr. HYDE. I desire to suggest Thursday of this week.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I wish to say——

The SPEAKER. The Chair would suggest that it is not desirable to consume a great deal of time in settling the order of business. Some bills might be disposed of in the time occupied in discussions as to precedence. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HYDE] requests that the consideration of the Georgia election case be assigned for Thursday of this week. Is there objection?

Mr. McCRARY. I must object to that. I do not know that the consideration of the transportation bill will be finished by that time.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs, Will the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill?

The question being taken, there were—ayes 66, noes 64; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. STARKWEATHER, and Mr. WILSON of Iowa, were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 78, noes 77.

So the House agreed to go into Committee of the Whole on the legislative appropriation bill.

EVENING SESSION FOR DEBATE.

Mr. McCRARY. I ask that, by unanimous consent, there be a session for debate only on the transportation bill (H. R. No. 1385) this evening.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

COMMISSIONERS OF CLAIMS.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I ask unanimous consent to have the evenings of Monday and Tuesday of next week assigned for the consideration of House bill No. 1565, relating to the commissioners of claims.

Mr. MERRIAM. I object.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. BROWN, by unanimous consent, obtained two weeks' leave of absence, on account of sickness in his family.

Mr. WILSHIRE, by unanimous consent, obtained leave of absence for twenty days, on account of sickness in his family.

Mr. THOMAS, of Virginia, by unanimous consent, obtained leave of absence for a fortnight.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

The House then resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. WOODFORD in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the special order, being the bill (H. R. No. 2064) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. KELLOGG] has still five minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. KELLOGG. As the House kindly gave me leave last Saturday to close my remarks, I will waive my right.

On motion of Mr. STARKWEATHER, the first reading of the bill was dispensed with.

The Clerk proceeded to read the bill by paragraphs, for amendment.

The following paragraph was read, under the head "Senate:"

For compensation of the officers, clerks, messengers, and others receiving an annual salary in the service of the Senate, namely: Secretary of the Senate, $4,320; officer charged with disbursements of the Senate, $576; chief clerk, $3,000, and the additional sum of $1,000 while the said office is held by the present incumbent, and no longer; principal clerk, principal executive clerk, minute and Journal clerk, and financial clerk, in the office of the Secretary of the Senate, $2,592 each; librarian and seven clerks in the office of the Secretary of the Senate, at $2,220 each; keeper of the stationery, $2,102.40; two messengers, at $1,296 each; one page, at $720; Sergeant-at-Arms and Door-keeper, $4,320: Provided, That hereafter he shall receive, directly or indirectly, no fees or other compensation or emolument whatever for performing the duties of the office, or in connection therewith, otherwise than as aforesaid; assistant door-keeper, $2,592; acting assistant door-keeper, $2,592; Postmaster to the Senate, $2,100; assistant postmaster and mail-carrier, $1,728; two mail-carriers, at $1,200 each; superintendent of document room, $1,800; two assistants in document room, at $1,440 each; superintendent of the folding-room, $2,160; three messengers, acting as assistant door-keepers, at $1,800 each; twenty messengers, to be appointed and removed by the Sergeant-at-Arms, with the approval of the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, at $1,440 each; secretary to the Vice-President, $2,102.40; clerk to the Committee on Finance, $2,220; clerk to the Committee on Claims, $2,220; clerk of printing records, $2,220; clerk to the Committee on Appropriations, $2,220; one laborer in charge of private passage, $864; one laborer in stationery-room, $864; one special policeman, $1,000; Chaplain to the Senate, $900; chief engineer, $2,160; three assistant engineers, at $1,440 each; two firemen, at $1,095 each; three laborers, $730 each; making in all, $124,680.80.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I wish to make an inquiry of the gentleman of the Committee on Appropriations who has charge of this bill, and with that view move to strike out in the twenty-eighth line, "$1,296," and insert in lieu thereof "$840;" so that it will read, "two messengers at $840 each."

I wish to inquire why the messengers who are appointed here for the Senate, and who are paid by salary, are paid at higher rates than the messengers which this bill provides for the various Departments, and who are paid $840 a year, as will be found in subsequent portions of the bill. The messengers for the Departments are paid $840, while the messengers for the Senate, it is provided, shall be paid $1,296; and a little further on in the bill there are provided messengers for the House of Representatives at $1,440. My inquiry is why there is this difference in the salaries that are paid to the messengers around the Capitol and the messengers for the various Departments?

Mr. STARKWEATHER. The messengers designated here for the Senate are door-keepers.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. The salaries are by the year.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. The amount of the salary is what it has heretofore been. There is no increase at all, and we have been in the habit of allowing the Senate to fix the salaries of their employés.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. The amount is still larger for the House.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. To attend to the doors of this House and of the Senate requires a man of more talent than to be a messenger at one of the Departments, whose duty it may be to carry a paper from one room to another, or to bring in a little wood for the fires.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. The item I am referring to is for "messengers," not "door-keepers."

Mr. STARKWEATHER. There are a certain number of doors at which messengers are placed. Whatever the number is that number must be provided, and the bill in that respect is precisely as it has been heretofore.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I understand that; and that is the reason why I made this inquiry.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. The men who take charge of these doors require to have more talent, and ought to have more salary, than the mere messengers of the Departments. We have not increased the amount, but we have thought the amount heretofore paid reasonable, taking into consideration the amount of service that is done.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I only desire to call attention to this consideration. It was understood when this bill was brought in—I certainly understood from the speech made by the chairman of the committee when reporting the bill—that vigorous efforts had been made upon the part of the committee to reduce expenses, and that they had looked at every point where expenses could be reduced.

They have in some cases, I believe, in the Departments, away from the Capitol, reduced the force, and in some other cases, perhaps, reduced the compensation; but when it comes here at home, in our own household, where it seems to me economy might properly enough begin, if it is to begin at all, where we have the whole control of it, and it is for members of the House to say for themselves and members of the Senate to say for themselves what the compensation shall be, we provide here for salaries for messengers nearly twice as large as what are given in the Departments, and as the gentleman from Connecticut has said, these messengers here are not employed the entire year, but only twelve months out of the twenty-four months of each Congress; and yet they are paid for that twelve months' service three times as much as messengers are paid in the Executive Departments for twenty-four months' service.

Now, I am not saying that these messengers are not important; I suppose they are. These door-keepers are important, of course, to attend the doors, and it needs judgment to attend to them properly; but they should not then be classed as messengers, and we should not maintain this inequality in the pay of messengers. If it requires a higher grade of ability, and therefore should be accompanied by a higher grade of compensation, to provide messengers for the House and Senate than it does for the Departments, why then it is very proper to say so.

But in this connection I desire to call attention to another provision of the bill, to show what seems to me to be inequality in the adjustment of these salaries.

Mr. HOLMAN. I rise to oppose the amendment, and I yield my time to the gentleman from Vermont.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Here on the fourth page is a provision giving the chief engineer of the Capitol $2,160, and three assistant engineers $1,440 each. I find on page 15, under the head of the "Treasury Department," a provision for one engineer at $1,600. Here is our chief engineer paid $2,160. Now, the engineer here is not obliged to be employed during more than twelve months in every two years. I presume he is only employed while Congress is in session, and yet he is paid over $2,000, while the engineer of the Treasury Department, who has, I suppose, as responsible a position and certainly has a larger building to see to, is paid only $1,000, or about $1,000 less than we pay our engineer.

Now, if these inequalities can be justified by showing that we require a higher grade of ability to perform these duties, why very well. If it requires a higher grade of ability to be an engineer about this Capitol than in the Treasury Department, why very well, let it be so understood; or if it requires a higher grade of ability to be an assistant engineer here, very well, let it be understood. But unless it does, then this is a species of favoritism. It is because members wish to favor the officers about this House and about the Capitol. And the same thing runs all through the bill. It attaches just as much to the Capitol police as it does to the other officers and to the watchmen about the Capitol, for they are paid a larger salary than watchmen at the Treasury Department, who have a vastly greater interest in charge, if a watchman has any interest in charge in either place. It runs through the entire bill, and every official about this House, and the Senate, and the Capitol, is paid a larger sum, in some cases almost twice as great a sum, as officials of the same class are paid in other Departments.

Now, this must either be owing to a species of favoritism—because many of these officials are personal friends of members, and we come in daily contact with them, and so are ready to give them freely of the public money—or else because it requires a higher measure of ability.

The gentleman says it has been so for many years; but that is no reason why it should continue to be so, unless the original inequality was justified by some principle or by some facts that rendered it necessary. If it is necessary that the officers about this Capitol shall be of a higher grade and shall have higher pay in order to procure officials to do the duty, let it be explained. If it is necessary, in order to procure proper officials, that they should be paid larger sums than are paid to officials in other Departments, who have to work twelve months, while most of these officials have to work, on an average, only six months a year, why let it be explained, so that it can go on record, and it may be understood that we are not doing this because these officers are our own servants, and not as a matter of favoritism; but on account of the importance of the duties they perform, which entitles them to a higher reward than others.

I have called attention to this matter for this purpose: members of the Committee on Appropriations have assured the House that they have gone zealously into the work of reducing expenses, cutting off every unnecessary dollar of expenditure in this bill. Now, if they are prepared to give no better reason for continuing this inequality of salaries than the fact that it has been so hitherto, it seems to me that they certainly have not been very thorough in their attempt at reform in this matter of salaries. It does seem to me possible that the salaries of these officials may be graded with some regard to the salaries of similar officials in other Departments.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I am very glad to hear all these suggestions. This matter was considered very thoroughly in the committee. I will refer now to the matter of the engineers, spoken of by the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. WILLARD.] He suggests that the engineer in charge here need be here but a portion of the time. He is mistaken, for the engineer is required to be here constantly, even when Congress is not in session, to take care of the machinery in his charge. If any one will take the pains to inquire, he will find that the engineer here, operating in the vaults of this Capitol, with people constantly going through his rooms, must be here day and night, (he or some of his assistants,) in a building costing some seven or eight millions, and where there is a large amount of public property. It seems to me that when we take into consideration the fact that this engineer and his assistants are employed day and night the year round, that his quarters are constantly visited by people, and that they have this important trust, they should be well paid.

We have contrasted his services and compensation with those of other engineers outside. We found that while the engineer in the Department was paid a very low compensation, the engineer and his assistants in the Capitol are not paid as much as persons holding equally responsible positions in ordinary pursuits of life. You will find many engineers, where the trust imposed upon them is not one-quarter as important as it is here, who are paid a larger sum than this engineer and his assistants. It may be that the compensation of the Department engineers is too low. But it seems to me that there is a difference in responsibility. And this machinery is more important, and it is necessary that it should be operated safely and conveniently.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Are there more people, take the year through, in the Capitol than in the Treasury Department?

Mr. STARKWEATHER. No; and there are not near as many here during the vacation to look after this great property.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. The engineer does not look after it.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. He does not look after all the property, but he looks after his department. And every man, woman, and child coming here day or night, during the session of Congress, and when it is not in session, comes here for the purpose of going over the building, and it is the duty of the engineer to be careful in his department. It is enough to say, in answer to the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. WILLARD,] that while there is some inequality in the compensation of these officers, yet the compensation of this engineer, considering the services he performs, considering the great amount of property in his charge, is much less than the compensation of persons in similar pursuits in the ordinary walks of life. He receives less than many men get elsewhere in less responsible positions.

In regard to the door-keepers and messengers, it requires almost as much talent for a messenger to keep that door there, [pointing to one of the doors of the Hall]——

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. That is an assistant door-keeper.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. Well, call him an assistant door-keeper. There are messengers in charge of the doors. The one in charge of that particular door may not be a messenger, but an assistant door-keeper. But there are messengers here attending upon members, taking messages for them, taking people to them, and performing other duties. It is important to have for such places men with some sort of gumption about them, men of ability, so to speak. Every man will not do for such a position here. In the Treasury Department any man can handle wood, carry a package, or do work of that sort. But here we must have men with good memories, some knowledge of the propriety of things, who will know what to say, and how to say it, and when to say it, and all about it. Why, sir, it requires as much talent to be a good and efficient door-keeper as it does to be the chairman of any one of half the committees of this House. [Laughter.]

Mr. STARKWEATHER. One word further. The gentleman says that we have made no reduction. Sir, let him look at the close of this bill. We have not designed to cut down the salaries of good men. We did enough of that when we gave up our own; we set a good example there. And when these men come to us and ask us to cut down their salaries below what they really earn, then we will take the matter into consideration. The most we have done has been to do away with those that were not needed. We mean to give fair pay to those that are necessary and do their work. But if there are supernumeraries, as there were in some of the Departments, three or four hundred of them, we cut them off. In that way we have reduced the appropriations in this bill some $4,000,000 below the estimates, and nearly four millions below the amount appropriated by the bill of last year. If any man can show that any of these men do not earn their pay, then cut them down. But if they do earn it, then do not let us cut down their salaries unnecessarily any more than we do our own.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on the pending amendment is exhausted.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I modify my amendment so as to make the salary $1,000.

The question being taken on the amendment as modified, there were—ayes 33, noes 35; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered, and Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont, and Mr. STARKWEATHER were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 61, noes 90.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania. In the clause relating to the mileage of Senators I move to strike out "30" and insert "20," making the appro priation $20,000, and to add the following:

That instead of the mileage now allowed, Senators shall, from the first Monday of December, 1874, be paid only the actual individual traveling expenses incurred in going to and returning from their residence to the seat of Government, by the most direct route of usual travel, once for each session of the Senate, to be certified under their hands to the disbursing officer and filed as a voucher.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I make the point of order upon this amendment that it changes existing law, and that it goes back of the paragraph to which the previous amendment was offered.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order, in the opinion of the Chair, is well taken.

Mr. HOLMAN. With the view of making a beginning, if possible, toward reducing our expenditures to something like the former standard, I move to amend by striking out "$4,320" as the salary of the Sergeant-at-Arms and Door-keeper, and inserting "$2,000."

Mr. MYERS. I make the point of order that we have passed the lines containing that appropriation.

Mr. HOLMAN. We are still on the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. As this amendment relates to the paragraph now before the committee, it seems to the Chair to be in order.

Mr. KELLOGG. I wish to ask the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] whether the law does not now fix the salary of these officers.

Mr. HOLMAN. The last act fixing their salaries, so far as I can find, was in 1866, when our currency was inflated far beyond what it is now, and when the expense of living was very much greater, and then this salary was fixed at $2,000. I propose to make this appropriation correspond to the appropriation of 1866, which fixed the compensation of these officers at $2,000. The clause in the act of 1866 is this: "Sergeant-at-Arms and Door-keeper, $2,000." I make my proposition to correspond with that legislation.

Mr. RICE. Did not the Sergeant-at-Arms at that time receive fees in addition to his salary?

Mr. HOLMAN. The act of 1866 made no provision for fees, but simply fixed the salary at $2,000. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that inasmuch as there is, at least at this time, a loudly expressed determination to press measures for retrenchment of expenditures, we should begin the work in earnest. We come now to practical results, to real action. Last session the extravagance of Congress exceeded any precedent, and if a substantial reform is in fact meant in the expenditures of the Government we must go back to a more reasonable era, and we ought to begin right here, in our own household as it were, and restore the salaries of officers of the House as they were fixed in 1866, at the close of the war, and we shall be fixing them high enough; but it is since the year 1866 the startling increase in the civil service has occurred. I presume that the same gentlemen who were employés of the two Houses are in the main still in such employments, and with the old compensation restored will still remain in the same service and discharge their duties as satisfactorily as they did then.

If there is to be real, honest retrenchment we must go back; and strange to say we do not have to go back very far to discover our departure from a reasonable expenditure, at least infinitely more reasonable than the provisions of the present bill. Going back to 1866, we find that every item embraced in this appropriation bill is heavily increased. If, then, there is an intention, as the country has been assured, to bring public expenditures down to a point at which the Government can be reasonably administered with fair economy, we must retrace our steps, not basing our legislation upon recent experience, but upon that wiser policy that prevailed only eight years ago; and this is not asking much, for even then our expenditures were exorbitant. Let us retrace our steps and make a substantial, real reform. Gentlemen have no right to indulge in brilliant speeches in favor of reform without carrying those professions into practical effect.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. Mr. Chairman, it will be observed that the salary allowed in this bill is limited by a proviso at the bottom of the page: "That hereafter he shall receive, directly or indirectly, no fees or other compensation or emolument." It is true the sum here appropriated is something more than the salary was formerly; but the fees and emoluments to which the Sergeant-at-Arms has been entitled, under even the lowest salary he ever had, would, taking one year with another, be much larger than the amount allowed this officer by the present bill—very much larger. Gentlemen will see that, by fixing the salaries and cutting off fees and emoluments, we are really doing the most economical thing that can be done.

Mr. HOLMAN. But the gentleman overlooks the salary of the Door-keeper, which was formerly $2,000, but which now by this bill is fixed at $4,320—an increase of $2,320 in the Door-keeper's salary over the amount appropriated in 1866.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. From an examination which has been made, not by myself, but by members of the Committee on Appropriations, I am satisfied that the Sergeant-at-Arms under this bill will not receive one-fourth as much as he did many years before the war, when his salary was nominally very small. In some cases his fees and emoluments were very large. The system now adopted of paying this officer a fixed salary will leave much more money in the Treasury than would the system which formerly prevailed. I do not wish to take up time, but the fact is that, upon investigation, any man can be satisfied that this is a measure of real economy.

Mr. HEREFORD. I wish to call the attention of my friend from Connecticut [Mr. STARKWEATHER] to a remark he has just made. He says that if we only look back we shall find we are paying the Sergeant-at-Arms and the Door-keeper less than we paid them several years before the war. Upon that point he is certainly in error. I find, by the civil appropriation act for 1860, there was appropriated for the Sergeant-at-Arms and Door-keeper—the same officers whose salary is now under consideration—only $2,000.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I hope the gentleman will allow me one word.

Mr. HEREFORD. I see the amount appropriated in that year for the Sergeant-at-Arms and Door-keeper was only $2,000. It was for Sergeant-at-Arms and Door-keeper $2,000, and for assistant door-keeper $1,700. That was in 1860. So my friend is mistaken when he says to the House this is less than we paid prior to the war.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. The gentleman has misunderstood me. The offices of Sergeant-at-Arms and Door-keeper were held by the same person. We not only formerly paid a salary, but we also allowed fees. We have cut off all emoluments and fees beyond $4,320 provided for the Sergeant-at-Arms and Door-keeper in this bill, which is much less than was paid before the war.

Mr. HEREFORD. I see nothing in the act of 1860 about emoluments and fees. I see there only a simple appropriation of $2,000 for Sergeant-at-Arms and Door-keeper, whereas in this bill the appropriation is more than double that amount.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. They were allowed to charge ten cents per mile for travel, and used to do it by telegraph and then charge the whole amount. In some cases the Sergeant-at-Arms's fees were more than $10,000 a year, on examination and proof. Now we hold him to perform the duty for $4,320, and he gets no extra compensation. We save the difference between $10,000 and $4,000.

Mr. HEREFORD. That is not all. The Sergeant-at-Arms and Door-keeper not only get $4,320, but we go on to provide for an assistant door-keeper $2,592, and for an acting assistant door-keeper $2,592, whereas there is no such thing in the act of 1860 either as assistant door-keeper or acting assistant door-keeper. I cannot understand what idea the committee intended to convey by this appropriation of $2,592 for assistant door-keeper and then $2,592 for acting assistant door-keeper. So that for the purpose of Sergeant-at-Arms and Door-keeper we pay by the bill now before us the sum of $9,300, whereas before the war in 1860 we only paid the amount of $2,000 for Sergeant-at-Arms and Door-keeper, and $1,700 for assistant door-keeper, nearly three times as much now as we paid then. I cannot see how my friend is sustained by law or by fact when he says it is less now than before the war. On the contrary, by the bill now before us, we are to pay nearly three times as much as we paid under the act of 1860, and yet that Senate is composed of but few more men than it was in 1860.

Mr. COX. I move to strike out the last word pro forma. I do it, to say that it is almost impossible for any one, either in the minority or the majority, to cut down a bill of this nature. It is framed in accordance with existing law. That is our formula, and we have to change the law before we can cut down the appropriations. Plain people, of course, will ask who made the law, and why it is not changed. The majority is responsible. I wish we had a rule in this House by which we could cut down salaries when the appropriation bills come up. It is said we have passed by—I think it was the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MYERS] who made the point of order—that we have passed by the compensation and mileage clauses for Senators, amounting to $400,000, and therefore it was too late for my friend from Pennsylvania, on this side [Mr. SMITH] to make the point he tendered on the mileage clause. I am sorry he could not make his point; it is so well taken. It ought to be made on this bill; but of course it is ruled out of order.

But we are now on the clause in reference to compensation of officers, clerks, and messengers. They amount to $124,680.80. Compare the aggregate of this present clause with the same clause in the same act of 1860. You will find, whereas it costs now $124,680.80, it cost at that time only $79,640. Yet the gentleman gives us no details about it. So it was in 1862, when the same items were $79,014. The amount was the same in 1863. This was in the midst of the war. Now it cannot be possible that we have more work to do about the Capitol, or rather at the other end of it, than we had during the war. It is not a matter as to the number of members or the rate of pay. No, Mr. Chairman, there is a general system of profligacy. It is not peculiar to these items. We are raising, and have been raising, salaries all around. A gentleman says, "Well, we have cut down our own salaries." O, yes; and now let us cut down others. I do not speak as a demagogue. I do not believe in that sort of economy which Channing said saved candle-ends and cheese-parings; but I do believe at this time, when so many men are out of employment; when men are suffering even unto starvation and suicide, destitution and death; when industrious and honest men are seeking labor, and in despair cannot find it, that profligacy is a crime; ay, and the people will so regard it.

Go back to the time in 1863 when we paid compensation and mileage to members at the rate of $189,000. Now mileage and compensation under this bill are $400,000. Is this, sir, in proportion to the increase of the number of members of the House and Senate, to the cost of living? Is it not rather largely in excess of any such ratio?

No wonder the people are considering these matters outside of politics. I wish both sides to consider the subject without reference to any partisan bearing. For myself I propose to examine this bill, clause by clause, in this light; and wherever gentlemen on that Appropriation Committee have done their whole duty, and have razeed these bills, I propose that they shall have the proper credit. But this side of the House would be recreant to its trust as a minority, if they did not challenge every item in these bills. For, with all the labor of the members of the Committee on Appropriations, they cannot do full justice to the inordinate claims for salary by the members of Congress and the employés, as well here as in the Executive Departments.

I withdraw my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN.]

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to say that I see great force in the suggestion that we are crippled by the provision that the Sergeant-at-Arms shall not receive any fees, and I am not prepared to say myself whether the additional compensation of $2,300 may not be more reasonable than many others, considering the fact that this officer is deprived of fees. This bill is so pregnant with clear instances of unjustifiable increase of salaries, that I will press no questionable reduction.

As I understand, in the Senate the Sergeant-at-Arms is also the Doorkeeper, and under the circumstances I do not think that I should press the amendment. With the permission of the committee, therefore, I will withdraw it, and renew it in another form. I move to amend by striking out in lines 34 and 35 "$2,592," and inserting "$1,700;" so that it will read:

Assistant door-keeper, $1,700.

I wish to call the attention of my friend from Connecticut [Mr. STARKWEATHER] to the fact that in 1866—I am not to take the gentleman back before the war, (I concede that there would be some increased expenditure inevitably growing out of the inflation of our currency,) but I simply ask him to go back to 1866, and I call his attention to the fact that, according to the appropriation bill of 1866, the officer who performed the same service, that of assistant doorkeeper, received then a salary of $1,700, while his salary is now made $2,592, being an increase of nearly $900 in that office. Now, if the gentleman will allow me, I wish to show what is the effect of this kind of legislation. I find that since 1866 there has been an increase in the items composing this paragraph of the bill to the amount of $43,926. An increase, Mr. Chairman, of nearly $44,000 in this one paragraph! The amount in 1866 appropriated by this paragraph was $80,954. You have increased it now to $124,680—an increase in these eight years of the enormous sum of $43,726. You have added almost 40 per cent. to the appropriations under this paragraph above what they were in 1866, when the inevitable expenses of the Government were necessarily greater than they are now.

I trust the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. STARKWEATHER] will be able to furnish some reason for this increase, for I am not speaking in the spirit of a partisan. The interests involved here are too great for any one to speak on this subject as a republican or as a democrat merely. It is a question of reasonable expenditure, and we ought to look very closely into it, for I hold that every dollar of appropriation for the purposes of Government beyond what is necessary is a corruption fund. You must have economy if you will have honesty in the administration of the Government, and that consideration belongs not only to congressional salaries, but to several other features of public expenditures.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman allow me one minute of his time?

Mr. HOLMAN. I yield to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX.]

Mr. COX. In order that the committee may have the exact figures, I will state that in 1862—I have already given the figures for 1860—the expenditures under this paragraph were $79,014. I have already said that in 1860 they were $79,640, about the same amount. In 1866, as the gentleman from Indiana has stated, they amounted to $80,000. Why is it that recently we have had such an enormous increase of those particular items in this paragraph? We have a right to insist on specific answers. The gentleman who has taken charge of this bill should give us a bill of particulars. We should know just where to strike.

In comparing these various statutes in 1862, 1863, 1864, &c., I find that many of the salaries of the various officers enumerated in those previous laws are less by 30 or 40 per cent. than the salaries fixed for the same officers in the present bill. This will account for the large increase in the aggregate. If the gentleman from Connecticut cannot give us some reason for the increase, I think we should inaugurate a reform now and here by bringing down the appropriations to the old appropriations of 1860, 1862, 1863, or 1866.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. What item does the gentleman find fault with?

Mr. COX. There is an increase in nearly every item.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. Will the gentleman specify one item? We are not on every item.

Mr. COX. I have been making a comparison of the appropriations of the bill with those of previous years. Before I get through I will give you all of them.

Mr. HOLMAN. The case of the assistant door-keeper, now under consideration, is one.

Mr. COX. I find here an additional clerk given to the Senate Committee on Appropriations who did not appear in those former appropriation bills, and the salary of the other clerks is raised in the proportion I have stated. No wonder we have an increased sum. It is for the gentleman to account for the increase in detail.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. The gentleman from New York seems to be fretting himself over the entire bill, and as it is not in order to reply to him except as to the pending paragraph, I will wait till we get to the other sections, where we can have definite complaints to reply to. He does not seem to give us the particular items about which he complains, but I will say this: the gentleman cannot expect now, when he receives $5,000 a year, that the expenses of Congress can be paid as cheaply as they were when he received only $3,000 a year. If he had not voted to increase the pay of members of Congress from $3,000 to $5,000 a year, the expenses would be less. Every one can see that. When the salary of members of Congress was only $3,000 a year, there were only three-fifths of the amount now needed to be appropriated for that purpose.

Mr. COX. Did the gentleman say that I voted to increase the salary to $5,000?

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I do not know that the gentleman did, but nearly everybody did on that side of the House and on this. I have looked over the list of the members who voted for the increase, and I see that nearly all of the members of that House who are now here voted for it.

Mr. COX. The gentleman should know before he makes the statement that I could not have voted for it, for a good reason—I was not then a member.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. No; but the gentleman would have voted for it if he had been here. [Laughter.]

Mr. COX. That is a problematical case. I want facts.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. Now the gentleman is here, he takes the salary of $5,000 a year, and, of course, whether he voted for the increase or not, the expense is something more than it would be if he still received only $3,000.

Mr. COX. I was not speaking of the salaries of members.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. No; the gentleman had nothing to say about that. He will not complain of that.

Mr. COX. If I had attempted again to argue that question the gentleman would have made the point of order that we could not argue it, because it was an appropriation in pursuance of existing law.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. If I had not made that point of order the gentleman would have made it himself.

Mr. COX. I would have made no point of order, sir. But I would have made the point on mileage, especially, had I power—that it should be cut down, all of it.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. The gentleman does not complain about the salaries of members, but he complains because in one or two instances clerks have had their pay advanced. Formerly, at every session, we voted 20 per cent. additional pay, and sometimes more, to these officers. Taking that into account, and also the difference in the cost of living—for I have heard every gentleman on the other side of the House who has talked about inflation say that it costs twice or three times as much to live now as it did, but suppose it only costs twice as much—that will account for all the difference in salaries. The gentleman cannot expect clerks to live on the same sum they had when prices were so very much lower, in the old democratic times.

Mr. HOLMAN. I am only proposing to amend the bill so as to make it conform to what it was in 1866.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. Well, I am replying to that. In 1866 the salaries had not been put up permanently where they are now, but every year, instead of having permanent, fixed salaries, Congress, at the close of the session, voted 15, 20, and sometimes 40 per cent. additional pay. Now we propose to have the officers paid according to law; no more, and no less. Instead of having this scaling up and scaling down, one year one thing and another year another thing, we propose to have it fixed. We say that the bill appropriates less for every one but members of Congress than was formerly appropriated, taking into account the extra compensation heretofore allowed, and the extra cost of living now compared to what it was before the war. If gentlemen will compare the sum appropriated in this part of the bill with what is was before the war, and take into account the additional number of Representatives, and additional compensation required on account of the increased expenses of living, they will find this a very reasonable and economical bill. There has not been a cutting down of salaries so much, but a number of needless clerks and employés have been dispensed with, which reduces this bill about $4,000,000. Now it will cost, according to this bill, and according to all the bills reported by the Committee on Appropriations, less to run this Government than it did under James Buchanan's administration, when you take into account the advanced cost of living, and also the increased population of the country to be governed. Taking all these things into account, these bills are more economical than they were before the war under James Buchanan, when this Government in four years was run into debt $90,000,000, and there was a deficit in the Treasury of $70,000,000, which we have had to provide for this very session of Congress—a deficit and debt incurred in time of peace under Mr. Buchanan. This very bill is more economical than the bill of that day was, when you take into account the number of Representatives, the increase in population, and the increased cost of living.

Mr. SPEER. The gentleman from Connecticut is in error in referring to the expenses of Mr. Buchanan's administration, when he says that the Government was largely run in debt in time of profound peace. He must remember that the Utah war occurred during that time, and an army was sent at great expense to Utah, incurring a debt of several million dollars.

And he is further disingenuous in this, in giving the indebtedness of the administration of Mr. Buchanan, and not giving the annual receipts of the Government at that time. While it may be true that the expenditures of his administration in one year amounted to more than the receipts of that year, it is also true that the receipts of the Government now are double and treble what they were in the time of Mr. Buchanan. But why, let me ask, should the gentleman inject such references as that into the discussion of this bill?

Mr. STARKWEATHER. Because you on that side were comparing the present bill with the bills of former administrations.

Mr. SPEER. I made no such comparison.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I said "on that side."

Mr. SPEER. It seems to me that the honorable gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. STARKWEATHER,] charged in this House and before the country with the control of so important a bill as this, should rise above these little petty references. I say this in no unkind spirit. I think it due to the dignity of this discussion, and to truth and justice, that this House should discuss an appropriation bill of this kind without these little petty references to Mr. Buchanan's administration. It does seem to me that when a republican is driven to the wall, and has nothing to say in answer to charges made, he casts himself back upon the name of James Buchanan. Sir, so far as personal and political integrity are concerned, it would be well for this administration and for the country if there were some James Buchanan living to-day.

But I rose for another purpose. In this bill there is provided a salary of $2,592 for the assistant door-keeper of the Senate. Then there is also provided the same salary for the acting door-keeper of the Senate. The point I desire to make is a practical one. If these officers remain here during the whole year, then that salary is not too much. But if the acting door-keeper and the assistant door-keeper of the Senate cease their duties with the adjournment of Congress, then I say it is simply an outrage to pay any man $2,500 a year for standing at a door for the three months of a short session. I inquire of the gentleman having charge of this bill, and I do so in good faith for the purpose of having the House informed, whether these positions devolve a necessity upon these officers of remaining here after the adjournment of Congress? If they come here when Congress meets, and go away when Congress adjourns, then these salaries are extravagantly high.

There is no branch of the Government where we are so likely to be generous as in the compensation of the employés of the House and of the Senate. They are near to us all in their personal and social relations; they are most clever and estimable gentlemen. And there is no duty so unpleasant, in the consideration of a bill of this character, as that of standing up for the right against the men whom you esteem and regard, and whose services entitle them to a just and liberal compensation.

I ask the gentleman to say to the House whether this acting door-keeper and assistant door-keeper cease their duties when Congress adjourns. If so, then their compensation is entirely too high. If there is a Door-keeper, and an assistant door-keeper, and an acting door-keeper, I want the gentleman to define what are the duties of each of those officers. I might understand what were the duties of a Door-keeper, and of an assistant door-keeper, but when you go one step further and have an acting door-keeper, then there arises at once the implication that the assistant door-keeper is not an acting door-keeper. What does he do? He does not act as Door-keeper, because you have an acting door-keeper. It is suggested by a friend near me that perhaps the only duty the assistant door-keeper performs, the only act that he performs, is to draw his salary. I hope the gentleman will answer these pertinent inquiries.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. The gentleman can see what they do. Here is the bill of particulars before him. I knew he was joking when he made his remarks.

Mr. SPEER. Not at all; I am in dead earnest.

Mr. ALBRIGHT. I move to amend by striking out the last word, in order to reply to the remarks of my colleague, [Mr. SPEER.] I desire to say that these door-keepers and assistant door-keepers are salaried officers by the year. They cannot be employed here for nine months or six months in the year and then go back to whatever business they may have left without some sacrifice. They are persons who have some capacity and some merit, and who are qualified to discharge their duties. They are here because of their capacity and qualifications. It does seem to me that it is a very unfair argument to make that these men should be paid simply for so many months' services. The same argument might be applied to members of Congress. They get a salary of $5,000 a year, and draw their pay per month. It might be said that for the six or nine months of each year when they are at home a proportionate amount of their salaries should be deducted. If that is what the gentleman means, then he should propose an amendment, which will affect his own salary and that of everybody else in the same way. These men are the servants of the country just as much while here as are members of Congress. They are needed for the dispatch of the business of this House. Why go into such a petty pleading as to say that these men should be paid only for the time they are actually here?

Mr. SPEER. The gentleman certainly does not desire to be unjust, or to place me in a false position. I did not say they should be paid only for the time they are here, but I said if they were here only during the session of Congress then their pay was too high.

Mr. ALBRIGHT. I cannot yield now to my friend, because I have only five minutes; but he directed his question to the gentleman who has this bill in charge, and wanted to know whether this was to be payment for the time only that these officers were here, or for the whole year. Now, the gentleman knows, and everybody else knows, that this is a yearly pay; that these officers are paid for the year's services. If their services are demanded during the whole year, they must remain here. But even if that is not so, they cannot be in attendance during the session without breaking into any other business in which they might engage. It seems to me this is an ungenerous assault upon these officers; for an examination of former years will show that they are not now getting as much as the same officers formerly received. There are now no perquisites, no special allowances, to which they are entitled; but there is a clean, square pay. Hence it does not seem to me right that these men should be cut down to a pay which shall allow them only so much per month.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, in reply to the honorable gentleman from Connecticut, who has charge of this bill, I beg to say that this side of the House has brought in no partisan remark. In comparing the expenditures of 1860 with the present time, we compared, in part, Mr. Buchanan's administration and four months of Mr. Lincoln's. My other comparisons applied to Mr. Lincoln's time—in 1862 and 1863. The comparison of my friend from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] related to 1866. No Administration was mentioned personally. So that it looks like a very microscopic sort of a point to make upon this side to raise the ghost of Mr. Buchanan against any criticism that may be made on the half million or more of dollars appropriated in this portion of the bill.

I think, sir, that the gentleman makes a loose statement when he says that our expenditures are increasing in proportion to our population and the exigencies of the public service. Sir, the expenditures in 1860-'61, including four months of Mr. Lincoln's administration, and omitting pensions and the interest on the public debt, were less by $94,653,678.98 than they are now. Thus the expenses have increased 150 per cent., with only 22 per cent. increase in population. When the gentleman makes that sort of argument he should either have some data for it, or he should withdraw his bill or his speech.

The gentleman also said, "Why do you not compare in detail the items of this bill with the items of previous bills?" When the gentleman asked me that question, I had not the time to make the comparison in full; but in looking over the matter I have made some comparison in four or five cases. The Secretary of the Senate, who formerly received $3,600, receives under this bill, $4,320. The additional allowance for disbursing clerk is increased from $480 to $576. The Chief Clerk, who formerly received $2,500, now receives $3,000. Another clerk is raised from $2,160 to $2,590, and so on. And so I might continue the comparison. Why, sir, the Chaplain of the Senate, in 1860, the man who prays so fruitlessly to God in that body, cannot do it for the former salary of $750, but must be increased to $900. I suppose that we get better prayers now under this republican administration in view of this increase of 20 per cent. in the pay of the Chaplain. [Laughter.]

But, Mr. Chairman, gentlemen must have some reason to assign for this extraordinary increase. What is the reason? I suppose it is this snug proviso, which has been referred to, in the thirty-first line:

Provided, That hereafter he shall receive, directly or indirectly, no fees or other compensation or emolument whatever for performing the duties of the office.

Yet the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ALBRIGHT] who just took his seat said that there are no perquisites now; that all such things have been cut off. Why this proviso, then, to cut off what is not? He said, as I recollect his language, "We have, or want, clean, square pay." Well, sir, the old law I have quoted provided a "clean, square pay." In 1862-'63 and down to 1865-'66 there was no provision for perquisites to these officers, so far as I know. If there was, let any gentleman show it and I will withdraw my remark. "Clean, square pay," that is all we care for. That is the object of all our attempts now and hitherto. What is the meaning of this little proviso inserted in this bill? Is it based on figures or is it a convenient sort of loop-hole to creep through when the point is made that the expenses around this Capitol have been increased 40 per cent. in the last six or eight or ten years? At any rate that proviso is limited to a single officer.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. One single word and then I hope we shall be able to have a vote.

Mr. DURHAM. I raise the point of order that debate on this amendment is exhausted.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. There has been no reply——

Mr. DURHAM. I insist on my point of order.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. All right; I would be glad to have a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order seems to be well taken.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I hope it will be enforced hereafter. Three gentlemen have spoken on that side on this amendment to one on this.

Mr. DURHAM. I have made the point for this side of the House as much as for that.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I do not wish to speak further on this question myself, but I hope the rule will be strictly enforced hereafter.

The CHAIRMAN. The rule will be strictly enforced hereafter.

The committee divided on Mr. HOLMAN'S amendment; and there were—ayes 30, noes 45; no quorum voting.

The Chair appointed Mr. HOLMAN and Mr. STARKWEATHER as tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 40, noes 60; no quorum voting.

Mr. SPEER. I hope members will not have any delicacy in voting on this important question.

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not wish to break up the committee because of want of a quorum, and will therefore withdraw my demand for a further count.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I move on page 3, lines 48 and 49, to strike out "$1,440," and insert "$1,200;" so it will read:

Twenty messengers, to be appointed and removed by the Sergeant-at-Arms with the approval of the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, at $1,200 each.

Mr. Chairman, I move this amendment in order to ask once more the attention of the committee to the salary of messengers, as well in the Capitol itself as in the various Departments. On page 2 we have 2 messengers, at $1,296 each. It was in respect to this I made my previous motion to reduce to $1,000. On page 3 we have 20 messengers, at $1,440 without any reason being given why they should have more than the messengers on the preceding page. On page 6 I find a messenger provided for the Committee on Ways and Means, at $1,314, which is another rate of compensation. I find there, also, 3 messengers, including one in the House Library, at $1,440 each, the same amount provided in the place in reference to which I make my motion.

I find further, on page 7, 14 messengers in the House, at $1,728 each, and 7 following them immediately, at $1,080 each. I find on page 8, 5 messengers at $1,800, 6 at $1,440, following each other, and 12 immediately following during the session—estimated at five months—at the rate of $1,440 each per annum. The point I desire to call the attention of gentlemen to is this, that messengers are paid from five to eight hundred dollars, and sometimes one thousand, more than messengers are paid in other Departments. I am told in reply by the gentleman having charge of this bill that here it is a more responsible place, and they should be paid a higher rate of compensation. Here we have five or six different rates of compensation for messengers about the Capitol.

The Senate have twenty messengers at $1,440 each; and the House has fourteen messengers, seven at $1,728 each, which is higher than any messenger gets in the Senate, and seven at $1,080, which is lower than any one gets in the Senate. I do not know the reason for this discrimination. I suppose if there is any reason it grows out of the fact that some are supposed to open doors more important, and the others to open doors which are less important.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will restate his amendment.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. My amendment is, on page 3, lines 48 and 49, to reduce the compensation of messengers from $1,440 to $1,200 each.

Mr. SPEER. I desire to say, Mr. Chairman, a word on this subject.

The CHAIRMAN. Is the gentleman in favor of the amendment, or opposed to it?

Mr. SPEER. I move to reduce the amendment ten dollars, as I cannot speak in favor of any increase.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will speak on his ten-dollar amendment.

Mr. SPEER. Mr. Chairman, it may not be known to the country that the yeas and nays cannot be called in the Committee of the Whole, and therefore, for the purpose of giving my friends on this side of the House, as well as on the other, the benefit of the record they make, I say that the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. NIBLACK,] and the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. DURHAM,] and other gentlemen on this floor, should have the benefit of their record here before their constituents at home of voting for $2,592 for a gentleman to stand at the House door for three months. I like those who always preach economy and always vote for the largest expenditures, and I like them the more when I find them on this side of the House. They, as representatives of the people here, have the right to their judgment and the right to their position, but their constituents have a higher right to know the record they are making. There we are when the yeas and nays can be called all preaching economy and reduction of salary.

The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. NIBLACK] was one of the first to give notice of the introduction of a bill to reduce the pay of the members of this House to what it was last year, and yet he is one of the first to go between the tellers in favor of $2,592 salary to the assistant door-keeper of the House. Let his constituents know it; that is all.

I say, Mr. Chairman, if we intend to economize in the expenditures of the Government we must begin somewhere. Let us begin here; let us begin now; let us begin upon those who are nearest to us; let us test our sincerity here and now. If we could call the yeas and nays upon this question, I have no doubt these leaders of the House upon this side would be rallying to the front with the banner of reform swinging in the breeze, with its golden letters on it, and only be struggling as to who should be the staff-bearer. As it is we are powerless; and not only powerless, but taunted by gentlemen on this side of the House whose constituents, I have no doubt, if they could witness the scene to-day, would bow their heads in humiliation.

What I say, Mr. Chairman, is not personal. But I received intimation from the Chair that I was to speak to a ten-dollar amendment. Well, sir, if we could reduce the bill ten dollars, that is so much. I understood the Chair himself, from recent reports, to be in favor of economy and reduction of expenditures, as well as an increase in the hours of labor of the poor girls in the Departments of the Government. If that is the position of the chairman of the committee, I hope he will not fling any taunts at me for trying to save the Government even ten dollars.

Mr. NIBLACK. Am I now recognized by the Chair?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman rise to oppose the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. NIBLACK. I am in opposition to the gentleman from Pennsylvania. [Laughter.]

Mr. SPEER. In opposition to my ten-dollar amendment?

Mr. NIBLACK. I differ with some gentlemen in one respect at least. I did not come here, in the first place, on a mission of any sort. I came here simply with a desire to do my duty fairly and honestly, as I understood it, and to treat my political opponents, as far as I could, in the same way as I would like to be treated myself under similar circumstances. But I have never found it to my advantage personally, nor as I thought to the advantage of the country, to adopt this policy of watching the spigot while everything was running loose through the bung-hole. I do not think that that is the proper way to practice economy. I prefer always to fight systems; to fight things on general principles; to oppose the establishment of new departments of the Government, or new bureaus of the Government; to oppose increases to whole classes of individuals, where the aggregate increase amounts to something considerable. But I never was in favor of a stingy, parsimonious policy in regard to the employés about the Capitol, who attend here to do our bidding daily and nightly, as we impose it upon them.

I happened to be a member of the last Congress, when the proposition was made to add forty-nine members, to this House, in order to conform to the increase of population in the previous decade, as reported in the census of 1870. I opposed the proposed increase, because it not only made this House more cumbersome, but because it contributed unnecessarily to the increase of the public expenses. But on that occasion, if I remember rightly, I had the opposition of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SPEER.]

Mr. SPEER. You had.

Mr. NIBLACK. The gentleman from Pennsylvania was willing to add to this House forty-nine new members, with a salary of $5,000 each, besides mileage and all the other perquisites and incidents of their position. Now he wants to strike off ten dollars from the salary of a door-keeper. And I believe when the great crisis fell upon the country, arising out of the back-pay matter, last spring, the gentleman from Pennsylvania was one of the unfortunate men, like myself, who failed to give back the extra compensation voted him. At all events he was charged with this by his constituents.

Mr. SPEER. But I did not hasten here to act the demagogue by giving notice of my intention to introduce a bill to repeal the increase of salary, when I had my own increase in my pocket.

The CHAIRMAN, (rapping the gavel.) The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. NIBLACK] has the floor.

Mr. NIBLACK. I was one of the first to introduce a bill to reduce our salaries. I had opposed that increase when it was made. I always thought that as a matter of expediency, independent of other considerations, it was a mistake; and I pledged myself voluntarily on the first opportunity to introduce a bill to repeal the law making that increase. I carried out my promise. And if the gentleman from Pennsylvania will take the trouble to look into the matter he will find that in that bill of mine which proposed to repeal the former law I did not attempt to interfere with the salaries of the employés of Congress. And why? Because their duties I considered were somewhat increased on account of the greatly increased number of Representatives, in regard to which the gentleman, as he has stated, failed to vote with me in the last Congress. This increase of expenditures about which the gentleman has been speaking is the natural incident and consequence of what we did in increasing the membership of this House. The House, however, voted to sustain the proposition by a three-fourths vote, and I accepted the situation. And since the increase has taken place in pursuance of a law of Congress, I have accepted the further results of the situation in that increase of expense which everybody knew would result if we increased the number of Representatives as we have done.

Sir, whatever my record may be, it is a very humble one, I know, but I stand upon it upon all occasions, here and everywhere; and I am not at all distressed at anything the gentleman from Pennsylvania may say in that respect.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. NIBLACK. I want a few moments longer. [Cries of "Go on!" "Go on!"]

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the gentleman from Indiana will proceed.

There was no objection.

Mr. NIBLACK. I do not want to stand in the attitude of striking at subordinates merely, the small men, the men who do menial service, the men who are dependent on the breath of those who appoint them or elect them and who are endeavoring to reduce their pay by a contest like that which has been inaugurated here this morning, while other immense expenditures are allowed to go on unchecked and with the support of some of the very gentlemen who are endeavoring to get this cheap notoriety, if I may use the expression, for economy which I, sir, do not covet. If I am an unfit Representative for my district on this account, in Heaven's name it is time that I should be retired.

Mr. SPEER. I withdraw the amendment to the amendment, in view of the speech of the gentleman from Indiana.

The question recurred on the amendment of Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont; and being put, it was not agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to strike out in line 42, "$1,440," and insert "$1,200;" so that it will read:

Two assistants in document-room, at $1,200 each.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I do not wish to be captious, but it seems to me that that is going back, and is contrary to the rules.

Mr. HOLMAN. No, sir; it is not going back; it is a part of the pending paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that all amendments are in order which are to the pending paragraph.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I do not object to it.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Chairman, this is a small item, a very small item. The amount involved is only $240. I again call attention to the fact that the increase in the items embraced in this paragraph since 1866 amounts to $43,000. It is very easy for gentlemen to talk about small items, and a laugh is indulged in whenever a practical proposition to amend, so as to reduce expenses, is made on this floor. Such propositions are laughed at and met with ridicule, and yet every one of us knows that these millions which are appropriated are made up of these very little items. Gentlemen talk about the large items that they will vote against. Sir, the whole history of our legislation shows that if you propose to have any economy at all you have got to fight every item as it comes up. I should like to see the record of any gentleman who has favored small items, proposing, when the time comes, to vote against big items. Sir, the big items never come, and in spite of the sneers of gentlemen, I shall never hesitate on any occasion to move to amend a proposition before this House, no matter how unimportant it may be as to the expenditure involved, if, in my judgment, it is an improper and extravagant appropriation of money.

Sir, there never will be any economy in this House while gentlemen on this side of the House co-operate with gentlemen on the other side and excuse them for their extravagances. I have seen the other side of the House when there was a real opposition here in the House of Representatives; and when a measure proposing any increase of expenditures was earnestly and honestly resisted and fought upon the part of the men supporting the administration of James Buchanan, they were not fortified in their tendency to profligacy by votes from the republican side of the House. I would be glad, sir, to see that day of economy come back—even that day, although I denounced that administration as a profligate administration, expending unnecessary millions year by year; and for that reason the people very properly hurled that party from power.

Sir, I have shown that upon these little items of expenditure you have increased the appropriation by this bill, on the basis of the appropriations for the same purpose eight years ago, $43,000—in these little items, remember, the expenditures about the Capitol, which have not been increased one dollar by any legislation which has occurred from that day to this.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I do not want to take up time. The gentleman goes back to 1863. I do not want to be considered partisan, but take the year 1863, the Thirty-seventh Congress; we then had 50 Senators. The gentleman will recollect that there were only 25 States represented in the Thirty-seventh Congress.

Mr. HOLMAN. I have taken the legislation year by year clear back to that time.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. Do not interrupt me. I simply want to state the facts, and to compare the present time with the time before the war. The gentleman goes back to 1863; and in March, 1863, there were only 25 States represented here, and now there are 37. Then there were only 50 Senators; now there are 74. Then there were only 181 Representatives; now there are 302. Well, you must see that the expenses, not only of the members, but the outside expenses, must be increased. It costs more to run 37 States than it does to run 25; and here about this Capitol more clerks and other officers of all kinds are required, because there are more duties to perform.

And the expenditure now in comparison with that of 1863 is much less in proportion. We have now 37 States represented, then we had but 25; we have now 74 Senators, then we had 50; we have now 302 Members and Delegates of this House, then we had only 181. Anybody who will take into account the number of men which are now required to wait upon us, door-keepers, clerks, messengers, &c., and also will consider that, as the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. NIBLACK] said, these men are required to be here night and day, I think will make no objection to the amount of their compensation.

Go into the Senate Chamber at eight o'clock in the morning, when some of us are still in our beds, and you will find there the Door-keeper, the assistant door-keeper, and the messengers and pages, fixing up things, distributing the bills, placing them on file, and working four or five hours before many of us get here to the Capitol at all. When some of us are in our beds, enjoying our salaries of $5,000 a year, [laughter,] or riding out with our fine teams, or playing billiards, or doing something else, these men are here for hours engaged in their work. These reporters are here for hours after we are at home and asleep, as I found out yesterday, for I had occasion last evening to have a little printing done.

Mr. NEGLEY. How many members of the House does the gentleman speak for when he talks of their playing billiards or wasting their time in that way?

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I do not want to be particular in my statement.

Mr. NEGLEY. I agree with the gentleman entirely in all he has said in favor of the salaries of the pages and other officers; but I do disapprove of the habit some have of lecturing the House or their associates on this floor for neglect of duty.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I have not lectured anybody.

Mr. NEGLEY. The gentleman has made a remark which is general, which travels all over the country, and which is an imputation against us.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I hope this will not be taken out of my time.

Mr. NEGLEY. It ought to be taken out of your time, for it is taken out of our credit.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. Permit me to correct an impression which the gentleman has given to the country. No one can understand me as disapproving of playing billiards at the proper time. Our best clergymen do that; our cabinet ministers do it. Knowing the gentleman and every member of the House here as well as I do, I am entirely opposed to the statement that has gone forth to the country, that our habits and conduct here are not such as the country would approve. I believe there is a great deal of base slander in that respect. It certainly is the farthest from my intentions to suggest anything, even in the word "billiards," that is improper. I consider it proper to play billiards at the proper time. I wanted to say that, even while we were asleep, these men, whose salaries are so low, and whose salaries some desire to cut down still lower, are at work faithfully for us here.

Mr. NEGLEY. In speaking for myself, I wish to say that there is not a page on this floor, or a door-keeper, who works as many hours in a day as I do. And, in order to qualify his argument, I do not want the gentleman to make an intimation against any member on this floor.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I have not done that.

Mr. NEGLEY. It is too common a practice.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to amend my amendment so as to increase the compensation I have proposed ten dollars.

Mr. KELLOGG. I make the point of order that the gentleman having offered an amendment and spoken to it cannot change it, and thereby obtain the right to speak upon it again.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is well taken.

Mr. HOLMAN. Then I will withdraw my amendment. I now move to amend by striking out the sum of "$1,440" and inserting "$1,250."

Mr. Chairman, I do not believe the gentleman from Connecticut intends to be disingenuous, or that his purpose is to deceive this House or the country. Yet it is but too apparent that he is seeking to divert attention from the real point involved here.

The question is not whether by the increase of the number of members there was a necessity for the employment of an increased number of employés about the Capitol. The question is whether the salaries of those employed for years shall be now increased enormously over their former compensation, and beyond the rates established during the expensive period of the war. I have at all times regarded the salaries paid by the Government as too high. I have never known a time since I have been a member of this House when I did not consider the salaries paid to members of Congress, officers of the Government, and employés of Congress as far beyond any reasonable standard of compensation. I do not believe salaries should be greater for public employment than are generally paid for equal competency, intelligence, experience, and integrity in private employment. High salaries beget cupidity in public affairs. In my judgment, you may measure the profligacy and extravagance of this Government year by year in every one of its Departments by the increase of salaries alone. When you begin to expend money beyond the real necessities of the public service, you drift rapidly to excessive appropriations in every direction, limited only by the capacity of the Treasury. Increase of salaries is invariably the first step in the progress of extravagance. We saw this strikingly illustrated in the last Congress.

If I might be permitted the remark without being charged with being illiberal, I would say this: that a more perfect contrast between the dominant side of the House as it exists to-day, and that side as it was on its first advent into power during the last years of Buchanan's administration, cannot well be conceived. The change and revolution are complete. The old spirit that gave it power is no more. I admired the resolute purpose of the republican party of that day as much as I questioned the wisdom of its political opinions. In its youthful vigor it was earnest for economy.

Every eye was vigilant and every heart was earnest in the effort to retrench and reform the abuses that had grown up during the years of Mr. Buchanan's administration and those of his democratic predecessors. I gloried in the manhood of that party in demanding and compelling a reduction in the expenses of the Government.

The contrast of the present with the past is melancholy indeed. The singleness of purpose for the public good is no more; the sentiment of economy has died out, and cupidity in public affairs rules the hour. You seldom bring forward a measure of retrenchment even after a series of the most brilliant speeches in favor of economy. If a measure gets a hearing in the House which in fact proposes to retrench, if it is indeed a reduction of expenditure, many gentlemen upon that side of the House give it their earnest opposition; a still larger number treat it with sublime indifference; while a small portion only give it their cordial support, and these gentlemen are in the main powerless. The party as a body, in its leadership and in the spirit that animates it, is not the party that came into power during the last days of James Buchanan's administration. The name only remains. It was then a party of retrenchment and reform; it is now a party that looks with complacency upon expenditures manifestly beyond the wants of the Government, and the spirit of self-aggrandizement and personal advantage rules its counsels.

Why, sir, when I pointed out the fact that you are by this short paragraph alone increasing your expenditures in salaries, right under our eyes, over $43,000 a year beyond the year 1866, one of the most expensive years of our history, I supposed that some gentleman on the other side of the House would rise and say, "We have professed to be in favor of reform; we came into this Congress on the platform of economy and retrenchment; we have assured the country in our speeches and through the public press that there shall be retrenchment; that the party shall reform itself, and we will at least go back in the interest of economy to a grade of expenditure such as prevailed during one of the most expensive years in our history." But, sir, even a proposition to bring back the salaries of our various officers here to the standard of that year meets with profound indifference or earnest resistance; and not a gentleman on the other side, except the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. WILLARD,] is willing to give it support by speech, and a few others by their silent votes.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Chairman, it would be well to compare expenses with resources, a thing the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] does not seem willing to do. Take his four years of economy, the administration of James Buchanan, a time of profound peace, in which a debt of $90,000,000 was incurred for the current expenditures of the Government. There never has been a season of such profligacy as those same four years, in which the revenues of the country ran down from $64,000,000 to $39,000,000; in which the people, persecuted by taxation, extravagance, and bad legislation, fled the land, so that immigration fell from 250,000 a year down to 91,000; and the tide of emigration almost equaled that of immigration.

Why, sir, during these ten years of alleged extravagance—during almost every day of which the gentleman from Indiana has been here, and when he was more influential in the counsels of the nation than even now—it was the remark of my then venerable colleague, Thaddeus Stevens, that a bill for $10,000,000, $20,000,000, or $30,000,000 of expenditure encountered no opposition from that side of the House; but when the question was to be settled whether an expenditure for manure to put around newly planted trees should be $500 a year, there was an hour's debate upon the question, because gentlemen on the other side thought that one-half the sum would be adequate. [Laughter.] For whom and for what do we now legislate in comparison with that period? Sir, I have had occasion within ten days to call the attention of the House to the fact that, from the days of Jamestown and Plymouth Rock down to the beginning of our recent war, our people had accumulated but $14,000,000,000 of property; yet within these same ten years of alleged profligacy we added $16,000,000,000 or $2,000,000,000 more in ten years than we had gathered before in more than two hundred years. We have in the mean time nearly trebled our railroads, and in doing so have trebled and more than trebled our mail service. We have created States and rendered every part of our Territories accessible, so that they are now populated. We have surveyed the land, and made every part of our broad country the home of civilization and enterprise.

What, sir, are the proportions of the taxes of this day to the earnings and accumulations of the people to what they were when despair drove back to his fatherland the immigrant who had sought in vain for the means of living in this country under our free institutions and our beautiful flag! The expenses of the Government are more in gross; but they never sat so lightly upon the people as they do now. The taxes of a country are the annual draught it makes upon the annual earnings of the people; and during those same ten years of alleged extravagance they paid in one year $490,000,000, and in the next nearly $450,000,000, and in those two years loaned from their accumulated profits $1,000,000,000 to support the Government against the southern wing of the democratic party.

Mr. COX. I move again to amend by striking out the last word. Sir, when this debate began there was no idea that it would take a partisan turn, or such an economical turn as the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] has given to it. The gentleman from Pennsylvania must have heard, however, that recently the people have been more or less influenced by something that has taken place in this House and country.

Mr. KELLEY. By the wit of the gentleman.

Mr. COX. It is not inflation that has had a peculiar influence upon them; that question is yet to be fairly tested in this House; that matter is going leisurely along, and nothing is being done about it; all the business of the country waits for our action on that subject. It is another sort of inflation that I refer to—the swelling of our expenses. There must have been some reason why the people of various States, East and West, last fall showed their feelings so plainly about the dominant party. And why did the people of the State of New Hampshire—which is honored by being represented by the gentleman upon my right [Mr. PARKER]—speak so significantly about our policies? Why have they given us their judgment? Gentlemen contemn it, do they? As they complain of our efforts here to economize, so they complain that the people are beginning to be thoughtful and economical. Why not heed their lessons on the subject?

Mr. Chairman, the human mind has no idea of detestation, nor human language any mode of expression adequate to express the thorough contempt of the people to-day at the shilly-shally, namby-pamby, wishy-washy economy pretended by this House. [Laughter.] We hear a great deal of noisy grinding, but no meal. [Laughter.] That is a Persian metaphor. It is a wise one. It is from the East.

We hear economy preached here all the time; but because some gentlemen, Messrs. HOLMAN and SPEER on this side, aided by one honorable exception on the other, my friend from Vermont [Mr. WILLARD] undertake by their amendments or remarks to challenge comparison between the economical years, 1860, 1862, 1863, and 1866, and the present and recent lavish years, not on population, (although there we met them,) but on the definite salaries of officers, messengers, and other employés of the Senate, then they sneeringly say it is such a little matter! [Laughter.]

Little drops of water—

I would remind the Sunday-school scholars on the other side, [laughter]—

Little drops of water,
Little grains of sand,
Make the mighty ocean,
And the pleasant land.

Sir, infinite nature proclaims and illustrates to gentlemen, through all the stellar spaces, that, compared with constellations, you are all infinitesimal atomies, especially on the other side of the House, [laughter;] that, compared with the mountains, as well as the stars, you are each and all infinitely and ineffably little. [Renewed laughter.]

You do not know how small you are until you look up at the Sierras, the Himalayas, and the Alps! [Great laughter.]

When, sir, we make our point on a large principle, though it may be on a small sum; when we undertake to show how to begin to build, after the manner of nature, grand economies out of small, then we are taunted that we are saving at the spigot only. We are thus taunted by members on both sides. We are voted against by members on this side, almost in a body. Our party will take notice why we are voted down, and who by, in our attempt to make this Government pure and economical. Oh! yes; you go home to your State, congressional, and county conventions, and concoct and write out bold, inspiring resolves that it is the duty of all men to practice economy in public administration; and then you go—I will not say sneak through, but serenely go—through the tellers and laugh at our practical attempts, while you vote down economy. [Laughter.] But when the yeas and nays are called, Mr. Chairman, they are then for economy. [Laughter.]

I do not belong to-day to any side of this House. [Laughter.] I am not particularly in affiliation with that side or this; I am an eclectic philosopher. [Laughter.] I pick out gentlemen like the present Chairman of the Committee of the Whole, [Mr. WOODFORD,] and many of the distinguished gentlemen before me, some on this side and some on the other, and make my party. That is my party for this House. Outside of it, I am at home in the bosom of my democratic constituents. Think you the people do not understand it? I gave you notice there was meaning in New Hampshire. [Laughter.] There is a bigger meaning coming from thrifty, steady Connecticut; and there will be still greater meaning among the grangers who are to come hereafter. I understand from accurate sources—from gentlemen who come here from the West, and who understand western politics, and their impulses and movements—that not a single man, scarcely, of either party in this House from there will ever come back to it. [Laughter.]

Mr. RICE. Mr. Chairman, I have no expectation of answering gentlemen who have already spoken, but as I am somewhat bewildered by the action of the House, being a stranger to it, I speak more for relief than I do with the hope of getting any information. [Laughter.]

Now, sir, I shall never be able to find out, and I am sure the world will never know, what the administration of James Buchanan has to do with the salary of a man in the folding-room. [Laughter.] And yet we see distinguished men earnestly addressing this assembly, and confining themselves entirely to what has happened in this country ten or fifteen years ago, when the only discussion ought to be whether $1,440 shall be given to a man working in this Capitol.

Can this be in earnest, can this be equal to the important question before this country and this House, the appropriation bill to pay the expenditures of the Government in order that it may go on and discharge its function? I think not. I do not know how far the joke may go. It seems to be clearly understood between gentlemen. There is much said about this side of the House and that side of the House, but I hope in discussing this question of the salary of the laboring man or any other man it will never enter into my mind, for I hold it is not seriously meant by gentlemen, that party has anything whatever to do with paying a salary of $1,440 to a man who is at work here.

The chance is the man comes from a distant place, goes to a member of Congress and asks his assistance to get the place. And he does get it. And he has left his home and has paid his expenses, and he lives in a city that makes its living in six months out of the twelve, and the cost of living is increased by that. Now, when you propose to give him $1,440 a year, a large portion of this House gets up and makes a demonstration occupying half of the day's session to show that that man ought to have forty or one hundred dollars less.

Now, I hope Mr. Buchanan's administration will be let alone. And I hope gentlemen here—I do not know but I may be going too far in asking them to do so—but I hope gentlemen here will confine themselves in true earnest to this bill reported by the Appropriation Committee. And, if it is right that it should be adopted, let us adopt it. Let us get done with this work. There is a great deal more to do, and only yesterday I heard a gentleman say that we were likely to be here till September. For my own part I hope to be away a great deal sooner.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX.]

Mr. COX. I withdraw it.

The CHAIRMAN. The next question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN.]

Mr. HOLMAN. Let the amendment be again reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out on line 42, page 3, "$1,440," and insert in lieu thereof "$1,250;" so it will read:

Two assistants in document-room, at $1,250 each.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 23, noes not counted.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN. I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to the paragraph these words:

Provided, however, That no greater sum shall be paid for services hereinbefore set forth under the foregoing provisions than was allowed and paid for the like services by the provisions of an act making appropriations for the legislative and other expenses of the Government, approved July 23, 1866.

Mr. HOLMAN. I will only state that the adoption of this amendment will make a difference in the aggregate of the items composing this paragraph of $43,726. In other words, the increase in the appropriations made by this paragraph, over and above the amount of appropriations in 1866 for the same purposes, is $43,726.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I make the point of order on that amendment that it is new legislation.

Mr. HOLMAN. I submit that the point of order is made too late.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks it is too late to raise the point of order.

The question was taken on Mr. HOLMAN'S amendment; and there were—ayes 36, noes 63; no quorum voting.

Mr. SPEER. I ask for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. STARKWEATHER and Mr. SPEER were appointed.

The committee again divided; and there were ayes 32, noes not counted.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk read the following paragraph:

For contingent expenses of the Senate, namely:

For clerks to committees, $25,000.

Mr. HEREFORD. I offer the following amendment:

After the word "committees" strike out "$25,000" and insert "$15,000;" so it will read:

For clerks of committees, $15,000.

It may be an unpopular thing, Mr. Chairman, to offer such an amendment as this; nevertheless, whatever may be the risk of unpopularity, I shall offer it, and give my reasons for doing so. The appropriations in this paragraph and in the following paragraph, from line 72 to line 79 inclusive, are all of a piece, and heretofore have been made in one paragraph. There is, first, an appropriation for clerks of committees of $25,000, and then for pages there is an appropriation of $6,700; making for clerks of committees and pages of the Senate $31,700.

Now, sir, in 1866—it seems it does not suit the temper of the gentlemen on the other side to go back to 1860—but going back even to 1866, there was paid for clerks to committees, pages, and horses and carryalls, in all, $18,000; and we have now for the same purposes nearly $32,000. Will the gentleman who has charge of this bill tell the House, and tell the people, why it is that there is an increase in this one item alone of $13,000, and that simply for the clerks to the committees and the pages of the Senate, although in 1866 there was added also the pay for the horses and the carryalls? But in this bill we are asked in a subsequent paragraph to pay—

That is, for the very same items we have in 1874 the enormous sum of $37,000; whereas in 1866, under the rule of this very same party, all that was asked for was the sum of $18,000. Will gentlemen say that it was less expensive to live here in 1866 than it was in 1873? I ask gentlemen on both sides of the House, irrespective of party, to do what the people demand of us; that is, to do something in the direction of economy, and in the direction of lessening the burdens of the people.

I have observed, during the short time I have been here, that there is one great difficulty under which we labor. Too many of us change our views after we have been before our constituents. When during a congressional election we are brought face to face with the hard-working yeomanry of the country we feel honest; but when we come here we get into a different atmosphere, and honesty is not always adhered to. I charge nobody with corruption. I charge no party with wanton profligacy; but somehow or other we are in a different atmosphere here from that which surrounds us when we are with our people at home.

I ask the members of this House on both sides to sustain the amendment I have offered; and I ask also the gentleman who has charge of this bill to explain to the committee, if he can, why there should be those enormous differences between the appropriations of 1866 and 1874. If the gentleman is unable to do so satisfactorily, I shall insist, and insist earnestly, on the adoption by the committee of the amendment I have offered.

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope that the House will not be longer delayed by the same argument, which I understand has been repeated ten or fifteen times on this bill. I rise to oppose the amendment, and ask for a vote.

The question was taken on Mr. HEREFORD'S amendment, and on a division there were—ayes 50, noes 59; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. HEREFORD and Mr. RUSK were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 56, noes 49; no quorum voting.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move that the committee rise.

Mr. SPEER. Is that in order when the committee is dividing?

Mr. GARFIELD. If the gentleman insists on a call of the roll, he can have it.

Mr. SPEER. I simply inquired if the motion is in order while the committee is dividing.

The CHAIRMAN. Whenever it appears to the Chair or the committee that no quorum is present, a motion that the committee rise is in order, if no motion be made for a call of the roll.

Mr. SPEER. There is a quorum here.

Mr. RUSK. Then why do not they vote?

Mr. SMITH, of Ohio. Is it competent to have a call of the House in committee? I think no motion is in order except that the committee rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The rules prescribe that when the committee finds itself without a quorum the roll shall be called; but what is known as a call of the House is, of course, not in order in the committee. The proper motion is that the committee rise, which the gentleman from Ohio has made.

The question was taken on Mr. GARFIELD'S motion; and it was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WOODFORD reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had under consideration the special order, a bill (H. R. No. 2064) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. McCRARY. I desire to ask unanimous consent of the House that the session of to-morrow be set apart for discussion upon the transportation question. A number of gentlemen have suggested to me that there is a very general desire to accept an invitation to go to Chester, Pennsylvania, on the part of a good many members, and if the session can be given entirely to debate on the transportation question we can progress very far with it, and at the same time accommodate a great many gentlemen who desire to leave the city.

The SPEAKER. That requires unanimous consent.

Mr. POLAND. I have no objection to the arrangement suggested if it will not interfere with our session to-morrow evening.

Mr. McCRARY. It will not.

Mr. GARFIELD. If a majority of the House expect not to be here to do business, of course I will not raise any objection; but I do feel that if we omit these days, the only three days of the week which are given to our appropriation bills, we will cause a very serious loss. I do not know how far gentlemen are going away so as to leave the House without a quorum.

Mr. McCRARY. We shall progress in the business of the House by giving to-morrow to the discussion of the transportation bill as much as we could possibly do in any other way.

Mr. GARFIELD. Does the gentleman propose to take any action whatever on his bill to-morrow?

Mr. McCRARY. None whatever. I propose that the whole day be devoted to discussion, and that no vote shall be taken.

Mr. E. H. ROBERTS. If the gentleman gave notice that he would press his bill to-morrow, would it not have the same result as if he had obtained unanimous consent? He has control of the bill.

Mr. McCRARY. The House, by a majority vote, might go into Committee of the Whole on the appropriation bill.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. If there is to be discussion on so important a measure, it is surely important that gentlemen should hear it.

Mr. McCRARY. We take it for granted that those who desire to hear the discussion will be here.

The SPEAKER. Gentlemen will observe that a large part of the discussion does not proceed on a day of that kind; gentlemen decline to speak. Is there objection to devoting to-morrow to debate only on the transportation bill, with the evening session for the purpose for which Wednesday and Thursday evenings have heretofore been given, the consideration of the revision of the laws?

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Is the arrangement to be made with the understanding that the debate of to-morrow is to be the same as at the evening sessions, debate irrespective of the Committee on Railways and Canals?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not understand how that is to be.

Mr. E. H. ROBERTS. I object to the arrangement.

Mr. GARFIELD. Then I give notice that I shall ask the House to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the legislative appropriation bill immediately after the morning hour to-morrow.

Mr. McCRARY. And I shall ask the House to proceed with the special order—the transportation bill.

MILITARY ACADEMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. MARSHALL, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2545) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and made a special order immediately after the Indian appropriation bill shall have been disposed of.

Mr. HOLMAN. I reserve all points of order upon the bill.

REDUCTION OF THE ARMY.

Mr. COBURN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2546) to provide for the gradual reduction of the Army of the United States; which was read a first and second time, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. COBURN. I move that this bill be made the special order for the first Tuesday in April, after the morning hour, to the exclusion of all other orders, and from day to day until disposed of.

Mr. GARFIELD. I shall object to that, unless appropriation bills are excepted, that having been done in the case of nearly all the other special orders.

Mr. COBURN. What will be the effect of such an exception?

The SPEAKER. It will place the bill in the same position that the transportation bill now is in—subject to a motion to go into Committee of the Whole on an appropriation bill.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. I must object, unless an exception is made in favor of the report of the Committee on Elections.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that is a proper exception.

Mr. COBURN. Does the gentleman desire to call up his election case on that day?

Mr. SMITH, of New York. We hope to reach it before; if not, then we will call it up on that day.

Mr. COBURN. How long will it take?

Mr. SMITH, of New York. Perhaps three or four hours.

Mr. COBURN. I will not object.

No further objection being made, it was ordered accordingly.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed a bill of the following title; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

An act (S. No. 384) for the benefit of the Louisville and Bardstown Turnpike Company.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed a joint resolution of the following title, with amendments; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 29) authorizing the Secretary of War to detail medical officers of the Army to inquire into and report upon the causes of epidemic cholera.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed, without amendment, bills of the following titles:

An act (H. R. No. 1015) to authorize the President to accept, for citizens of the United States, the jurisdiction of certain tribunals in the Ottoman dominions and Egypt, established, or to be established, under the authority of the Sublime Porte and of the government of Egypt; and

An act (H. R. No. 1956) for the relief of Willard Davis.

EMPLOYÉS OF THE DOOR-KEEPER.

Mr. McKEE. I ask unanimous consent to submit the following resolution at this time:

Resolved, That the Door-keeper be, and he is hereby, directed to report to this House, without delay, the number and classes of all his subordinates and employés, the salary or per diem paid to them in classes, the duties that are being performed by each class, the States and districts from which they are respectively appointed, upon whose recommendations they were so appointed, when they were appointed, what number of supernumeraries are now, and have been, paid out of the enforced or voluntary contributions of one-third of the monthly salary paid to those actually performing the duties, and how many out of each class can, in his opinion, be dispensed with on account of decrease of lack of work under his charge.

Mr. GARFIELD. I object to the resolution being adopted, and move that it be referred to the Committee on Accounts.

Mr. McKEE. I hope the gentleman will not object. It is for information on his own bill.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman consent to the reference?

Mr. McKEE. I do not.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move that the House now adjourn.

Mr. TODD. Pending that motion I move that when the House adjourns to-day it be to meet on Thursday next.

EPISCOPAL CHURCHES IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I ask unanimous consent to report back from the Committee on the District of Columbia a bill simply to approve the act of the Legislature of the District with reference to the Episcopalian churches here. It has been ascertained that there is some defect in their organization, and this bill is simply to give them the powers which they have ordinarily exercised. It is very desirable that the bill should be passed before Easter Sunday, for the reason that the churches hold their elections at that time.

There being no objection, the bill (H. R. No. 2422) to approve an act of the Legislative Assembly of the District of Columbia relative to parishes of the Protestant Episcopal Church was received, and ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ELDREDGE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

THOMAS HARDEMAN, JR.

Mr. WHITELEY, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2547) to remove the political disabilities from Thomas Hardeman, jr., of Bibb County, Georgia, imposed by the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed, two-thirds voting in the affirmative.

Mr. WHITELEY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The question was then taken on the motion to adjourn until Thursday; and upon a division—ayes 44, noes not counted—it was not agreed to.

ASBURY E. ANDERSON.

Mr. CASON, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2348) for the relief of Asbury E. Anderson, a private soldier; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

Mr. McCRARY. I move that the House now take a recess.

The SPEAKER. The House this morning, by unanimous consent, ordered that the session of this evening should be for debate only, upon the transportation bill. The gentlemen from Ohio, Mr. SPRAGUE, will occupy the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

Mr. CONGER. I ask that the session of to-morrow be for debate only, on the transportation bill. The members of the Committee on Commerce, and a great many other members of the House, are quite anxious to go to-morrow to witness the launching of the largest steamship that has ever been built in the United States. We consider it a part of our duty, perhaps, in connection with the question of commerce and ship-building, that we should go there. The business of the House will proceed, if the session of to-morrow be for debate only, and those who desire to witness this interesting event will be able to do so. I have been here for five years, and have not been absent one hour from a business session of this House. I would dislike to go to-morrow if a business session is being held here, and I again ask unanimous consent that the session of to-morrow be for debate only.

Mr. E. H. ROBERTS. I am informed by gentlemen that the committee which would have the morning hour to-morrow does not desire to occupy it. With the understanding that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. McCRARY] will call up his transportation bill immediately after the reading of the Journal, I will withdraw the objection I made.

Mr. PAGE. I believe a bill from the Committee on Mines and Mining is now pending in the morning hour.

The SPEAKER. That will hold its place.

Mr. PAGE. If that bill can go over to the next morning hour, I have no objection to the arrangement proposed.

The SPEAKER. The bill will hold its place in the morning hour until disposed of. The gentleman from New York [Mr. E. H. ROBERTS] having withdrawn his objection, the proposition is again before the House, that by unanimous consent the session of to-morrow shall be devoted to debate only, on the transportation bill, no business whatever to be transacted; the evening session to be given as usual to the revision of the statutes at large. If there be no further objection, this arrangement will be made. The Chair hears none. The gentleman from Maryland, Mr. ALBERT, will act as Speaker pro tempore.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. McCRARY for a recess, it was agreed to; and accordingly (at four o'clock and thirty-five minutes p. m.) the House took a recess until half-past seven o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The House assembled at half-past seven o'clock p. m., Mr. SPRAGUE in the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House meets to-night for debate only, and the bill (H. R. No. 1385) to regulate commerce by railroads in the several States is before the House.

Mr. SCUDDER, of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, I would not address the House on this subject were it not that I feel it my duty to state the reasons that will control my vote on this bill. When we consider the nature of this bill there are two propositions which seem to be involved. The first is the subject-matter of the bill; the second is the mode by which Congress seeks to exercise this power. Now, if you consider the subject-matter of the bill, you will see how wide is its scope, how important its bearing, how extensive its ramifications. There are now 73,539 miles of railroad in this country, which cost $3,159,423,057. Vast in its magnitude, this great property is represented by bonds to the amount of $1,571,578,944, and by capital stock to the amount of $1,607,844,113. When we consider, then, the vast extent of these works and the great amount of capital involved in this property and in this business, we see the importance of any legislation touching this subject. Even the gross annual earnings of this property amount to $473,241,055. The net earnings of this property as a whole are said to amount to about 5.2 per cent.

Now, this great property the bill seeks to vest in a commission composed of nine members; and from the decision of that commission no appeal has been provided. All the power that is reserved in case of a penal suit for taking fares not authorized by the commission is that the defendant must prove affirmatively on his part that the rates are reasonable.

This vast power is not only to be exercised by a commission, but it must be exercised over great highways, the most of which have been created by State authority, by direct contracts between the State and the companies.

There is another very striking thing about this bill; these commissioners are to have the extraordinary power to send for persons and for papers; they are to have the right to investigate the proceedings of these great corporations which have created these highways; to go into the details of their affairs; to examine them in such way as their discretion may determine. It is true some provision has been made with reference to applying to the courts of the United States for the possession of books and papers. But in this free country, under a representative Government, this vast and extraordinary power of sending for persons and papers is to be lodged in nine commissioners, five of whom can exercise that power. It seems to me to be monstrous. It seems to me that neither the people of this country nor the people of any other enlightened country would ever stand the exercise of so great a power.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the learned gentlemen who have presented this bill are sincere undoubtedly; they are zealous, and are backed by strong constituencies no doubt; they have honest motives; but I take it that, when they come to consider this vast subject, they will be induced to retrace to some extent their steps. They claim this power under the right granted by the Constitution to Congress to regulate commerce. Now, how has Congress heretofore regulated commerce? That is a very serious question. In what mode, in what manner, has Congress regulated commerce? Let us see. Congress has established ports of entry (one of the material elements in commerce) where ships, both domestic and foreign, enter; ports for clearance and for the usual business incident to ports of entry. They have exercised the power of regulating commerce by preventing States from taxing commerce as it passes from one State to another, by duties, or imposts, or other restrictions.

The great case which has excited the attention of the gentlemen who have engaged in this debate, and which has always excited the attention of the country, is the case of Gibbons vs. Ogden. Now, that was a very simple case; and it will not warrant any of the deductions which have been made by the learned gentlemen who have discussed this subject.

About the year 1808 a steamboat passed from the wharves of the city of New York to Albany. Fulton and Livingston and many of the mechanical geniuses of that time were engaged in that very great enterprise. It was a success. To reward those distinguished gentlemen, those great pioneers in invention, those men who were far in advance of the age in which they lived, the State of New York enacted a law that the right of navigation in its waters by steam-vessels should be exclusive in certain parties for a limited time. That was resisted. Gibbons was a man well known in my part of the country, a man always antagonistic in his disposition, a man who was always ready for opposition. Many humorous stories are told of him. One is that once in a barber-shop he was charged more than he thought was right; and with the natural element of antagonism in his mind he started an opposition barber-shop. He went once to a watering-place, and they did not give him proper accommodations; and such was his peculiar antagonism of disposition that he started a rival watering-place. When they attacked Gibbons, they attacked the wrong man. To this natural antagonism in his disposition Mr. Gibbons united great force of character and power of mind.

The result of all that litigation was to declare that the exclusive right of navigation in the waters of the State of New York by steam, as granted by that State, was void.

A great many things were said in that opinion, and a great many things said in other opinions pronounced by the Supreme Court of the United States and other learned tribunals; but when we come to examine every decision made by that high tribunal or any other tribunal on this subject, we may sum it all up in these few words: "You seek to impose restrictions on commerce; you cannot do it. Hands off; commerce is free." That is the upshot of it. That is all that was ever decided by any court.

They have held that a passenger coming into the country could not be compelled to pay taxes by State authority. That was, "Hands off; commerce is free." They have held even a bill of lading, which represented interstate commerce or foreign commerce, could not be taxed by State law. Hands off!

Now, Mr. Speaker, this power has never, at any time, been exercised by fixing the rates for which common carriers could transport. Learned gentlemen may read extracts from opinions and learned essays on this subject, but when we come to find the particular subject-matter which has been adjudged, there is no case which declares that the business of transportation can be regulated by Congress by fixing the rates. Can Congress fix the price of a steamboat as a regulation of commerce? And yet a steamboat is one of the elements of commerce. Can Congress fix the price of a railroad-car? And yet a railroad-car is one of the elements of commerce. Can Congress declare how much it shall cost per mile to build a railroad? And yet these are all elements of commerce, as well as anything else; because without steamboats, without railroads, without cars, without locomotives, without the means of transportation, commerce cannot be carried on.

Now, again, I submit to these learned gentlemen that Congress connot compel a railroad company, created by a State, to transport beyond the State limits. I think no gentleman will deny that Congress cannot compel railroads created by State authority to transport beyond the State limits.

This transportation from State to State is made by mutual arrangement with the railroads by lease or by contracts, but, though they are made by mutual arrangement, it is certainly one test of the power that the local railroad created by a State—and the most of these railroads are—cannot be compelled by Congress to transport beyond the State limits. Inasmuch as Congress cannot compel a railroad to transport beyond its lines, it is a serious element in this question before us. The railroads created by Congress stand on a different ground. Congress, in such instances, has reserved the power to change their charters.

We have steam navigation from State to State, and coastwise from State to State. Has Congress ever attempted to fix the rates of steam navigation? You must consider, so far as the States are concerned, they have reserved the right in their charters to limit the rates, and the companies incorporated have accepted the contracts as granted by the State Legislature. They are contracts, and have been accepted, and accepted with these conditions, that the State can regulate them. According to this bill, though by the contract the State can regulate the rates of fares, it is sought to transfer to another tribunal outside of the State this very power of fixing the rates, and that produces at once conflict between State authority and the authority of the United States.

But the argument derived from this fact of the State having reserved the right to fix the rates cannot help the parties in this case, because that was a right reserved in the contract between the State and the company which was incorporated, and the company accepted the charter on these express conditions.

This peculiarity exists in this bill, to which I call the attention of gentlemen who have it in charge: by this bill the commissioners can fix the rate one day and file their schedule of rates with the clerk of the district court, and the next day they can change those rates, and the rates can be changed just as often as these commissioners please.

It is contended on the other side that fixing the rates is the regulation of commerce. I contend, on the contrary, it is not a regulation of commerce, but it is the control of the business itself.

Now, learned gentlemen have cited a great many cases of this sort: that a municipal corporation, for instance, the city of Washington, may regulate cab-hire and the rate of transportation between particular points; that the city of New York, or the city of Philadelphia, may exercise that power. Congress also has exercised power of this sort, and have appointed commissioners for the purpose of determining whether a steamboat is fit for navigation; whether her boilers are in good condition; whether her engine is in a proper condition; whether she has the proper appliances or not. Now, when you look at the question of municipal regulation of the rates of fare for hack-hire, or of rates of fare for ferries, those are police regulations. That great judge, Chief Justice Marshall, when he delivered his opinion in Gibbons vs. Ogden, said the regulation of a ferry was a police regulation. If, then, these are police regulations, they are not regulations of commerce. That is clear.

You grant at once that these various cases, which have been cited by learned gentlemen, go to show that a municipal corporation can fix the regulations and rates for hack hire, can license inns and taverns, can regulate the speed of locomotives within municipalities. They are not, then, under the Constitution, commerce or regulations of commerce by Congress, because the line of distinction in this country has been clear and well defined, and marked by principles which are distinct. It is clear, then, that if these regulations upon which gentleman rely, and which appear so plausible, and almost convincing when stated, are police regulations, they are not regulations of commerce by Congress under the Constitution of the United States.

The history of our railroad combinations is exceedingly simple. I recollect, years ago, traveling in the southern part of the country, toward the Ohio River, in a stage-coach. I met a Tennessee man there. He talked of the enterprise of Tennessee and of the enterprise of Kentucky. "But how, my friend," said I, "how do you claim that?" His answer was, "We build our turnpikes up to the State line of Kentucky, under a promise on the part of the people of Kentucky that they will build their turnpikes so as to go farther up." Now, here two States by local laws sought to have access from the southern part of Tennessee to the Ohio River; but these turnpikes were the creatures of the State. It would have been absurd to suppose that Congress should step in and regulate the rights of transportation from the southern parts of Tennessee to the Ohio River over these turnpikes created by the local authority by fixing the rates of fare. I do not think anybody would have claimed that right.

When we look at the history of the consolidation of railroads we find that it is a very simple history. Like that case in Kentucky and Tennessee, where the people of each State built their turnpikes to the State line for the purpose of facilitating interstate communication, railroads have been built for local purposes in States, as, for instance, from Albany to Schenectady, and so on, step by step, until you got to Buffalo. But the Ohio people stepped in and they made their lines; and the Indiana people stepped in and made their lines; and the Illinois people stepped in and made their lines. These were at first local lines, created by State authority; and the necessity of the case induced the companies controlling them to agree to transport over the whole line. The singularity of this case is that they are all the creatures of State authority and for the public convenience and for the public necessity they carried passengers and merchandise from State to State. Has Congress ever, under any circumstances, claimed the right; has any power ever been exercised which has been sanctioned by any law or the decisions of any court that the business of transportation could be regulated by Congress by fixing the fares?

Mr. FORT. May I ask the gentleman a question there?

Mr. SCUDDER, of New Jersey. I will hear the gentleman's question with the greatest of pleasure.

Mr. FORT. Do I understand the gentleman to claim that these railroads do business with a reference to State lines? I would ask the gentlemen how they do their business? Do they run their lines from State to State, and through the several States?

Mr. SCUDDER, of New Jersey. The answer is very simple. The railroads were created, in the first instance, by State authority, for local purposes. And, after they were created by State authority for local purposes, it was found convenient and necessary for the public interest that they should join by contract or lease so as to go from State to State.

Now, I suppose my learned friend from Illinois [Mr. FORT] would claim that, when they do make these contracts to go from State to State, Congress could fix the rates of fare. That must be his claim. This question has been illustrated by a very strong case, which arose in the State of New Jersey. That case was this: Owing to some jealousy of the Erie Railway existing in the State of New Jersey, created by other corporations, they enacted a law that foreign corporations doing business in the State of New Jersey, and transporting merchandise and passengers across the State, should pay a transit duty of so much per ton and so much per passenger. That road, by means of its vast connections away in the Eastern States, and its vast connections away in the Western States, transported passengers and also goods from New England to the Mississippi River and beyond. The question arose, should the State of New Jersey impose the transit duty? The supreme court of New Jersey held that it could. The court of appeals held that it could not; that that was interstate commerce, and should be free; but they decided in that case, as I said before, to put it into very plain, simple English, "Hands off;" that was all.

Mr. FORT. Will the gentleman let me ask him one question right there?

Mr. SCUDDER, of New Jersey. I will answer any question with the greatest pleasure.

Mr. FORT. The gentleman no doubt admits that when a railroad company, acting within a State, takes upon itself the duty of receiving goods for transportation beyond the State line, it become a common carrier in the sense of an interstate carrier, does it not?

Mr. SCUDDER, of New Jersey. You are right; very well; it becomes a common carrier for the transportation of merchandise and passengers from State to State; and if a State shall say we will tax that transit, then the power of Congress intervenes, or the clause of the Constitution intervenes, and says you cannot do it; but no power has ever yet been exercised to this extent, that Congress can fix the rates of transportation of these common carriers. It never has been done yet, and I do not believe under our railroad system it can be done and stand.

Now let me see a little further. These railroad commissioners can change these rates as often as they please. Take the instance of a city municipality; they pass an ordinance fixing the rates of fare in hacks. Suppose that ordinance was unlawful or unreasonable, why, by that great prerogative writ of certiorari, derived from English law and existing in every State in this Confederacy, the highest tribunal in the State, which represents the King's Bench in England, can remove that ordinance fixing the rates, and if the regulation is unreasonable can declare it void. Where is there any such power here? The arbitrary power granted to these commissioners is without appeal in any sense. Nobody can appeal from it; nobody has any redress. The power is greater than that of any monarch in the world; the power is greater than that of any despotism which exists. How can they appeal? The only method of appeal which is authorized by this bill is that they must affirmatively prove that the rates are reasonable; there is no appeal; no review of the order itself. The commissioners make these orders; they revoke these orders; they file them from time to time, and there is no power anywhere to review them, and I do not know whether, under the system which exists in this Government, under our laws creating the courts of the United States, there is any common-law power to use the prerogative writ of certiorari; but at all events there is no provision of that kind in this bill.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have shown how this consolidation naturally sprung up from existing circumstances. Our friends from the West very naturally feel that they should have cheap transportation; it is a very natural impulse. We can well conceive how it does exist. But you must recollect that there are two sides even to this question. Railroads have been carried into the far West, carried into the wilderness, where lands are fertile, where corn is raised in abundance, and where wheat grows if you only scratch the ground and sow it. They complain when they get away off in this wilderness, off from the seats of commerce and business, off from the markets, that they cannot get a proper price by reason of the cost of transportation. Time will cure all that evil; that same genius and enterprise, that same capital, that same spirit of the American people which has carried the railroad into the wilderness, will ultimately carry people around it, and they will ultimately have a home market. It is in this intervening state of affairs that these gentlemen chafe about it; but the evil will cure itself in time.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I do not like to interrupt my friend, but I should like to say a word.

Mr. SCUDDER, of New Jersey. I have no objection; I have my own views about this matter.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. The gentleman is so good-natured that I thought I would like to state the real reason that we complain.

Mr. SCUDDER, of New Jersey. Very well.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Complaint is not that even from the far West railroads charge so much for a long haul that our products cannot reach market; the complaint is that we have natural highways in our rivers and can have artificial highways in canals by which our surplus can be carried very cheaply; but railroads have been built up, as the gentleman has described, so as to form trunk lines, making one continuous line in the interest of men living in New York City, who absolutely refuse by discriminating rates to permit the West to use those cheap water-lines. That is what we complain of.

Mr. SCUDDER, of New Jersey. I am very glad my friend interrupted me, because I know he is a man who does not interrupt me for any improper purpose. Congress can regulate commerce by deepening our rivers, by removing obstructions therefrom; Congress, under the example set in the construction of those great railroads which span the continent, can construct these canals, and your President has recommended that plan.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. But they are not yet constructed.

Mr. SCUDDER, of New Jersey. There is an interregnum, then, there is an intervening period; but during that invervening period, though you may feel a sense of oppression and wrong; though the railroads may not act justly or wisely—I am not here as their defender; I am here as the defender of a principle only—in the intervening period you have to suffer; and probably this discussion may lead to great results, and bring about some of those results which are in the mind of my learned friend.

Mr. NIBLACK. If these roads chartered by the States do not choose to stop at the proper crossings and junctions with canals and rivers, is not that a matter of State regulation?

Mr. SCUDDER, of New Jersey. The States can do it; they have already exercised that power.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Will the gentleman allow me one word?

Mr. SCUDDER, of New Jersey. Certainly; certainly.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I will not interrupt the gentleman if he objects.

Mr. SCUDDER, of New Jersey. O, go ahead.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Suppose the Mississippi River freezes up, the States of Iowa and Minnesota have to go through other States to reach the open Mississiipp. The State jurisdiction does not extend to the open Mississippi.

Mr. SCUDDER, of New Jersey. Very well; can my friend remedy the evil by doing an unlawful act, to wit, fixing the rates of other people's business?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. We think it is lawful.

Mr. SCUDDER, of New Jersey. Well, just on that point we differ. Now, my purpose was only to state my views and explain my vote.

I will go on and speak to another question in connection with this subject. I have not examined and carefully read the discussion on this bill; but there is another point which I believe has been touched on, and which has impressed my mind very greatly, and it is this The creation of this commission of nine men, five being a quorum,: with the right to exercise this power, is in my judgment an unlawful delegation of legislative power to a commission. I believe the question has been touched upon, but I think it is one which is conclusive, so far as the true bearings of this case are concerned. Now, let us see. Here is a delegation of the power of Congress. If the commissioners fix the rate to-day, they must also fix the termini, because fixing the rate involves that under this act; they must do both. The commissioners then, in every State, exercise a legislative power. They fix the termini; they give the most honest consideration to the subject, we may suppose, (for we may presume that all things are rightly done;) and then they fix the rates, and to-morrow they change the rates, and the next day they may change them again. Is not every act that these commissioners do a legislative act? Now, if it be a legislative act, it then is clearly not in the power of Congress to part with its great powers. We are discussing here every day the tariff laws. Can Congress grant to commissioners the right to fix the customs or rates of duties upon goods imported into this country? Can it delegate that power to them? Commissions have been exceedingly useful in our country and in others in this way: they have been appointed to inquire, and investigate, and report. But Congress has always fixed the rates of duties. If you grant to a commission the right to fix the rates of duties, you strip yourselves, as the representatives of a great government, of the legislative power of Congress. Congress has a right to declare war. If you grant that right to commissioners, why, then commissioners exercise that most extraordinary sovereign power of declaring war. Commissioners frequently fix up treaties of peace, and refer them to the proper tribunal, the President and Senate, for ratification and confirmation; but the power to declare war is in Congress. The power to exercise all these great functions is in Congress. You cannot part with that power, and I should say that if you parted with that power you would be derelict in your duty, and the highest tribunal of this country would say that you had done an act which it was beyond your power to do.

Now, you will see that each determination of those commissioners is final; the last determination is final, and Congress does not ratify their action in any sense. It is not referred to Congress for ratification; it is not referred to Congress for approval. Nay, more; these men in secret sit enthroned above and beyond the power of Congress. You would not trust them to exercise that power upon your farms, or in your business, or in your merchandise. Nay, more; you would declare war and shed your blood before you would grant such a power. But because there is a feeling with reference to these railroads you rush into these extremes and do that which is unlawful.

Now, this is not a judicial act. You can grant judicial powers. There is no plaintiff, there is no defendant, there is no court. As an old civil lawyer said, there is no actor, no reus, no judex. In secret, of their own volition, these committees will exercise this extraordinary power.

Now I would suggest to my learned friend to examine the enumerated powers conferred by the Constitution upon Congress. You cannot then have this power. It is a legislative power. Even the municipality of the city of New York that fixes the rates for the transportation of passengers in hacks, exercised a legislative power by ordinance, as was held by the highest tribunal of the State of New York; it was a local police power.

We all know that commissioners may license pilots, even though it may appear to be against the sound rule of the Constitution of the United States. States have passed pilot laws, and they have been allowed to remain. But they are nothing more than the police regulation of commerce. The business of transportation between this and a foreign country, or coastwise between one State and another where the pilot is used, that business has never been regulated by fixing the rates of transportation. The rate of transportation is not a police regulation, but it is the business itself.

It seems to me a little singular, as I have already remarked, that ferries have been regulated by States and municipalities; that seems somewhat anomalous. In the State of New York, on the Saint Lawrence, the court of common pleas, or the sessions of the counties adjoining the Saint Lawrence, have licensed ferries across that river. That seems to me to be an extraordinary power. But, to come back to the case of Gibbons vs. Ogden, that has been treated as a police arrangement. It is certainly carrying the police arrangement to the highest possible extent. But it has been so recognized; the supreme court of the State of New York has acknowledged that cities licensing taverns, Congress licensing engineers of steamboats, is a police arrangement. There is a bill now before Congress purposing to take away from the commissioners the power of regulation of steamboat navigation; that is, the power to say whether the vessel is in proper condition, or her boilers or her machinery are in proper condition, vesting that power in Congress alone, and in this way, that Congress is to prescribe the rules and regulations.

I submit, then, respectfully to the House that this power cannot be delegated. In a recent case of great interest which arose in my own State a question of this sort was presented: commissioners were appointed to lay out a highway called a boulevard, and those commissioners were empowered by an act of the Legislature to apportion certain taxes which were to be raised for the construction and maintenance of that boulevard on certain districts. The court held that that was a sovereign power, the power of apportionment, and that it could not be delegated. It is true you have your assessors who assess upon valuations, who assess the property prescribed by the act of the Legislature. But those assessors, under the powers which existed in our State governments—and those powers are sovereign except as they are limited by the constitution of the State and of the United States—those assessors have not the right to apportion those taxes as they please. They can assess taxes, but not apportion them, because that is a delegation of the sovereign power of the State. That sovereign power in this country, where we have no lords paramount, is in the two branches of Congress and the President of the United States, or in the two branches of the State Legislature and the governor of the State.

Now, let me ask you, candid, honest man as you are, when those commissioners fix the rates of transportation, does Congress fix them? Take that question home and consider it. Does this Congress fix the rates? The fixing the rates is the regulation of commerce claimed by the advocates of this bill. If Congress does not fix the rates, and the commissioners do fix them, then you grant away the power to regulate commerce, as you claim it, and vest it in commissioners.

I have, with the indulgence of the House, presented my views of the subject of this bill in a rather cursory manner.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Will the gentleman allow me to call his attention to one provision of the Constitution which I think supports his position?

Mr. SCUDDER, of New Jersey. With the greatest pleasure in the world.

Mr. ELDREDGE. It seems to me that he ought not to pass it by in his speech. The gentleman claims that the commissioners, having the power to fix the rates, necessarily have the power to fix the termini.

Mr. SCUDDER, of New Jersey. Certainly, that is clear.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I agree entirely with the gentleman in his position. Now, would not that enable them to violate this provision of the Constitution: "No preference shall be given by any regulation of commerce or revenue to the ports of one State over those of another?"

Mr. SCUDDER, of New Jersey. They might do it, not purposely, but inadvertently.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Would they not almost necessarily discriminate against one port in favor of another?

Mr. SCUDDER, of New Jersey. In all human probability they would. At all events, the answer to my learned friend is this: they might do it, and probably would do it. Therefore, in that sense, they would go against a plain and clear provision of the Constitution of the United States.

But if they did do so, where is the remedy? Where is the appeal? Where is the right of review? What tribunal can review it? Why, you part with your power, and you give it to five men—this vast power. The evil sought to be remedied may be great; but I think that the remedy proposed would be infinitely worse, if it could be carried into effect.

[Mr. HOLMAN addressed the House. His remarks will appear in the Appendix.]

[Mr. WILLIE addressed the House. His remarks will appear in the Appendix.]

Mr. McCRARY. I move that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at nine o'clock and forty-five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

By Mr. AVERILL: The memorial of the Legislature of Minnesota, for an appropriation for the improvement of the Mississippi River from Saint Anthony's Falls to Sauk Rapids, to the Committee on Commerce.

Also, resolutions of the Legislature of Minnesota, in favor of a preliminary survey of the country between Saint Croix Falls and the Upper Mississippi River and Lake Superior, with a view to establishing water communication, by canal and locks and dams, between the navigable waters of said rivers and lakes, to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. CASON: The petition of Asbury E. Anderson, for relief, to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. COBURN: The memorial of the State board of education of the State of Indiana, asking Congress to grant to the State, for a polytechnic institution of learning, the arsenal grounds at Indianapolis, to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. HATCHER: The petition of Susan Giles, widow of Joseph Giles, formerly a private in Company C, One hundred and thirtieth Illinois Volunteers, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. HAYS: The petition of 46 workingmen of Bibb Furnace, Alabama, in opposition to the imposition of a tariff duty on tea and coffee; in opposition to any increase in internal taxes; and in favor of the repeal of the second section of the act of June 6, 1872, which reduced, by 10 per cent., duties on certain foreign imports, to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. MAGEE: The petition of 144 citizens of Greenwood Township, Perry County, Pennsylvania, of similar import, to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. MAGINNIS: The petition of citizens of Montana Territory for the payment of the claim of the Southern Methodist publishing house at Nashville, Tennessee, to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. MAYNARD: The petition of S. S. Ryan, late captain Company H, Sixth Tennessee Volunteers, for arrears of pay, to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. MONROE: The petition of citizens of Marshallville, Wayne County, Ohio, for the prepayment of postage on all printed matter, to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

Also, papers relating to the claim of Thomas F. Carter, to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. PARKER, of Missouri: The petition of Koch, Chew & Co., and others, of Saint Joseph, Missouri, for the abolition of the import duty on mass or stick licorice, to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Also, the petition of George W. McKean, to be reimbursed for outlays made while postmaster at Lexington, Missouri, to the Committee on Claims.

Also, resolutions of the State grange of the State of Missouri, in favor of liberal appropriations for the improvement of the Mississippi River and its tributaries, to the Committee on Commerce.

Also, resolutions of the State grange of the State of Missouri, representing 100,000 Patrons of Husbandry, asking that the proceeds of the sales of the public lands be donated to the States for educational purposes, to the Committee on Education and Labor.

By Mr. SAYLER, of Indiana: The petition of certain members of the bar in Northern Indiana, for a United States district and circuit court at Fort Wayne, Indiana, to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. SENER: The petition of John C. Cox, of Stafford County, Virginia, for a pension, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. SOUTHARD: The petition of George W. Voorhees, of Coshocton County, Ohio, praying Congress to set aside the action of the court-martial dismissing him from the service, and for such a change of the record as will show an honorable discharge, to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. STRAIT: Resolutions of the Legislature of Minnesota, asking for the establishment of a post-route from Marshall, Minnesota, to Dell Rapids, Dakota Territory, to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

By Mr. WHITEHEAD: The memorial of citizens of Buckingham County, Virginia, in regard to the tax on tobacco, to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. WILSON, of Indiana: Papers relating to the claim of Ira Foster, for a pension, to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions and War of 1812.

By Mr. ———: The petition of George W. Taylor, of Pennsylvania, in relation to the centennial celebration at Philadelphia, and that military displays and military weapons be not allowed at the exposition, to the Committee on the Centennial Celebration and Proposed National Census of 1875.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, March 18, 1874.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested:

A bill (H. R. No. 2543) in relation to mineral lands;

A bill (H. R. No. 2547) to relieve from political disabilities Thomas Hardeman, jr., of Georgia; and

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair presents a communication, in the form of a petition, from Mrs. P. R. Lawrence, of New York, on behalf of the "Harry Hill saloon mass meeting," informing the Senate that the tidal wave of temperance will soon reach Washington, and the petition asks that the band of praying women may be received at the bar of the Senate, conducted by the Chaplain; and that the present occupant of the chair, Senator CHANDLER, and Senator SPRAGUE be appointed a committee to receive them at the bar of the Senate. [Laughter.] This paper will be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented a memorial of the Legislature of Wisconsin, in favor of cheap transportation from the West to the sea-board; which was referred to the Select Committee on Transportation Routes to the Sea-board.

He also presented the memorial of the Legislature of Wisconsin, asking that bounties be granted to the surviving soldiers of the Mexican war; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan, presented the petition of James N. Thorp and 322 others, citizens of Wyandotte, Michigan, praying Congress not to restore the duty on tea and coffee, or increase internal taxes, and that the second section of the act of June 6, 1872, reducing the duty upon manufactured cottons, woolens, &c., be repealed; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a memorial of 1,150 citizens of Michigan, praying for the establishment of a general and permanent system of international arbitration; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. SCOTT. I present the petition of George Washington Taylor, of Chester County, Pennsylvania, who is a member of the Society of Friends, urging many reasons why the centennial exhibition should be held, being both national and international in its features; putting this question: "Would it not be truly a love-feast for all the world, in which all nations could unite in the bond of peace?" and closing with this prayer:

> Pardon the suggestion from a member of a religious body, opposed to war, (though true in their allegiance,) that Congress ordain that no military displays nor use of military weapons be permitted to mingle with this eminently peaceable and friendly exhibition and universal demonstration of gratitude.

I move the reference of this petition to the Committee on Appropriations, as that subject is now before that committee.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSTON presented the petition of James H. Parker, grandson and heir, and for the coheirs, of Thomas Parker, deceased, praying indemnification for spoliations committed by the French prior to the year 1801; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented the memorial of Thomas W. White, praying to be paid an amount of money received and receipted for by Major-General Curtis; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. WEST presented the petition of Albrecht & Plagge, praying to be indemnified for injuries to their plantation caused by the Army of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont, presented petitions of citizens of Wisconsin, West Virginia, Iowa, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, and Massachusetts, praying that the President of the United States and the Senate and House of Representatives would seek by an express stipulation between nations, that they will not resort to war until peaceful arbitration has been tried, and never without a full year's notice; which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Texas, presented the petition of George A. O'Brien, grandson and heir, and for the coheirs, of Richard O'Brien, deceased, praying to be indemnified for spoliations committed by the French prior to the year 1801; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. MITCHELL. I present a memorial of citizens of Oregon, signed by 1802 persons, praying for the passage of the bill introduced by myself in aid of the Portland, Dalles and Salt Lake Railroad. In their memorial they say:

> Your memorialists respectfully represent that the entire people of Oregon and of the adjacent Territories are deeply interested in obtaining railway communication with the East; that the vast interior country between the Cascade Mountains and Salt Lake is without means of transportation, and that the Portland, Dalles and Salt Lake Railroad is an enterprise calculated to assist greatly the wants of commerce, and to develop a country rich in natural resources. The isolated condition of this entire region is a constant drawback to its growth and prosperity. Your memorialists would respectfully state that the bill introduced by Senator MITCHELL, asking aid for this enterprise, is in the true interests of commerce and of territorial development. The enterprise itself is entitled to take rank as a national work, and as such demands, as we think, the favorable attention of Congress. We, therefore, citizens of Oregon, respectfully express a wish that the bill may pass.

The memorial was referred to the Committee on Railroads.

Mr. BOREMAN. I present the petition of J. F. Caldwell, M. D., representing that he has invented a railroad to be placed at the bottom of rivers, bays, &c., upon which cars with floors above the surface of the usual stage of the water can be placed for the transportation of passengers from shore to shore without interrupting the navigation of the water by ships, &c., and by which bridges can be rendered unnecessary, and praying that he be granted the exclusive right to use the same. I move the reference of the petition to the Committee on Patents.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BOREMAN presented the petition of Nancy Flesher, of West Virginia, praying to be allowed a pension on account of the services of her son, James Flesher, as a carrier of dispatches and a scout during the late war; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented the petition of Daniel M. Miller, a citizen of the county of Wirt, West Virginia, praying that he may be placed on the pension-rolls; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. SARGENT presented the petition of John Barry, late captain First United States Cavalry, praying to be restored to the rank and commission held by him on the 31st of December, 1870; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN presented a petition of citizens of Macon, Georgia, praying for the removal of the political disabilities of Thomas Hardeman, a citizen of that State; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. STEVENSON presented the memorial of Andrew J. Vandegrift, of Covington, Kenton County, Kentucky, praying an extension of his patent for grain separators; which was referred to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. OGLESBY. I present a preamble and resolutions of the Board of Trade of the city of Chicago, concurring in resolutions passed by the Board of Trade of the city of Buffalo, in regard to appropriations for clearing out the Detroit River at a point near the Lime Kiln. Application has been made to the present Congress to reduce the usual appropriation for the work from $600,000 to $100,000. These resolutions protest against the limitation, and ask that the appropriation may be, under the circumstances, continued at $600,000. I move the reference of the preamble and resolutions to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GORDON. I present a memorial of certain leading business houses of New York, protesting against the present system of finance as hostile to their interest and to the interests of the producing classes; protesting also against conferring the control of the money of the country in a few favored banking institutions, and asking for a change in the present system, by the issue of convertible and reconvertible bonds. I move that this memorial be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GORDON presented the petition of the agricultural convention of the cotton States, praying a modification of the patent laws; which was referred to the Committee on Patents.

He also presented the petition of D. W. Champagne, of Columbus, Georgia, grandson and heir, and for the coheirs of John R. Champagne, deceased, praying to be indemnified for spoliations committed by the French prior to the year 1801; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. PRATT. I present a petition numerously signed by citizens of the eleventh congressional district, in the State of Indiana, respectfully praying Congress to take steps as promptly as possible, in cooperation with other governments, for the settlement of international difficulties by arbitration, and the formation of a high court of nations, or such other pacific measures as their wisdom may suggest, for the settlement of international difficulties without a resort to arms. I move the reference of this petition to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The motion was agreed to.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. WRIGHT, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers in the case of W. S. Mitchell be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Claims.

On motion of Mr. MITCHELL, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers of W. L. Adams be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Claims.

On motion of Mr. PRATT, it was Ordered, That Mrs. Maria A. Lee be allowed to withdraw from the files of the Senate the papers in her claim for pension, received from the House of Representatives during the last session of Congress.

AMENDMENT TO AN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. JOHNSTON. My colleague [Mr. LEWIS] being sick, has requested me to offer for him an amendment to the bill (H. R. No. 1009) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and printed.

The motion was agreed to.

SARAH F. STAPLER.

Mr. WRIGHT. Yesterday the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. PRATT,] from the Committee on Claims, reported back the petition of Sarah F. Stapler, in behalf of the heirs of the late John Ross, praying compensation for property destroyed by rebels during the war of the rebellion, adversely. Upon the suggestion of a member of the House, who had given his attention to this claim, but had no opportunity to appear before the committee, and also with the consent of the Senator who reported the petition to the Senate, I move that the order discharging the committee be reconsidered, and that the petition be recommitted.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. PRATT, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of the Milwaukee and Rock River Canal Company, praying Congress, by joint resolution, to so construe "a resolution for the relief of the State of Wisconsin," approved July 1, 1864, as to entitle them to reimbursement out of the canal land fund for certain amounts paid out by them, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the committee was discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

Mr. MITCHELL, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Matilda Barnett and sisters, praying compensation for property destroyed by United States troops during the late war, reported adversely thereon; and the committee was discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

Mr. WRIGHT. I am instructed by the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the claim of Elkanah Huddleston, praying compensation for services rendered as second lieutenant, from August 10, 1862, to January 13, 1863, to report it back adversely. We find that his petition was reported upon on the 3d of January, 1871, adversely. It was afterward recommitted to the committee without any additional evidence. They concur in the former report, and ask now that the claim be disallowed by the Senate; not that the committee be discharged, but that this report adverse to the claim be adopted.

The report was adopted.

Mr. OGLESBY, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, inclosing a report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, in reference to the necessity of legislation in behalf of the Mission Indians of California, and asking for an appropriation of $150,000 to meet their immediate wants and necessities, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the committee was discharged from the further consideration of the subject.

Mr. INGALLS, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1954) granting a pension to Henry B. Rider, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1445) granting a pension to William H. Edwards, reported adversely thereon, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Texas, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 497) granting a pension to William Haffords, of South Yarmouth, Massachusetts, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 414) granting a pension to Alice Mullally, mother of John Mullally, of Company C, Second Wisconsin Cavalry Volunteers, reported adversely thereon, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Thomas H. Babcock, late Company C, One hundred and seventy-seventh New York Volunteers, praying for an increase of pension, reported adversely thereon, and the committee was discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

Mr. DENNIS, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2225) to amend the act entitled "An act to prevent the extermination of fur-bearing animals in Alaska," approved July 1, 1870, reported it without amendment.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. SCOTT asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 599) relating to witnesses and to proceedings before congressional committees; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. SCOTT. In view of the statements made by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] yesterday, I will state that this is the same bill introduced by me about two years ago; and in view of the statements made by him I would recommend it to the speedy action of the Judiciary Committee. I move that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SCOTT asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 600) for the relief of Captain J. B. Thompson; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. WEST asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 601) granting a pension to Mrs. Janet Scott West, widow of Cato C. West, deceased; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. SARGENT asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 602) for the relief of John Barry; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. JOHNSTON (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 603) to approve an act of the Legislative Assembly of the District of Columbia relating to parishes of the Protestant Episcopal Church; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. HITCHCOCK asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 604) to confirm an agreement made with the Shoshone Indians (Eastern band) for the purchase of the south part of their reservation in Wyoming Territory; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. SPENCER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 605) to amend the act entitled "An act to provide for the better security of life on board of vessels propelled in whole or in part by steam, and for other purposes," approved February 28, 1871; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WINDOM asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 606) for the relief of settlers on railroad lands; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. WRIGHT (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 607) to provide for the opening and improvement for navigation of certain water-routes therein named, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Select Committee on Transportation Routes to the Seaboard, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CONOVER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 608) granting the right of way through the public lands in the States of Florida and Alabama to construct and maintain a railroad; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Railroads, and ordered to be printed.

TOPOGRAPHICAL SURVEY OF THE CAPITOL GROUNDS.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I ask the Senate to take up a bill which passed the Senate some days ago, and which has been returned from the House of Representatives with an amendment. The Senate made an appropriation of $5,000 for the employment of a topographical engineer in relation to the public grounds around the Capitol. The House has reduced the appropriation from $5,000 to $3,000. I think we can get along with that amount of money, and I ask for action on the amendment of the House.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. No. 360) making an appropriation for a topographical survey of the Capitol grounds and plans for improving the same.

The amendment of the House of Representatives was to strike out in line 1 the word "five," and in lieu thereof to insert the word "three;" so as to make the appropriation $3,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

The amendment was concurred in.

CHANGE OF A VESSEL'S NAME.

Mr. SPENCER. I am instructed by the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2228) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to change the name of the propeller William M. Tweed, of Buffalo, to report it back without amendment. There is no objection to the bill; and to save time I ask for its present consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill; which proposes to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to change the name of the propeller William M. Tweed, of Buffalo, owned by the Union Steamboat Company, a corporation of the State of New York, to Newburgh, and to grant the vessel proper marine papers in the latter name.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. It ought to be stated what the object or necessity is.

Mr. SPENCER. The object of the bill is to change the name of this propeller. The present name is William M. Tweed.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. That is apparent on the face of it; but what is the necessity for it?

Mr. SPENCER. It is asked for by numerous citizens of Buffalo, the owners of the vessel.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Is there any report?

Mr. SPENCER. It is not usual to make a report in such cases.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. It is not a matter of course to change the name of a vessel; but if there is any special reason for it, very well.

Mr. SPENCER. The only reason is that the name is distasteful to the owners.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. That may be; but she may have a bad reputation for sea service. A ship may have never foundered at sea, but she may have a bad reputation on account of bad qualities, and her owner comes here to get the name changed; and in such a case that is not a good thing to do. If there is a special reason, of course I do not object to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report the name of the vessel to be changed.

The CHIEF CLERK. William M. Tweed.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The name would not affect her sailing. She might stand rough weather, notwithstanding her name.

Mr. SPENCER. I hope the Senator will not object.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Let me inquire if there is any report. It is not a trifling matter to change the name of a ship.

Mr. SPENCER. There is no written report on the subject.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Is there any special reason? Has she been cast away by disaster?

Mr. SPENCER. There is no special reason except that the name is distasteful to the owners.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Is that all?

Mr. SPENCER. That is all.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Then I think it very trifling legislation.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THE CALENDAR.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further morning business, the Secretary will report the Calendar.

Mr. SARGENT. I ask the Senate to take up and consider at the present time Senate bill No. 176, to encourage the establishment of public marine schools, which was reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is a departure from the rule. The morning hour has been by our rule devoted to bills not subject to objection. If the Senator knows that the bill will create any opposition, I hope he will not press the motion.

Mr. SARGENT. My impression is that there is not a Senator in the Chamber who will object to this bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. We shall reach it in its order after awhile.

Mr. SARGENT. I shall not insist against the objection of the Senator, but it is a bill of great public interest, and I desire early action on it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report the first bill on the Calendar.

SEBASTIAN REICHERT.

The first bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 419) for the relief of Sebastian Reichert; which was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill provides for paying to Sebastian Reichert, or his legal representatives, $600, being the amount of the consideration money (and actual costs attending suits required by the Commissioner of the General Land Office to be instituted) paid for the northeast quarter of the southeast quarter, the southeast quarter of the northeast quarter, the north half of the northeast quarter, the southwest quarter of the northeast quarter, all in section 4, and the north half of the northwest quarter, in section 3, all in township 1 south, of range 10 west, of the third meridian; and which lands had previously to their entry been in part confirmed under previous right, and the title to the same under the previous confirmation decided by the Supreme Court of the United States.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ARMY PAY DEPARTMENT.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 320) to increase the Pay Department of the Army.

Mr. LOGAN. Let that bill be laid aside for the present. I want to see what the action of the House will be.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be laid aside.

SILOMA DECK.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 192) for the relief of Siloma Deck, which was considered as in Committee of the Whole. The bill authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to audit and settle the loss sustained by Mrs. Siloma Deck, in the year 1862, by depredations committed by the Sioux Indians in Minnesota, and to pay such a sum as he shall think right and proper, not exceeding $1,095.37; which settlement shall be in full for all claims arising from the depredations.

An amendment was reported by the Committee on Indian Affairs, in line 8, after the word "appropriated," to strike out the words "such a sum as he shall think right and proper, not exceeding;" so as to read:

And he is hereby authorized to pay, from any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $1,095.39.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

L. S. CAMPBELL.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1223) for the relief of L. S. Campbell, which was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill proposes to direct the Quartermaster-General to pay L. S. Campbell, out of any money appropriated for the Quartermaster's Department, the sum of $224.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CENTENNIAL MEDALS.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1753) to authorize medals commemorating the one hundredth anniversary of the first meeting of the Continental Congress and of the Declaration of Independence.

Mr. WEST. As that bill never appears to have been reported upon by any committee, I object to its consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator move to refer it?

Mr. WEST. Yes, sir; to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

SUSAN A. SHELBY.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 433) for the relief of Susan A. Shelby; which was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Mrs. Susan A. Shelby, of Port Gibson, Mississippi, $10,351.02, in full of her claim for cotton captured and sold by the United States.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Is there a report in that case? If there is I should like to hear it.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. MERRIMON on the 4th of February:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Mrs. Susan A. Shelby, praying compensation for cotton seized at Port Gibson, Mississippi, in 1864, have had the petition, proofs taken, &c., accompanying the same, under consideration, and beg leave to submit this report:

The facts established and presented in support of the claim of the claimant are substantially and sufficiently set forth and referred to in a report made by the Senate Committee on Claims during the second session Forty-first Congress, (Senate Report No. 186,) and the same is made part of this report, and herewith filed. This claim has been continuously before Congress since the 28th of May, A. D. 1868, and favorably recommended in both branches of Congress, but has never been finally acted upon. The committee are of opinion that the claim is a just one, and ought to be paid. They report back the accompanying bill, and recommend that it be passed.

"[Forty-first Congress, second session.—Senate Report No. 186.]

"Mr. KELLOGG made the following report, (to accompany bill S. No. 942:)

"The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 942) for the relief of Susan A. Shelby, have had the same under consideration, and make the following report:

"The claimant is a widow lady, and during a portion of the war resided at Port Gibson with her family, consisting of two daughters. At the time of the secession of Mississippi she was the owner of a small property in Port Gibson, and possessed in her own right thirty-five slaves, whom at an early period during the war she emancipated.

"During the progress of the war, and as early as 1863, she invested what money she had in cotton, with the hope of saving something for her children, and also to enable her to pay off a small mortgage on her homestead, and believing that the Union forces would aid her in getting it into the Federal lines, she succeeded in purchasing one hundred bales of upland cotton, which she secreted on the plantation of a friendly neighbor in the vicinity of Port Gibson. It appears that she was encouraged by General McPherson and leading Union citizens to adopt that course as the best way to save something for herself and children.

"After she had purchased the one hundred bales of cotton, she obtained permits, first from General McPherson, then from General Slocum, and lastly from General Dana, (the successive commanders at Vicksburgh,) to transport her cotton to Vicksburgh. After considerable delay she obtained the necessary transportation to move the cotton to the river, but the small detail of Union soldiers which had been furnished to protect the cotton in transitu were overpowered, the cotton was captured by the rebels, and carried to a place where they stored their cotton.

"Incited by this attempt to get her cotton out of the confederate lines, and also by her well-known loyalty, the confederates threatened her with personal violence, and, by a system of persecution and abuse, drove the claimant from her house. She fled first to Vicksburgh, and thence to New Orleans, where she remained until the close of hostilities.

"After that section of the country had been brought under the authority of the United States, Colonel George W. Jackson, commanding the Ninth Indiana Cavalry, was sent to Grand Gulf and Port Gibson, with orders to capture and secure to the United States all the confederate cotton in Claiborne County, Mississippi. In pursuance of such orders he collected a large amount of cotton, which was turned over to the Treasury agents, or sent to Colonel Earle, who was then stationed at Rodney, to be by him turned over to the Treasury agents, and shipped either to Memphis and Cincinnati or New Orleans for sale. It appears that one hundred bales of cotton belonging to claimant were stored with the confederate cotton, and on or about the 1st day of June, 1865, it was seized by Colonel Jackson's command, together with other cotton. Of this cotton one hundred and thirty-four bales were turned over to A. A. Dewey, Treasury agent at Port Gibson, and by him shipped to Memphis, and thence to Cincinnati, where it was sold by William P. Mellen, general agent of the Treasury Department. The proceeds of seventy-two bales of this cotton were released by order of the President to a Mrs. Miller; the remaining sixty-two bales were sold; the net proceeds, amounting to $7,294.68, were paid into the Treasury.

"The remaining thirty-eight bales were shipped by Colonel Jackson, with a lot of one hundred and sixty-five bales, to Colonel Earle, at Rodney, where it was turned over to Treasury Agent J. J. Mushaway, by whom it was shipped to New Orleans, where it was sold, and the net proceeds, amounting to the sum of $13,270.93, were paid into the Treasury. Of this amount claimant is entitled only to the value of thirty-eight bales, and as the cotton realized only $80.43 per bale, it would amount to $3,056.34. The amount realized for the sixty-two bales added to this sum would amount to $10,351.02.

"Colonel Jackson admits that Mrs. Shelby's cotton was seized and turned over to the Treasury agents, and says that he would have released her cotton and returned it to her, but that he had no authority to do so. This Colonel Jackson states in a letter directed to claimant at the time of the seizure; and he reports it in a letter to General Grant, in which he recommends a settlement of the claim. This letter bears the following indorsement by General Grant: 'I would join with Colonel Jackson in recommending that a fair settlement be made with Mrs. Shelby for cotton of hers which Government got actual possession of.'

"The loyalty of claimant, her ownership of the cotton, and the seizure of the same by Colonel Jackson's forces, are well established by the concurrent testimony of many witnesses, and are admitted by the Federal officers who were there at the time and acquainted with all the facts. Not only was claimant loyal, but she did all she could in aid of the Federal Army. The main difficulty connected with this claim appears to have been in identifying the cotton and in tracing the proceeds of it into the Treasury of the United States. The House Committee on Claims was strongly impressed with the justice of this claim, and made several attempts to get official evidence of the receipt of the proceeds by the Treasury Department, but apparently failed to do so; notwithstanding this they recommended a bill for the payment of $5,000, which passed the House at the last session.

"Since the House bill has been before this committee, the Treasury Department have been requested to furnish information on this subject. A full report of all cotton seized in the county of Claiborne, Mississippi, was sent to the committee. All previous calls, it seems, had only requested a return of the facts concerning Mrs. Shelby's cotton, but as her name did not appear in the records in connection with this cotton, it having been stored with the confederate cotton, the return from the Department did not furnish the necessary evidence.

"The return to the last call upon the Department furnishes all the facts connected with the seizure, shipment, and sale of all the cotton taken in that county; and in comparing the evidence in this case with the dates of seizures and shipments of cotton from that county, your committee are satisfied that her cotton was seized by Colonel Jackson's command; that it was turned over to the Treasury agents, shipped, and sold as above described, and the proceeds thereof paid into the Treasury of the United States, amounting to the sum of $10,351.02. They therefore report the accompanying bill, as a substitute for House bill No. 408, and recommend its passage."

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I do not know who has charge of this bill; but I want to know why this claim cannot be prosecuted before the Court of Claims without action here.

Mr. SCOTT. The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. MERRIMON] reported this bill, and has examined the case fully. He can answer any questions that are put as to the facts of the case. I am not sure whether or not I can answer the interrogatory put by the Senator from New Jersey; but the probability is that the statute of limitations in this case interposes between this claimant and her remedy in the Court of Claims. The case, however, is one which upon its merits, even if the statute of limitations were a bar to proceedings in the Court of Claims, would at any time, when fully considered, command the attention and the assent of Congress. I do not know of any case since I have been in the Committee on Claims which has disclosed so great merit, so much suffering upon the part of the claimant, and now when her case has been reached in this form, I trust there will be no further objection made to her securing what is undoubtedly due her.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I certainly do not wish to throw any obstacle in the way of the settlement of a just claim. I wanted to be sure that there was not in this bill some dangerous precedent in reference to these cotton claims. I know that that thing is possible; but with the assurance of the chairman of the Committee on Claims, I do not object to this bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC MARINE SCHOOLS.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 176) to encourage the establishment of public marine schools; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The Committee on Naval Affairs reported the bill with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause, and in lieu thereof to insert the following:

That in order to promote nautical education, and to educate officers and seamen for the merchant and naval marine in scientific and practical navigation, and in the arts, trades, and occupations pertaining to seamanship, the Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized and empowered to supply, upon the written application of the governor of a State or the authorities of the cities hereinafter named, a suitable vessel, with all her apparel, together with charts, books, and instruments, provided that the same may be conveniently spared from the naval service, to be used in the establishment of public marine schools in each of the ports of New York, Boston, Philadelphia, Baltimore, and San Francisco; and the ships and material so furnished by the Government may be loaned to the States or cities in which said ports are situated, upon the condition that the said States or cities establish, at their own expense, a nautical school for the education of youths desirous of entering the merchant or naval marine; and where such are already engaged in that service, of suitable age, they may be offered facilities for improvement in their nautical education: Provided, That if any such school shall be discontinued, the property aforesaid shall be returned to the United States.

SEC. 2. That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized, on the application of the governor of any of said States or authorities of said cities establishing such schools, to detail officers of the Navy to act as president, superintendent, or instructors of such schools: Provided, That no persons shall be sentenced to, or received at, such schools as a punishment, or commutation of punishment, for crime.

Mr. SARGENT. The committee have authorized me to move to strike out in line 4 of the amendment the words "and naval," and the words "or naval" in line 19 after the word "merchant" and before the word "marine" in each case.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SARGENT. The object of this bill is to make available for the merchant marine and for the Navy of the United States, that element of youths in our large commercial cities most valuable if properly utilized, but most destructive to society if allowed to run to waste as at present; to provide them with the means of an education in seamanship, thus filling up our merchant marine and Navy with American citizens instead of as now with poor material drawn from nearly all the countries of the world. It is believed that this measure will produce this beneficial result. I will state that there are four of these schools under the patronage of the English government in the Thames, and that they produce results which are very much in favor of the system.

The amendment of the Committee on Naval Affairs, as amended, was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

DEPARTMENTAL CONTRACTS.

The next business on the Calendar was the joint resolution (H. R. No. 52) explanatory of resolution approved January 31, 1868, entitled "A resolution limiting contracts for stationery and other supplies in the Executive Departments to one year;" which was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It provides that the resolution approved January 31, 1868, entitled "A resolution limiting contracts for stationery and other supplies in the Executive Departments to one year," shall not be held or construed to apply to or include mail-bags, mail locks and keys, postal cards, postage-stamps, newspaper-wrappers, or stamped envelopes.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HENRY C. CAREY.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 259) to authorize the proper accounting officers of the Treasury to settle with Henry C. Carey; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It provides for a settlement with Henry C. Carey for his services as acting consul of the United States at Elsinore, Denmark, from the 1st of July, 1872, to the time when the consul of the United States took charge of the office, and to allow him compensation for that period of time at the rate now allowed by law to a United States consul at that place.

The Committee on Commerce reported an amendment to add to the bill the following proviso:

Provided, That any fees collected and appropriated to his use by said Henry C. Carey during said time shall be deducted from the amount paid to him.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BOREMAN. Is there a written report in that case? I should like to understand what the bill means.

Mr. SPENCER. There is no written report; but there is a letter from the Secretary of State, giving the reasons for the bill. I reported it.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

Mr. BOREMAN. I understand there is a letter from the Secretary of State. I wish to know what the bill is about.

Mr. SPENCER. If the Secretary cannot find the letter, I will explain the bill. Mr. Carey is an Englishman who, during the absence of the American consul at Elsinore for about a year, performed the duties; but he cannot draw the pay, because he is not an American citizen. The State Department recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

STATE OF LOUISIANA.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 446) to restore the rights of the State of Louisiana.

Mr. WEST. I should like to have that go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be laid aside.

BISHOP & CO.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 272) for the relief of Bishop & Co., bankers, of Honolulu, Hawaiian Islands; which was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill is a direction to the Secretary of the Treasury to pay $1,181.73, in gold coin, with interest at 6 per cent. per annum, from June 3, 1872, to Messrs. Bishop & Co., bankers, of Honolulu, Hawaiian Islands, or to their duly-authorized attorney, as a reimbursement for moneys paid by Bishop & Co. to the Bank of California, for charges upon moneys advanced upon the requisition of C. S. Mattoon, United States consul, for the relief of wrecked and destitute seamen.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to have the report read in that case.

Mr. CHANDLER. I will state very briefly, as the report is quite lengthy, that Bishop & Co. advanced to our consul the money which is herein specified, and he remitted it to his bankers in San Francisco, but the draft was protested and payment refused by the Secretary of State, because the fund for the relief of disabled seamen was exhausted. The Secretary of State says the claim is just, and ought to be paid. The money was honestly advanced by these parties to our consul to relieve our sailors.

Mr. SHERMAN. I make no question in regard to what came from the Secretary of State on the subject; but it is a matter which he does not pass upon. It is passed upon by the Treasury Department. I am told that the fund appropriated for the purpose of relieving sick and disabled seamen was overdrawn, and that payments were made which have not received the sanction of the Treasury Department. It makes no difference to us where this consul got the money, or that he borrowed it in Honolulu; unless he borrowed it properly, in accordance with the law, and expended it properly, the Government of the United States ought not to be holden. I suggest to the Senator whether a dangerous precedent may not be set by allowing a consul of the United States in a foreign port, under pretense that he desires to relieve American citizens, to borrow money or draw drafts without authority of law. I think it is better to have the report read; and, if the facts do not bear out the allegations that have been made to me in regard to this class of cases, I shall withdraw all objection; but I think the report ought to be read.

Mr. CHANDLER. I have no objection to that; but the Senator will remember that a few years ago there were a large number of wrecks in the Arctic Sea and a large number of our sailors were thrown upon an island, and our consul at Honolulu was compelled to go to great expense in bringing these sailors off from that island to Honolulu. That year the expenses were extraordinary on account of the great number of wrecks.

Mr. SHERMAN. I get my information from others; but I understand that the expenses thrown upon this consul were probably more than the ordinary amount, but not enough to exhaust the fund appropriated for such purposes, and that the expenditure of that money has not been sustained by the proper accounting officers of the Treasury, and that money was expended which was totally unnecessary, beyond his power, and beyond the limits fixed by law.

Mr. CHANDLER. That is a mistake; but let the report be read.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. CHANDLER on the 6th of February:

The Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 272) for the relief of Bishop & Co., bankers, of Honolulu, Hawaiian Islands, having had the same under consideration, report:

That on the 19th day of December, 1873, Hon. Hamilton Fish, Secretary of State, addressed a letter to the chairman of the Committee on Commerce, United States Senate, accompanied with certain letters relating to a claim of Messrs. Bishop & Co., bankers, of Honolulu, Hawaiian Islands, for $1,181.73 in gold coin.

The Committee on Commerce, having duly considered the letters and papers relating to the above-mentioned claim, concur in the opinion expressed by the honorable Secretary of State, that "the claim appears to be entirely just and equitable," and therefore report a bill to appropriate the amount of the claim, with interest at 6 per cent. per annum from the time that the amount specified was due.

This claim originated in the failure to pay a draft on the Department of State, drawn by Mr. Mattoon, the United States consul at Honolulu, and negotiated through the claimants, for the relief of destitute seamen, the appropriation having been exhausted at the time the draft was presented. Messrs. Bishop & Co. negotiated the draft through the Bank of California, which, on being apprised of the non-payment by the Department of State, charged them interest on the sum advanced, and the claim is for reimbursement of the sum so charged.

The occasion of the exhaustion of the appropriation was the unusual amount of bills drawn by the consul at Honolulu, made necessary by the wreck about that time of a large fleet of whaling vessels in the Arctic Sea, near Behring's Straits, the crews of which, in great numbers, were carried to Honolulu, when it became the duty of the consul, according to law, to relieve them.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator is aware that the appropriation made for the relief of destitute seamen in foreign countries is a large appropriation—I think two or three hundred thousand dollars; not an appropriation for a particular consulate or particular part of the world, but an appropriation at large. Consequently it is scarcely possible, it is not probable, that this $1,100 draft would exhaust a large appropriation of $200,000. It is because the items for which it is claimed this money is due have not been allowed to the consul that this payment has not been made. Therefore it is a question not so much with the Secretary of State, who no doubt thinks under the circumstances the consul was justified, but it is a question with the Treasury Department, as to whether this money has been properly expended.

Let me inform the chairman of the Committee on Commerce that the precedent ought not to be established without grave consideration that the United States is bound to pay the drafts of a United States consul in a foreign country unless the money is really due for the actual purposes for which it was expended. What right has a consul of the United States in a foreign country to draw upon the Secretary of State for a sum of money beyond the authority conferred upon him by law? If this money was really properly expended by the consul, it should be paid out of the ordinary appropriation for this purpose. I think the showing made by the committee is not sufficient.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator will recollect that this fund is drawn upon by every consul in every sea-port on the face of the earth where American shipping goes. There is no allegation whatever that this money was not properly expended, and there never has been such an allegation. Some other consul somewhere else may have drawn improperly; but there is no allegation that this consul did These bankers advanced the money on the ordinary voucher on which money is advanced all over the world, in good faith, and the draft was protested because the fund was exhausted, the calls upon it having been larger that year than ever before, or than they ever will be again, on account of these thirty or forty wrecks in the Arctic Sea.

Mr. SHERMAN. What is the date of the draft?

Mr. CHANDLER. June 3, 1873, the report states. There is no allegation, and never has been any, that this money was improperly expended, or expended except according to the principles of the law.

Mr. SHERMAN. The allegation is made to me that the accounts of this officer are suspended at the Treasury Department for want of the requisite vouchers.

Mr. CHANDLER. In this particular case?

Mr. SHERMAN. This particular officer. I do not know as to this particular draft.

Mr. CHANDLER. There was a time, five or six years ago, when this office was overhauled, and the man in possession of it discharged; but since this consul came into possession of the office there has been no allegation of improper action on his part whatever.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the case goes over, I will promise to show the Senator that the accounts of this officer are suspended at the Treasury Department, or else I will acknowledge that the objection which I make is a mistake. I object to the bill being further considered to-day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be laid aside.

Mr. CHANDLER. I will ask the Senator from Ohio to allow this bill not to be displaced, but to resume its place upon the Calendar, and to be taken up after he shall have made his inquiry at the Treasury Department.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection; but I ask the Senator in return to make an official inquiry of the Secretary of the Treasury whether this officer's accounts are unsettled on account of this or any other cause.

Mr. CHANDLER. I will do so. It now retains its place on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be understood that this bill is not disposed of; and the morning hour having expired the unfinished business of yesterday is before the Senate, which is the bill (S. No. 432) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the redemption of the 3 per cent. temporary-loan certificates, and for an increase of national-bank notes."

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WEST. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1009) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes.

Mr. LOGAN. I wish to suggest to the Senate that we ought at least to make some arrangement as to when the question of finance shall be concluded. This thing of postponing it from day to day is getting to be rather a strange proceeding. If there is any other person in the Senate on either side desirous of making a speech, of course no objection can be interposed to his taking time for that purpose; but I do think, unless some gentleman desires now to continue the discussion, that we ought at least to agree upon a time, so that the Senate may have notice when we are to vote on this question, so that we may intelligently act, and so that if the matter is to go back by vote of the Senate to the Committee on Finance, they may act intelligently in returning a bill which they may suppose at least expresses the opinions of the Senate. It seems to me there ought not to be any disposition on the part of any of us to prevent a vote being taken at some time. If some agreement can be made by unanimous consent, so that this question will not be laid aside, but that we merely take up temporarily some other business, and then have an understanding as to when this question shall be taken up and acted on and concluded, I shall interpose no objection.

Mr. SHERMAN. I shall vote against any proposition to postpone the financial question until there is some definite vote on it. The whole country, the entire business community at least, is appealing to us, entreating Congress to do something. While there is a great diversity of opinion as to what ought to be done, while there are widely different views on the subject, yet there is a universal outcry that Congress ought to do something on this question that affects the daily business of life. I have received letters from different parts of the United States, some from my own State, from merchants who lately went East to buy goods, and returned home without engaging in the ordinary business of their concerns, because, they say, the feeling is universal that the action of Congress may affect, one way or the other, the business in which they are about to engage, and they therefore appeal to us to inform them what is to be the amount of currency on which they are to base their contracts, what action Congress intends to take which will affect the value of what they buy and what they sell. There is an appeal that, I think, must come to every Senator, it certainly does come to me, to take action on the subject. Therefore I shall vote against any proposition to put aside the financial question to take up the Army bill or any other bill.

But at the same time I can see that to-day we shall not be able to take any definite vote. There are fifteen or twenty Senators absent. It is true they have not perhaps sufficient cause for being away, but they are absent; and we know the effect of that will be to probably create delay. I add therefore my voice to the suggestion made by the Senator from Illinois, that either to-day, now, without taking up the Army bill, or after the Army bill is disposed of, we determine to "sit out" the financial bill and get through with it by voting upon all the pending propositions, and dispose of the question.

My own advice would be that in order to expedite this matter it would be better, after the debate that has already been had, in view of the varying views that have been expressed, to allow the Committee on Finance to pass upon the whole subject. But it may be very properly replied that they can pass upon it without this bill being formally referred; and it is true that if they can agree upon anything that in their judgment will promote the public interest, they can report it, even pending the present proposition. So I do not make any motion to refer, though I think it would be just as well to refer the whole subject-matter to the Committee on Finance for a few days, and I think in two or three or four days they might possibly report back something upon which they could agree. But if that is not advisable—and perhaps it is not as this matter has been debated so long—the bill might stand here for a day or two longer; but when it is taken up again I trust the Senate will "sit it out," and not meet and hear one long speech and then adjourn, and come back the next day to hear another long speech and then adjourn, and so on; but that we shall come here with a view to conduct a business debate upon the pending proposition until the whole matter is disposed of and the final action of the Senate is taken on the subject.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. President, I want to add one or two earnest words in concurrence with what has been so well said by the Senator from Ohio. I think the discussion on the financial question has been very long and very protracted; and, whatever may be the action at which the Senate shall finally arrive, the Senate owes it to itself and to the country that that action should be had. I should express only my own opinion if I were to say that I think this discussion has been carried to an extent that is little less than criminal, when you look at the wants of the country. Whatever may be our action, it should be known. There are various ways in which we can certainly arrive at it. We can fix a time certain when we shall vote. I will vote with the Senator from Ohio against displacing this question at any time and at all times, unless we can have some arrangement by which we shall know that we will come to some conclusion, to wit, that conclusion which the majority of the Senate shall determine. We do owe it to the country to come to a conclusion. Why, sir, I get daily letters from all parts of my section of the country asking when the action of this body is to be known. If we were to pass a resolution to-day by a united vote here, affirming that we would do nothing, that would do good, for the country would then know what we were going to do; and do what we may, I hope this bill will not be displaced for the Army appropriation bill or any other bill under heaven until we fix a time when we shall have positive action upon this bill. It does seem to me that there has been so much discussion upon it that Senators, in view of its great importance and of the financial condition of the country, might have a little forbearance and cease to talk much more upon the question.

Mr. CHANDLER. I concur entirely with what has been said by the Senator from Ohio, and likewise by the Senator from Maine. Any action is better than no action; and I would suggest to my friend from Ohio and to the Senate that after those Senators have delivered their speeches who are now prepared to speak—and I am told there are two or three, and certainly the courtesy of this body would be violated by preventing them from expressing their views in full—we adopt, by unanimous consent, the five-minute rule. Let us resolve that, when the question is taken up after these speeches shall have been delivered, we take it up under the five-minute rule, and adhere to that rule until the final vote.

Mr. WEST. Can you fix a definite time when these speeches will end?

Mr. CHANDLER. If there is any Senator here ready to make his prepared speech now, I shall vote against displacing this question even for the Army bill; but I am told that one or two of the Senators who are now absent for the day desired to make speeches on the subject. I merely throw out that suggestion.

Mr. DAVIS. I would add to what Senators have said, as to the importance of an early disposition of the pending currency bill, that the country is unsettled and desires that something should be done. Many important business enterprises are now standing still awaiting the action of Congress, and the people should know what we are going to do; and if we are to do nothing, the country ought to know that. If there is no other Senator who wishes to submit remarks, I will briefly state my position on the question now. ["Go on!" "Go on!"]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Louisiana withdraw his motion?

Mr. WEST. If there is any one subject upon which the Senate entertains a unanimity of opinion, it seems to be that this financial question shall be brought at some early day to a determination; and yet, when you come to apply that desire to its effect upon the result of the action of the Senate, we do not seem to come to any conclusion at all. The Senator from Michigan suggests that upon the conclusion of the speeches which are to be made upon this bill or, rather, upon the finance question, we shall then adopt the five-minute rule. That is a very indefinite proposition. "Upon the conclusion of the speeches that are to be made." Judging from what we have heard here in this Chamber within the last three months, we can form no conclusion when these speeches are to leave off and the five-minute rule to begin.

Now, I make this suggestion to the Senate, and I hope it can be put in such a manner that it can be submitted to their action, that when the discussion of the financial measure shall be again resumed three days shall be devoted to it without interruption, and the final vote shall be had on the third day. My friend on the left [Mr. BUCKINGHAM] suggests one day. I should be most happy to agree to one day; and if the Senate will accept one day I will be very glad.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Suppose you say "not more than three days."

Mr. WEST. I will make this motion—perhaps it would be in order; but if it is not, the Chair will relieve me of my embarrassment—that when the financial question shall be resumed——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Such a motion is not in order.

Mr. WEST. I have thrown out the suggestion to weigh with Senators, and perhaps we can act upon it hereafter.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. What is the pending motion?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. To postpone the pending bill, and proceed to the consideration of the Army appropriation bill.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. The chairman of the Committee on Finance has announced the fact, known to many Senators, that there are several Senators necessarily absent, some of them by illness; and for one, I care in that respect but little what the complexion of the sentiment of the Senate is at present, but upon the broad principle that we should not, upon a grave question of this kind, take any advantage of the absence of Senators to press a vote and thus prevent such absent Senators from expressing themselves by vote or otherwise. I think it was the understanding, perhaps confined to myself, but it may extend to others, that there would be no definite vote taken upon this question to-day; and I think I state what will be assented to by other Senators.

I am not disposed to prolong this discussion, nor a definite solution of this question by vote. I think I have stated before that I would occupy no further time upon the question, and I have only spoken when it appeared that there was no disposition to bring the question to an issue. I like the suggestion made by the Senator from Louisiana, and I would be glad to have the day fixed, and I would be willing to make that day to-morrow; and yet I am not willing to exclude any Senator from speaking if he desires, because I have taken my share; and on that principle, if on no other, I should be unwilling to deny others. If we could fix no later than Monday next, that would be giving sufficient notice to absent Senators to be present. When we take up the question let us remain upon it, whether early or late, and keep up continuous sessions until the question is decided, confining it to one, two, or three days, as the Senate may determine. I am willing to vote to confine it to two days, keep it within two days, and sit it out if necessary during the night of the second day.

I am very anxious—and I corroborate what the chairman of the Finance Committee has stated in that respect—that we have from all quarters of the country pressure that Congress will settle the question one way or the other; and as was said by a Senator on my left, that whether our decision be for or against an increase of currency, the country would accept the determination, and resume business if they could. Only let the people know what they are to do. It is unjust to the country, now that we have been three months on this question, to prolong it unnecessarily, when the business of the spring season is opening. I trust that we may come to some understanding now, and if so, I shall be willing to allow the interposition of the Army appropriation bill, provided we come to an agreement that early next week, say on Monday next at the latest, we resume the question of finance, whether we get through with the military bill in the mean time or not.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I think it is time we had some understanding about this finance question, and especially about the order of business, for it has become now a question of the order of business. This question of finance, in one way and another, special and general, has been before the Senate more than three months, to the exclusion of almost everything else. It has lingered and it has languished, and languishing it is near its death, one would think. I believe the country has rather come to the conclusion that it is so near dead that nothing need be expected of it. At any rate, it is unquestionably true that if it lies across the path of the business of the Senate much longer we shall be here looking the hot days of August and September in the face before we are able to adjourn. That is clear.

Now, sir, charged in some sense with the business of the Senate, which is urgent and exigent and must be accomplished before we can adjourn, I shall feel it my duty to urge the consideration of the appropriation bills when they are in order, against this or any other proposition which may lie across their path; and I do not think it unreasonable at this period, after this length of time, that the Senate of the United States should go on to the consideration of that business which must be done before we can adjourn, when it is ready, in preference to anything else. I do not think it is a good argument, when an appropriation bill is now ready and its consideration is asked, to say, "We will go on with the finance question. We are not exactly ready to go on at this moment, but we are ready to make some sort of an arrangement by which hereafter we hope to come to some conclusion on the financial question."

Now, Mr. President, it is evident that we are in no condition to act on that question, nor shall we be until we get some report from the Committee on Finance. That I have believed from the beginning. That grows more and more obvious every day. Why not then let the question lie on the table, or why not send it to that committee and allow them to report it back, or at any rate allow the business which is exigent and urgent to proceed in some way while the committee are considering this question and until they are in a condition to report?

Surely, the Army bill ought to come up now without opposition; because it is apparent from what the Senator from Michigan has just said that the friends on one side and the other of the different views of the financial question are in no condition to go on with it to-day. They are lying on their arms; Senators are away; too large a portion of those who have taken an active interest in this question are away to advance its consideration. We are ready with the Army appropriation bill. Why not allow us to go on with it, and on Monday next, or to-morrow if you please, if the appropriation bill passes from the consideration of the Senate to-day, as I hope it may, if the Senate is full again you can proceed with the financial question? But after three months' discussion, such as has characterized this question—and I do not speak of that offensively, but I speak of the breadth of it, the scope and comprehension of it—I insist that it is unreasonable, when the Senate is not in a condition to engage in it to-day, to oppose it against a bill of the importance of the Army appropriation bill, and which is ready. I hope, therefore, the friends of the financial bill will allow the Army bill to come up.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will send to the Chair a proposition to see whether it meets the view of the Senate, and if we can act by general consent on the order which I send up, it may expedite business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The order will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Ordered, That after the passage of the Army appropriation bill, the pending financial question shall be continued to a final vote; that after it is resumed, not exceeding two days shall be allowed for general debate, and after that the debate shall be confined to speeches not exceeding ten minutes by each Senator on the pending proposition.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. It seems to me, if that arrangement can be entered into, we shall make progress to-day with a bill that is important, and that ought to be out of the way, and then Senators will be in and can proceed with the financial question. That comports, I believe, with the views of the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. LOGAN. I have no disposition, and certainly have shown none during this whole debate, to prevent a vote at any time. So far as speeches have been made by me, they have been only because the Senate was not in a condition to vote. I have been ready all the time for a vote. The suggestions made by the Senators who occupy a little different position on this question from what some of the rest of us do, are always for a reference to the Committee on Finance. I do not think that is exactly what should be done; and then these suggestions are made as though we stood in the way. Now, the first question that stands before the Senate is the vote on the reference, and that is the first in order as it stands when we are ready to vote.

I have not a word to say about the committee; but nothing has prevented them from reporting a bill any day if they could agree upon one. But the question involved in a vote by the Senate on the points before it, is a very different proposition, and one that we have been discussing for months; and as far as I am individually concerned, I want no action that will take that out of the Senate until the vote is recorded; and I presume nobody desires anything else.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. This contemplates that exact thing.

Mr. LOGAN. With this proposition, individually, I am perfectly satisfied, if the rest of the Senate is. Let the Senator go on now who is ready to speak. The resolution of the Senator from Ohio can lie over until he is through, and then if nobody else desires to speak, let us take it up and pass it, and then take up the other bill. I have no objection to that. Do I understand the Senator from Ohio to propose this order for action now?

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. DAVIS] has the floor now, and he is indifferent whether he proceeds to-day or after the Army appropriation bill is through with.

Mr. LOGAN. My remarks were made not with the object of depriving him of the floor, if he desires to go on now. If he does, I will oppose taking up the order; if not, I should have no objection, as far as I am individually concerned, unless there is objection by other persons. I will ask the Senator from West Virginia if it is just as agreeable to him to go on now, for I will interpose no obstacle.

Mr. DAVIS. I do not understand the Senator.

Mr. LOGAN. I rose for the purpose of opposing action upon the order of the Senator from Ohio at present, in order to give the Senator from West Virginia an opportunity of proceeding now. If he does not desire to proceed now, I have no objection to the adoption of the order, so that he may proceed when the question comes up again. That is all. It was in his behalf I made the suggestion that the proposition should not be acted on until after his remarks were made.

Mr. DAVIS. It will answer my purpose just as well to speak when the Senate resumes the question again as now. I will wait till then, or go on now, just as the Senate pleases. It is immaterial to me.

Mr. LOGAN. I asked the question because there is no one here, of course, who would desire to pass a resolution that would interfere with the Senator's proceeding with his remarks. If he does not prefer to go on now, I am ready to vote for the resolution or order of the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator from West Virginia himself, sitting by my side, said he did not care whether he proceeded now or afterward.

Mr. LOGAN. My remarks were only addressed to the Senator from West Virginia with a view of accommodating him.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think the Senator from West Virginia had better make his remarks when the Senate is fuller than to-day, in case this resolution is agreed upon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio asks for unanimous consent to an understanding in regard to the future progress of the bill which is the unfinished business of yesterday. Let the proposition be again reported, so that it may be understood.

Mr. DAVIS. One moment. Will it be understood that in the event of the adoption of the resolution I have the floor when the subject comes up again?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from West Virginia now has the floor on the unfinished business, and will be entitled to it whenever it comes up again.

Mr. THURMAN. What is the question before the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On the motion of the Senator from Louisiana, [Mr. WEST,] to postpone the pending and all prior orders and proceed to the consideration of the Army appropriation bill, pending which the Senator from Ohio, the Senator's colleague, [Mr. SHERMAN,] asks to have unanimous consent to an understanding in regard to the future disposition of the financial question.

Mr. THURMAN. I think that resolution of my colleague had better lie over and not be received now. It is not in order except by unanimous consent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. One objection carries it over, of course.

Mr. THURMAN. I am so much opposed to any order of the Senate, adopted by a mere majority, to restrict debate——

Mr. HAMLIN. That requires unanimous consent.

Mr. THURMAN. But it is in the nature of an order, and perhaps in that form may be passed by a majority, although I do not know that it would be consistent with our rules. But I wish to say that I for one am perfectly willing and would be glad if the Senate would agree to take the vote on this financial measure next Monday, or on Friday, the day after to-morrow. More than a month ago, I think, I expressed the opinion which I entertained then, and entertain more strongly now, that one of the chief causes of the stagnation of business in the country is the uncertainty as to what will be the legislation of Congress. Every day has confirmed me in that opinion, and therefore I am most anxious that this matter of what we shall do on the subject of the currency shall be settled at the earliest possible moment. Before the question is finally settled, I shall ask the Senate to hear very briefly the views which I entertain upon the general subject; but, as I have said before, I prefer to speak upon some definite measure, when such definite measure shall be reported, and I prefer that the more earnestly because I am apprehensive that of the different sections in this Chamber upon this subject there can scarcely half a dozen men be found who are agreed upon any specific measure, and that therefore this debate which has taken place, and in which doubtless there has been a great deal of learning and a great deal of information, has been after all—I say it without disrespect to anybody—a useless consumption of time.

I shall, therefore, be perfectly willing to agree, so far as I am concerned, that the vote may be taken on Friday, or next Monday, and I would hope that we might by unanimous consent agree to take the question up on one or the other of those days, or, if not, that we agree to sit the bill out either on Friday or Monday, according to usage of the Senate; and I think we shall get a vote long before midnight if we do so.

Now, in regard to taking up the Army appropriation bill in the mean time, I have to say that if the Army appropriation bill is to have the same fate that the naval appropriation bill had, if we are to vote eighteen millions of money, as I believe we did by that bill, in about two hours or less, the Army appropriation bill is a very slight obstacle indeed. If the Senator from Louisiana, or the Senator from Maine, expects to put through the appropriation bill for the Army, and which, I suppose, involves an expenditure of more than $18,000,000—I do not know; but I suppose as the naval bill was $18,000,000 the Army bill is more—in the brief space in which the naval appropriation was put through, it is a matter, practically, of very slight importance whether we take it up now or whether we defer it until some other time. But as it is barely possible that it is not wise legislation to appropriate eighteen or twenty million dollars in less than a couple of hours, as it is barely possible that it is our duty to investigate such an appropriation bill a little more carefully than the other was investigated, I think the best thing we can do is to let the Army appropriation bill lie where it is until this financial question is disposed of. I do not think it is wise to take it up now. If you take it up it may give rise to discussion. Now, let us agree that we will take the vote on the financial measures either on Friday or Monday next, I do not care which, and if we cannot agree by unanimous consent to that, let us consent to "sit it out," and then we shall agree upon something, and I think that is very much better than to take up the Army appropriation bill now, or to make any order such as my colleague proposes.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I should like to know, Mr. President, what my honorable friend would do in the mean time?

Mr. THURMAN. I am surprised, after the experience of the last three months, that the Senator should ask me what I would do. He did not mean exactly what I would do. I will go and discharge the duties that have been imposed on me by the Senate, and sit every day in their discharge; but if he wants to know what the Senate will do, I think in the light of three months' experience I may say they will talk. [Laughter.]

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I propose to interpose at all stages of that proceeding a motion to lay every proposition on the table which has that particular object in view, and proceed to such considerations as are now proposed to be submitted to the Senate; and it was because it was apparent that the Senate was not in a condition, by the attention of its members to-day, to proceed with the finance bill, that I proposed to go on with a bill which we might consider. That is a proposition which the Senator from Ohio overlooks altogether. The real question now is, whether we will proceed to business which is ready and demands attention, or whether we will let that lie on the table until the honorable Senator can give his attention upon the Senate, and not consider the Army bill until some indefinite future time, for fear that the Senate in his absence will pass it without due consideration, and we idle our time here waiting for some days to come around when the Senate is full to proceed with the consideration of the question of finance.

Now, upon the question of business and the order of business, it is most apparent that my honorable friend from West Virginia [Mr. DAVIS] does not desire to occupy the attention of the Senate at the present time, and is just as willing to do it at some other time, and that when he is through there is to be nobody here to proceed with the discussion of finance, and we are not to be in a condition to proceed with it. It is obvious that, if we wish to economize time, we had better, by general agreement, proceed with the Army bill now.

My honorable friend from Ohio facetiously alludes to the fact that the Senate passed the naval appropriation bill in some two hours, more or less. I think in less time than that. I considered it at the time a very great compliment which the Senate paid to the Committee on Appropriations. They had entire confidence in that committee.

Mr. THURMAN. It was negligence on the part of the Senate.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. If it was negligence, I should like to know where my friend from Ohio was on that occasion. Can he account for himself? Why was he away from this post of his duty? And why should he come here at this late date and talk about eighteen millions having passed through without proper scrutiny, without giving some account of himself? I think if we wish to consult economy of time and to make progress, as we evidently are not now in a condition to go on with the question of finance on account of the absence of so many Senators who take a deep interest in it, and as that sentiment seems to be expressed on all hands, by my honorable friends from Illinois and from Michigan as well as on this side by the chairman of the Committee on Finance, why not allow the appropriation bill to come up, and when Senators are ready to advance with the finance question, then take it up with a view of settling it in a given time as proposed by the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN?] I hope, therefore, we shall all agree to proceed with the Army bill.

Mr. LOGAN. I hope, before the vote is taken on this motion to postpone, there will be some agreement about this question.

Mr. WEST. With the consent of the Senator from Illinois, I will waive the motion to postpone until action can be had by the Senate on the order offered by the Senator from Ohio.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That has been objected to and postponed.

Mr. WEST. Very well; then I insist on my motion.

Mr. SHERMAN. Let it stand as a pending resolution, so that we can call it up to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be so entered.

Mr. LOGAN. Why cannot the chairman of the Committee on Finance, so as to accommodate all—I do not suppose there will be any objection—agree to the suggestion of his colleague, that we commence voting on Monday? The Senator from Maine says that Senators on this side, occupying a different position on this question, are not ready to go on. We are ready, so far as that is concerned. There is no delay on our side. None of us desire to speak; but we did not wish to oppose the suggestions of others, because there are gentlemen on the other side who desire to speak.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. And do I not understand that it is conceded that Senators are away who desire to do so?

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly; and for that reason I say it would be an accommodation to them, and in my judgment we ought to do it for both sides. That is my honest opinion. If the chairman of the Committee on Finance will accept his colleague's suggestion I think a majority of those occupying the position I do will agree to it, that we commence voting on Monday next, or on Friday of this week; I do not care which.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will vote for any proposition that will bring this question to the most effective and quickest solution. But at the same time the Senator from Illinois ought to reflect that it would be pretty hard to say that on Monday next, when we resume the consideration of this subject, the matter shall be closed that day.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not suggest that. I say let us commence on Monday morning to take action on the question. I do not say when the final vote shall be taken, but that the subject shall be continued under consideration until a final result be reached. It may be on Monday, or it may be on Tuesday, or it may be on Wednesday.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator need not trouble himself on that score. Even if the Army bill is taken up now, the very moment it is disposed of this currency bill comes up like Monsieur Tonson; but when the Senate will determine it is another question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the motion of the Senator from Louisiana should prevail, and the pending question be postponed, it will take its chances like all other business.

Mr. SHERMAN. No; it stands as a special order at the head of the Calendar, and comes up as a matter of course.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It has never been a special order. It has been for many days the unfinished business.

Mr. SHERMAN. If that is the case, it is perfectly obvious that we ought not to postpone it.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Allow the Army bill to come up by general consent, with an understanding that it does not displace the currency bill.

Mr. LOGAN. We might not have unanimous consent to that.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. We can have it now, I think.

Mr. STEVENSON. If the finance question is postponed, that will only prolong the debate. Now, why can we not go on and finish it? There are gentlemen ready to speak to-day. Why interpose other business, and stop us in the progress of the consideration of a great subject that the needs of the country require should be disposed of? It seems to me that all the waste of time occurs by stopping the discussion of one question, which has proceeded for weeks, to take up another. I am unwilling to agree to any arrangement by which we shall postpone this matter to-day and take it up some time next week. I am opposed to it, for the reason that when we come to it next week we shall then be upon a broad sea of unlimited debate. Let us go on with this discussion now. There are gentlemen present who are willing to speak. I understand my friend from West Virginia is prepared to deliver his views to us now. Why not let us go on, and when there is a stoppage in the debate on the finance question, then it will be a pertinent and fit question whether we shall go on with something else? If there were no gentlemen here prepared to go on with the discussion to-day, that would be a good reason why we should take up something else; but I understand there are gentlemen willing and ready to proceed with the finance debate. I do not think any more important question can come up. All our wholesale merchants in the North and in the West are looking to our action, waiting to see what Congress intends to do. How can they make their purchases for the fall in Europe without knowing whether you are going to inflate, which they think will increase the price of gold, or whether you are going to stand still? And how can they judiciously make those purchases without understanding what the action of Congress will be in its tendency, either to stand where we are, or by a large inflation of the currency to put up the price of gold? I say let us go on with this discussion now. If there are gentlemen prepared to speak, as I think there are, we shall perhaps reach a vote this week, and then let the Army bill come up; but if there is nobody ready to go on now, I am perfectly willing to take up the Army bill and proceed with that.

Mr. LOGAN. I hope the Senate will proceed with the finance question now, without further debate.

Mr. FERRY, of Connecticut. Mr. President, I have not at any time said a word upon this subject of finance during the whole long debate for three months. I have been guided in my action as to the progress of the bill by the Committee on Finance. I have desired to understand the course which they wished the Senate to adopt, and then to vote accordingly; but the truth is I cannot understand it from the action of the committee themselves. The committee tell us through their chairman that they are exceedingly anxious to bring this question to a solution here at the earliest possible moment, and they have told us so for weeks; and yet for weeks other business has been permitted from time to time to intervene and the financial question has been put off.

Now, the experience of every Senator here is precisely that which is the experience of the chairman of the Committee on Finance. Every one of us is receiving letters from home, begging us to do something to bring this question to a practical solution; and if we now permit the Army bill or anything else to intervene, setting aside, apparently at present only temporarily, the financial discussion, I think past experience shows that we shall postpone the solution to a period of which we now cannot form any clear anticipation. I am opposed, therefore, to taking up the Army bill or anything else. Let gentlemen who are prepared to speak on the financial question, if there is only one, go on and speak. Then if there is no other Senator prepared to go on with the financial discussion we can go into executive session, or adjourn, and come here to-morrow and continue the financial discussion again. In other words, let us begin this matter of closing the financial question, and begin it now, instead of waiting to begin it on Friday or Monday next.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. WEST] to postpone the pending and all other prior orders and to proceed with the Army appropriation bill.

Mr. DAVIS. If the bill now pending is to be postponed, had it not better be laid aside informally and the Army bill taken up?

Mr. SHERMAN. I think the Senate will not postpone it. Let us take the vote.

Mr. DAVIS. Very well.

Mr. HAMLIN. I ask the Senator from West Virginia if he has yielded the floor for the purpose of allowing this motion to be made? If he has not it cannot be made.

Mr. SHERMAN. It was made before he took the floor.

Mr. DAVIS. I gave way for the purpose of learning the sense of the Senate; and whenever that is determined I am ready to proceed if the pending bill is not laid aside.

Mr. HAMLIN. The Senator from West Virginia has power to claim the floor, and nobody can take him off it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from West Virginia yielded for the purpose of allowing the motion to be put.

Mr. STEVENSON. Do I understand that the Senator from West Virginia says he is prepared to go on now?

Mr. DAVIS. It is wholly immaterial whether I go on now or hereafter. My remarks will be brief, perhaps not exceeding an hour.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I understand the Senator from West Virginia is prepared to speak, and it seems an act of courtesy due to the Senator to allow him to be heard; and I shall act with that view.

Mr. WEST. The Senate having to my satisfaction manifested a disposition to continue the debate on the financial question, and I have no doubt that a majority of the Senate are of this opinion, I withdraw my motion to proceed with the Army appropriation bill so as to enable the Senator from West Virginia to go on.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is withdrawn, and the Senate resumes the consideration of Senate bill No. 432, upon which the Senator from West Virginia is entitled to the floor.

Mr. WEST. If my friend from West Virginia will allow me, I desire to give notice to the Senate that at any moment when the financial question is not pressed upon the immediate consideration of this body I shall move to take up the Army appropriation bill.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. E. BABCOCK, his Secretary, announced that the President had this day approved and signed the joint resolution (S. No. 6) in relation to the bronze statue of Jefferson, presented to Congress by Uriah P. Levy, late an officer in the United States Navy.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 2543) in relation to mineral lands was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The bill (H. R. No. 2547) to relieve from political disabilities Thomas Hardeman, jr., was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The bill (H. R. No. 2422) to approve an act of the Legislative Assembly of the District of Columbia relating to parishes of the Protestant Episcopal Church, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

INVESTIGATION OF THE GOVERNMENT PRINTING OFFICE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution, received from the House of Representatives yesterday; which, on motion of Mr. SHERMAN, was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Whereas it is alleged that grave abuses exist in the Government Printing Office; and whereas the abolition of the franking privilege will largely reduce the amount of public printing: Therefore,

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That the Joint Committee on Printing be required to report, by bill or otherwise, whether the Government Printing Office cannot be discontinued, and whether large sums of money cannot be annually saved by a change in the method of doing the public printing; and that said Joint Committee on Printing have power to send for persons and papers.

NATIONAL-BANK CIRCULATION.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 432) to amend the act entitled "An act to provide for the redemption of the 3 per cent. temporary-loan certificates, and for an increase of national-bank notes," the pending question being the motion of Mr. BUCKINGHAM, to refer the bill to the Committee on Finance, with the instructions adopted on the motion of Mr. MERRIMON.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, the subject of finance is both a vast and important one; so much so that the attention of the whole country is being directed to the action of Congress. There are, perhaps, nearly as many views as there are Senators in this Chamber. Much has already been said on the bill now pending. It is my intention to be as brief as the subject will admit.

The people are becoming impatient. Business men are at a loss to know how to act. Uncertainty as to our action paralyzes industry. I think we ought, at an early day, to pass the bill now pending with amendments, so that the manufacturers, mechanics, and merchants may know how to act. If we intend to do nothing, the country ought to know it at once. "Money," says an eminent political economist and banker, "is an instrument of commerce, designed to facilitate the exchange of all commodities, by presenting an equivalent in a portable and convenient shape." What is needed in our present currency is stability, a fixed value, and that measured by a standard recognized by the world. This would give stability and safety to trade and business that would be healthy. In the money centers it is estimated that not more than 5 per cent. of the business is done in currency or coin; and this is due to the system of exchanges between the banks by means of their clearing-house facilities; and hence the larger cities require less currency proportionately than the more sparsely settled communities.

The first proceeding in Congress in regard to the establishment of a bank was in June, 1780, which resulted in an act chartering in 1781 the Bank of North America. The old United States Bank was chartered February, 1791, and its charter was renewed in 1816. On the 3d of July, 1832, Congress passed a second bill renewing the charter. On July 10, President Jackson vetoed the bill, and the veto was sustained. On the 22d of September, 1833, by order of President Jackson, the Government deposits were removed from the bank. On March 3, 1836, the charter of this bank expired; but, it having obtained a charter from the Legislature of Pennsylvania, it continued to work until October, 1839, when it failed and went out of existence.

In 1841, under the lead of Mr. Clay, Congress passed a bill renewing the old United States Bank in somewhat different form and name. President Tyler vetoed this bill, and Congress failed to pass it over his veto. This would indicate that a majority of the people and statesmen of former years did not favor a large amount of paper money, not even United States Bank currency.

The issuing of paper money passed entirely into the hands of banks chartered by the respective States, and so continued until the act of Congress of February, 1863. During the recent war the first national bank, under the act of February 25, 1863, was organized in Philadelphia, June 20, 1863, and the first circulating notes were issued December 21 of the same year. Since that time 2,129 national banks have been organized, 32 of which have failed, and 117 gone into voluntary liquidation. During the last year 68 banks have been organized, 11 have failed, and 21 have gone into voluntary liquidation, leaving 1,980 in existence on November 1, 1873.

The act of February 25, 1863, and the subsequent acts of June 3, 1864, and March 3, 1865, authorize the issue of three hundred millions of circulating notes to national banks to be organized under the provisions of those acts, one hundred and fifty millions of which were required to be "apportioned to associations in the States, in the District of Columbia, and the Territories, according to representative population, and the remainder among associations formed in the several States, the District of Columbia, and the Territories, having due regard to the existing capital, the resources and business of each State, District, and Territory."

The whole amount of currency authorized by these acts was issued to national banks during the four years following.

The act of July 12, 1870, authorized an additional issue of $54,000,000, and provided that such notes should be issued to banking associations organized or to be organized in those States and Territories having less than their proportion under the apportionment contemplated by the act of March 3, 1865, and that the bonds deposited with the Treasurer of the United States to secure the additional circulation should be of any description of United States bonds bearing interest in coin. It also provided that a new apportionment of the increased circulation should be made as soon as practicable, based upon the census of 1870. Of this additional circulation, authorized by the act of July 12, 1870, there were issued to November 1, 1871, $24,773,260; in the year ending November 1, 1872, $16,220,210; in the year ending November 1, 1873, $7,357,479; leaving, November 1, 1873, still to be issued to banks already organized, and in process of organization, $5,649,051.

It will be seen that during the first sixteen months this act was in force $24,773,000 were taken, the next year $16,220,000, and in the next, ending November last, $7,357,000, (I give round numbers,) and that there were in November last between five and six millions of the fifty-four authorized not yet issued; but this is all promised to States having less than their legal and just proportion.

It will be four years next July since the fifty-four millions were ready for the States having less than their proportion. They have taken it at the rate of about fourteen millions a year, and during the year ending November last only about seven and a half millions were taken. From this it is fair to estimate that twelve or fifteen millions per annum would be as much as the States that have less than their proportion would take of national-bank currency. Now if the bill pending could be amended by striking out "twenty-five" and inserting "fifty," it would probably fill the wants of the States that are entitled to additional circulation for the next three or four years. This would at once transfer gradually from the States North that have an excess of national-bank currency to the States in the South that are entitled to it under existing law; and they ought to have it. Nearly all agree that if the currency were fairly distributed it would serve the wants of the people much better than now. In my opinion, a transfer of the excess from the North and East to the South and West is the true remedy, and not inflation.

It is well known, and has been often stated since the subject has been before the Senate, that the six New England States have over seventy millions excess, and the five Middle States have over nine millions, making in all over eighty millions. It is equally well known that the fourteen Southern and Southwestern States have fifty-one millions less than they are entitled to; also that the nine Western States, commencing with Ohio, have twenty-one millions less than the act of July 12, 1870, gives them. Massachusetts alone has forty millions more than she is entitled to under the law, while Virginia has more than four millions less than she is legally and justly entitled to.

Virginia paid into the Treasury of the United States last year in internal revenue over $7,000,000. This is considerably more than all New England paid; and yet Virginia has less than four millions of national-bank circulation, while New England has over one hundred and ten millions.

Massachusetts has more excess of circulation than the fourteen Southern and Southwestern States have in all. The excess of Massachusetts is $40,284,482, and the fifteen States named, including the District of Columbia, have but $38,160,308.

Again, New England has within less than ten millions of circulation of what the twenty-six States and nine Territories, known as Southern and Western States and Territories, have.

I repeat, what is needed is a transfer, an equal distribution, under the act of July 12, 1870. If this is done, some of the capital of the national banks now doing business in the North and East may find its way South and West. The transfer will close none of the banks, but simply reduce their circulation.

From the report of the Comptroller of the Currency for 1873, page 31, I take the following:

The whole amount of national-bank currency, legal-tender notes, and fractional currency issued up to November 1, 1873, is—

National-bank currency	$350,332,884
Legal-tender notes	360,952,206
Fractional currency	47,876,149
Total	759,161,239
Deduct amount held by the Treasury and by the banks	128,140,727
Which will leave unaccounted for, or in circulation	631,020,512

The total State-bank circulation in 1860 was $206,998,085. The bank circulation of all the States in December, 1862, was $238,677,218, so that the circulation per capita in 1862 was $7.59.

The total paper circulation November 1, 1873, was $759,161,230. Deducting the amount held by banks and Treasury as reserve, $128,140,727, leaves $631,020,512.

Taking forty millions as the basis of population, we have $16 per capita, or more than double what it was in 1862, (or any previous year or period.)

The bank-note circulation of 1862 was larger than at any previous date.

Mr. GORDON. I should like to ask the Senator a question there: whether the State-bank circulation was not capable of expanding as it was wanted?

Mr. DAVIS. The State banks were capable of expanding to almost any extent to which they had gold to redeem their circulation.

Mr. GORDON. Was not their circulation three to one on a gold basis?

Mr. DAVIS. I have given the paper circulation, not the gold; I am coming to the gold after awhile.

Mr. GORDON. The Senator stated the capital of the State banks, as I understood.

Mr. DAVIS. I said not a word about capital. I said the total State-bank circulation, all told, in all the States in 1860, was $206,000,000 in round numbers, and in 1862, after the suspension of specie payments, it increased to $238,000,000, or $7.59 per capita. I will say here that a great portion of that circulation was in the States of the South. Virginia, I recollect, had $19,000,000. The amount of paper money in the country, per capita, now is more than double what it was in 1862, or in any previous period of paper money. You will bear in mind that, in what I have said about the present circulation, I have deducted $128,000,000 held by the national banks and by the United States Treasury as reserves, and I have only counted what is actually in circulation.

Mr. LOGAN. How about the gold?

Mr. DAVIS. After awhile I will dispose of the gold that is now in the country and that which was in the country in 1860.

What I have stated about the circulation will be found verified by the Treasury Report of 1872, on page 210.

So we have an increased paper circulation, November 1, 1873, of $392,349,302, about 160 per cent. increase over 1862. This is exclusive of the $128,140,727, held as reserves in the banks and the Treasury of the United States; and does not include the $25,000,000 of legal-tender increase since November 1.

The total valuation of property in 1860, was $16,159,616,088; in 1870, it was $30,063,518,439. Population in 1860, 31,443,321; in 1870, it was 38,558,371. Increase in wealth, about 86 per cent.; in population, about 25 per cent., or an average of the two of about 55 per cent. This would make our paper circulation increase about 160 per cent., and wealth and population combined, 55 per cent.; showing the increase in circulation to be nearly three times as much as the increase of wealth and population.

Of course there was gold, previous to 1862, held by the banks as reserve, and some in circulation. But it will be remembered that I have not included in this calculation the $128,000,000 of legal-tenders held as reserves by the banks and the Treasury.

The assessed valuation of property, according to the census, was, in 1860, $12,084,500,005; in 1870, $14,174,986,732; which is about 16 per cent. increase. But I have taken what is estimated as the true value, which makes about 86 per cent. increase.

The State banks suspended specie payments December 28, 1861.

The following table gives the amount of all kinds of paper circulation, and the premium on gold, each June 30 and December 31, from June 30, 1862, to December 1, 1873:

Date.	United States notes and other forms entering into the circulation.	National currency.	July total.	January total.	Premium on gold.

It will be seen that on June 30, 1862, gold was 15 per cent. premium; June 30, 1864, 158 per cent. premium, which is the highest point reached at the dates given. December 31, 1871, it was but 9 per cent. premium; December 21, 1873, it again came to 9 per cent. premium. The largest amount of all kinds of currency out at any time was December 31, 1866, $1,571,787,780.32; and from this date it was rapidly reduced, until on December 31, 1868, it was $698,582,347.32, which is less than at present.

Mr. LOGAN. That does not include the national-bank currency.

Mr. DAVIS. I take the total circulation just as the Treasury reports it. The total circulation December 31, 1868, was $698,000,000 leaving off the odd dollars. Since then it will be recollected $54,000,000 have been added to the national-bank circulation by the act of July 12, 1870. I think I am correct; at least I state it as a fact, and I am glad to be corrected if I am wrong.

Previous to the panic, early in September last, there was no one bold enough to say that there was not sufficient circulation for the trade and business of the country; in fact, it was generally stated that there was too much paper money. Its abundance led to wild speculations, and particularly to the building of costly railroads in distant and wild countries, far in advance of the wants of the people. The experience of all countries, especially that of our own, teaches us that an abundance of paper money causes panics. The prospects for a healthy fall trade were never more encouraging than at the beginning of September last. None complained that there was not currency enough for all the business wants of the country. I wish to call particular attention to this fact, that previous to September last there were none that I heard of anywhere, in the Senate or in the country, who said that there was not circulation enough for all the legitimate business wants of the country; and yet we have to-day $26,000,000 or $27,000,000 more currency than we had at that time. Like a thunder shower in harvest-time the panic came; all lost confidence; banks and people held all the currency they had, and got all they could, holding tight to it, to sell at a premium, or fearing a demand would be made on them. This caused a want of confidence, which it has taken and will take time to restore. When it is fully restored, and a transfer made of a part of the excess of bank circulation held in the North to the States of the South and West, I fully believe that a large majority of the people will agree that we have paper money enough. Keep in mind that no one complained previous to September last that we were short of currency; and recollect that we now have twenty-six millions more of greenback currency than we had last September.

Currency is now transported so quickly from point to point that the same amount will do twice the business it would have done ten or fifteen years ago. Again, the new and complete system of clearing-house certificates, used in the large cities, saves the use and handling of large amounts of currency formerly employed in settling balances.

One of our wants is a fixed currency; not to-day worth ninety cents on the dollar, to-morrow eighty-five cents, and next week ninety-two cents. This gives Wall street opportunities to make "corners," and put up or down gold currency, produce, &c.

The officers of the United States Mint and Edward Young, esq., of the Treasury Department, estimate the gold in this country as being in 1861 two hundred and fifty to two hundred and seventy-five million dollars; in 1873, one hundred and forty millions. Half of the $140,000,000 is probably in the Treasury of the United States.

Add our one hundred and forty millions of gold now in this country to the $128,000,000 of legal-tenders held by national banks as reserve and in the United States Treasury, and you have $268,000,000, or fully as much as the gold we had in 1861. So it cannot be said that I have made an unfair comparison when I put the circulation per capita in 1862 at $7.59, and in 1873 at $16.

I think we have paper money enough for all business wants; but if we are to have more currency, in what form should it be? To this point I wish especially to call the attention of my friend from North Carolina, [Mr. MERRIMON,] who offered an amendment to the bill now pending for the purpose of adding $46,000,000 to the present volume of bank currency. On that interest would have to be paid by the Government. If we are to have additional circulation, I say let us have it of the money that costs the Government nothing in the way of interest, and not an increase in the way provided for by the amendment now pending, which will be an additional expense to the people. If we are to have an increase, let us have it in greenbacks. What we want, and what you want, gentlemen of the South, is, I think, a transfer from the East and the North to the South, which you are justly entitled to, and which I will aid you to secure; and I will say just here if the Senators of the North are determined to prevent a transfer to the South, such as is contemplated by the act of July 12, 1870, I am then ready to help my southern friends to have additional circulation. They are justly entitled to that transfer, and they ought to have it; but if they vote against it, as some of them have done heretofore, of course they have themselves to blame, and not Senators from the North.

I say, if there is to be an increase of the currency, let it be in the form of greenbacks; and if additional greenbacks are issued an equal amount of 6 per cent. bonds ought to be returned and canceled, not to be reissued without authority of law, as I believe the recent increase of greenback currency was.

Let me say to the Senators from the South and West that national-bank currency cannot be had without money or its equivalent. National banks are formed about in this way: A number of gentlemen in the South or West conclude that they want a national bank with $100,000 capital. First, $115,000 must be raised to buy the bonds. These bonds are left with the Comptroller, and in due time $90,000 in currency is furnished. They then commen e business. They must keep 15 per cent. of greenbacks as a reserve; that leaves $76,500, which can be loaned or used. They pay 1 per cent. tax per annum on the $90,000, and ½ per cent. on all deposits made in the bank. This tax yielded to the United States Treasury last year nearly $7,000,000.

It will be seen that to start a national bank of $100,000, you take from your town or county $115,000 and bring back $90,000, only $76,500 of which is available banking capital. So you have $25,000 less than you deposited in bonds, and $38,500 less than was before available to your people.

The bonds held by the Government are much more than ample to secure the note-holder against loss. If the 15 and 25 per cent. required to be held as reserves by the national banks were reduced, say one-half, it would put in active use about $50,000,000 of currency which is now held as reserves, and might cause less money to be kept by country banks in the redeeming cities; and there I might agree with some of my friends on the other side. I believe that ought to be let loose. Fifty million dollars of currency are now held needlessly as reserve, which has caused much less money to be held in the country banks. A national bank is allowed to keep three-fifths of the amount of its reserve in the large cities. They have a rule by which interest, generally 4 per cent., is allowed on such deposits. That causes bankers in the country, as they are bound to keep a reserve, to send it to the cities, and it necessarily takes that much out of the towns which are not redemption cities and carries it to the large money centers. My suggestion is to reduce that reserve one-half, which would put fifty millions in active use without increasing the volume.

If a gold bank, one that redeems its circulation in gold, was now started, it would get, under present laws, but 80 per cent. in circulation; for a bond that cost $115 it would get but $80 of currency. Our bonds to-day, I believe, are quoted at from 115 to 119. The banks also have to keep 15 per cent. in gold reserve. This ought not to be. We should encourage gold banks. I see no reason why a gold bank should be given but 80 per cent. of circulation while currency banks are given 90 per cent., and the gold bank is required to redeem its notes in gold, and also to hold the 15 or 25 per cent., as the case may be, in reserve. It appears to me that we ought in some way to remedy that.

I believe the country will soon demand of Congress a free banking law, and also that the interest paid to the national banks on the bonds owned by them shall be reduced. Of course, in that case the tax also would be materially reduced.

The convertible and reconvertible bond and greenback bill, presented at the last session and renewed at this by the able and distinguished chairman of the Finance Committee, has in my opinion many good qualities, and I think will bring good results. I hope it will receive the early and favorable attention of the Senate. It has a tendency to prevent panics. Under it the holder of bonds or greenbacks can change and interchange, and it will bring the bond and greenback to near the same value, or par. It may depreciate the former, but it will appreciate the latter and bring them near together.

I agree with Senators of the South and West, that they have not banking capital enough. I am willing to vote to aid them in a way that I feel sure is the best for them and the country. The question is, have they the means to take up bank currency, and will you vote to transfer bank circulation from States that have an excess to States that have less than the act of July 12, 1870, allows each State? In 1862, in round numbers, there was $238,000,000 State-bank currency; in November, 1873, $632,000,000 of legal-tenders and national-bank notes. Let us see how it was and is now distributed, in round numbers:

States.	1862.	1873.
Massachusetts	$28,000,000	$59,000,000
Rhode Island	6,000,000	13,000,000
Virginia	19,000,000	4,000,000
North Carolina	5,000,000	1,800,000
South Carolina	6,000,000	2,300,000
Georgia	8,300,000	2,300,000
Louisiana	8,800,000	3,600,000

This shows that before the war Virginia had about two-thirds as much bank-note circulation as Massachusetts. Now Massachusetts has about fifteen times as much as Virginia. If you compare Massachusetts and North Carolina, you will find that before the war the proportion was between a fifth and a sixth. Now Massachusetts has more than thirty times as much as North Carolina. With most of the other Southern States the proportion is nearly the same.

With such facts, how can any southern Senator refuse to vote for a fair, equal, and gradual transfer, as contemplated by the act of July 12, 1870? I believe that the Comptroller has the lawful power now, and ought at once to give the notice, and as soon as possible commence the transfer. Let us see what the act says. It provides that when the fifty-four millions of additional circulation "shall have been taken up," "the Comptroller of the Currency shall, as additional circulation may be required by the banks having less than their proportion, make a requisition for such an amount, commencing with the banks having a circulation exceeding $1,000,000 in States having an excess of circulation, and withdrawing their circulation in excess of $1,000,000, and then proceeding pro rata with other banks having a circulation exceeding $300,000 in States having the largest excess of circulation, and reducing the circulation of such banks in States having the greatest proportion in excess, leaving undisturbed any States having a smaller proportion until those in greater excess shall have been reduced to the same grade, and continuing thus to make the reduction provided for by this act until the full amount of twenty-five millions provided for shall be withdrawn; and the circulation so withdrawn shall be distributed among the States and Territories having less than their proportion, so as to equalize the same."

You will notice the act says "shall have been taken up." Now, I think it has been "taken up" when it is promised; and it has all been promised for several months. The Comptroller thinks all the bonds must be actually in his vaults. The act does not say "when issued," but says "taken up." And here I will state that a day or two ago I asked the Comptroller whether the $54,000,000 provided for by the act of July 12, 1870, had been taken up. His reply was, "Yes." Then I said, "Why not call upon the banks North and East for the $25,000,000 contemplated by that act?" He then said that he had construed the act that it would have to be actually issued before he could call upon the banks North; and it is known that it takes a year after the notice is given before they can get it. Therefore I suggest the great importance of passing the bill now pending at once, so that this transfer may be made from the North and East to the States of the South.

The act does not say "when issued," but "when taken up." The Comptroller says it is all engaged, but not issued; but he admits that it is promised, and I think that is the same as "taken up," according to the act.

But the more abundant you make anything, the less valuable. The experience of the Confederate States ought to teach us this. If but a hundred millions of currency had been issued instead of billions, we all know the value would have remained greater as long as there was any foundation for it to stand on. What gives gold its value is that it costs about its worth to produce it. Make it as plenty as brass or iron, and it would no longer have its present value. This is a conclusive argument against inflation.

It is admitted that our present banking system, with some amendments, would be equal to any known to the world. The greenback or national-bank note passes in any part of our country at its full value. Our Government's credit and stability are equal to any that exist. The full faith of the United States is pledged to redeem the greenback and national-bank circulation in gold, yet it is 10 or 12 per cent. below par. There must be a cause for this. Is it owing to the large amount in circulation? If so, and more is put on the market, will it not be like a corporation's or an individual's credit that is now 10 or 12 per cent. below par? It is well known to us all that if I have my promises to pay upon the market, and they are below their face value, if I issue additional promises to pay without making the proper exertions or providing a way for redeeming what I have already in circulation, the effect is necessarily to reduce the value of all, and to impair my credit in the market. There is to-day the Government's pledge to redeem every dollar of our circulation in gold, and yet it is 10 or 12 per cent. below gold. There must be a cause for this, and that I shall leave for others to explain.

Mr. SAULSBURY. There is too much of it out.

Mr. DAVIS. That is my opinion; but some Senators laugh at that suggestion, and their conclusion is different. I notice my friends from Illinois and Michigan both smile; and I will give way for a moment to either of them to tell me why it is that greenbacks to-day are 10 or 12 per cent. below par.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I will ask the Senator whether in the case supposed it would not depend on his ability to pay whether his paper would be below par or not in the market? Upon that point I will also call his attention, in order that he may frame his reply, to the fact which he has stated, that at one time which he mentioned there was a circulation in the country of $1,571,000,000, with the same wealth, the same country, and the same faith to pay. Now, I ask him if the Government could hold in circulation that volume then, and be able to maintain its credit, can it not a much smaller volume at the present time?

Mr. SHERMAN. I would like to answer that.

Mr. DAVIS. In a moment. That is a very pleasant question. My friend says there was once $1,571,000,000 on the market; now there is less; and he makes the comparison. Well, of course he knows that the Government at that time commenced making provision for calling in a part of that large amount; but at that time he did not tell you that gold commanded four or five times as much premium as it does now. Besides, a large portion of that so-called circulation was bearing interest. My friend asks whether the depreciation in the case stated by me would not depend on my ability to pay. In part it would, but in this case it would not. It depends upon how much I have out and my willingness to pay. If I owe and will not pay, if my paper is constantly being presented and I do not pay it, of course my credit must go down, especially when I should undertake to increase it.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. The Senator of course does not want to misrepresent me. If the Senator issues his paper, it is upon the presumption that he proposes to pay at some time. This Government never issues its paper without assurance to the world that it will pay.

Mr. SHERMAN. When?

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. When it is practicable to pay; no repudiation is assumed directly or impliedly by this Government in the issue of its currency; neither would I presuppose any such thing. It could not be assumed in regard to the Senator, when he made an issue of his own paper, when he said if he issued more it would depreciate in the market. I reply to him that the volume of his paper-issue would depend entirely upon his ability to pay, and his ability to pay would be a guarantee of his willingness to pay.

Mr. STEVENSON. I ask the Senator whether it would not depend a great deal upon the popular faith in his ability to pay, and whether a continued expansion of the notes from time to time and putting off payment, even with faith in the ultimate ability, would not depreciate the paper?

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I reply that, if the Senator had the ability to pay, there would not be any unwillingness to pay. The Government has declared its faith that it will pay at some time, as stated by the Senator. Now, I say that the Government, when able conveniently to pay, will pay; and if the Senator wants a more definite answer to the question of cause of depreciation, I will give it. I do not, however, want further to interrupt him unless he wishes it——

Mr. DAVIS. I do not object; it is very pleasant.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. In reply, therefore, to the question why the money is depreciated, I would say to him that it is mainly because the Government itself depreciates its own paper by not making it a legal tender for all purposes, and I cite in proof the currency of France, which stands to-day without material depreciation, because France has issued paper payable for all dues, customs as well as other.

Mr. DAVIS. I ask the Senator if he would favor the Government receiving its duties on imports in greenbacks?

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I believe I have stated that, had I the control—of course that is a presumption, but the Senator has put it in that form—if I had control of the currency of the country I would do this very thing, as France successfully does to-day.

Mr. DAVIS. If——

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. Let me answer, because the Senator has put a very grave question. I would act in this as I would in private business. Experience is always the best teacher, and I would never do an act of my own to discredit my own financial standing.

Mr. DAVIS. Let me ask the Senator right there, how is it that he would issue an additional amount of promises to pay, when his credit—he is speaking of the Government—is already down to twelve cents below par? He wants now to put out additional promises to pay, without any time fixed for redemption; and yet he says he never would injure his credit knowingly.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I am trying to answer the Senator, but he does not take directly my answer. My view is, if the Government would put an end to the traffic in gold by no longer employing many thousands of merchants in New York and elsewhere to supply through customs the gold that is necessary for the Government wants, and let the Government issue its paper a full legal tender, and then, as sole purchaser of coin, provide itself for public necessities—there would then be so little demand for coin and no competition in the market, the premium would disappear. That would be the substantial answer to the question. But if the Senator predicates all upon the issue of promises to pay, then I ask him, why does not the issue of bonds, which are merely promises to pay in future, discredit them?

Mr. DAVIS. They are paying each day interest, and that in gold.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. Then it narrows down to this, that the simple promise to pay at the end of six months at the rate of 5 per cent. interest annually in coin—understand me, the Government agrees to pay on her bonds 5 per cent. annually, and pays it semi-annually—then this promise to pay 5 per cent. interest, and the bond-holder waiting six months before he receives any fulfillment, that little 5 per cent. gives the whole value to your bond, according to the doctrine of the Senator, for both currency and bonds are promises to pay, interest included.

Mr. DAVIS. Certainly not the whole value. I admit the greenbacks are worth 90 per cent. probably to-day, and the bonds are worth 115. That is because both are promises of the Government to pay, and pay in gold, but the holder of the bond is receiving interest, and the holder of the greenback is not. I have had no satisfactory answer yet why it is that the Government promises to pay, and promises to pay in gold, every dollar of circulation, national-bank and greenback, fractional and otherwise, and yet it is 10 or 12 per cent. below par to-day, while the bonds are above gold, as a rule. Not all of them, but the most of them are above gold. It is because one of them is paying interest and the holder is receiving interest, while the other is not. It cannot be denied that if the government, the individual, or the corporation whose paper is already below its face-value, without making provision for the payment of what it already owes, issues additional promises to pay, its credit goes down.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. The Government has not discriminated against its promises to pay in the form of bonds and has in the form of currency, and both rest upon the faith of the nation, but the discredit of the one covers substantially its depreciation. Now, let me put this question to the Senator: The last census shows that the aggregate wealth of this nation in round numbers is thirty billions of money. The whole volume of our currency is, say, $750,000,000. Now, with this $30,000,000,000 of wealth, with the faith and honor of the nation pledged for the redemption of its currency, can the additional amount of $46,000,000 as proposed by the Senator from North Carolina, or an addition of $100,000,000, cause any doubt to rest upon the ability of the Government to pay, in the judgment of the Senator?

Mr. DAVIS. I believe firmly if additional currency is given in any form to the country, instead of the transfer which is contemplated by the act of July 12, and which it is acknowledged by all I believe ought to be done—I say if additional currency is issued the country does not know when and where we are going to stop. The next year the same thing may be re-enacted over again. I say further that I believe if this $46,000,000 is issued, or any other amount, it will show to the people of the country that we are disposed to increase the currency, and being disposed to increase it, the country will not know when and where we will stop, and it will thus reduce the purchasing value of all that is now in circulation. In other words, I believe that if the instructions now pending should be given to the committee to prepare a bill to increase the national-bank circulation $46,000,000, it will reduce the value of the whole volume of circulation more than the $46,000,000.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. Mr. President, I dislike to interrupt the Senator so much, but he must not lose sight of the fact——

Mr. DAVIS. You need not make any apology; it does not trouble me.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. We are both good-natured, and are both good friends.

Mr. DAVIS. I hope so.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. And my friend from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] is, as he implies, the arbitrator between us; in fact we are all friends. But the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. DAVIS] must not lose sight of the fact that no part of this issue of $46,000,000 can leave the Treasury without a deposit of 10 per cent. more in value of bonds of the Government, which he values so highly. Not a dollar of that money can get into circulation except upon the relation of ninety cents of currency to a hundred cents of bonds, so that there cannot possibly be that illimitable issue that would so depreciate the currency as long as there must be a hundred cents of the Government-bond promises deposited there before ninety cents currency promises can be drawn.

Mr. DAVIS. That is clear; but what I said was that if we start we do not know where we will stop. Now, as my friend has been putting some questions to me, I should like to ask him one. Would you be willing to stop at $46,000,000, and say you have enough? You ask now that the committee be instructed to bring in a bill increasing the national-bank circulation $46,000,000; and, by the way, you do not say where it is to be distributed, whether it is to go to Massachusetts or to North Carolina, but the presumption is that it is to go to North Carolina if they have the means to take it. Now, I ask the Senator, if that instruction should be given and the Finance Committee presents a bill with that view carrying out that instruction, whether he would be willing to stop there, or whether he would desire to increase that circulation to a greater extent? In other words, will he want to increase the greenbacks after that, or is $46,000,000 all he wants?

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. Mr. President, I have nothing to conceal on this question. The proposition of the Senator from North Carolina would bring up the volume of the currency, together with the $44,000,000 reserve, to about what I thought might be the right point, and it would seem I have the support of the Senate to affirm my judgment. The $44,000,000 would, with the $46,000,000, make the total volume of circulation $800,000,000. The $44,000,000 reserve ought to be made a part of the permanent circulation, and not be left to issue and withdrawal at pleasure. I answer the Senator, therefore, that after having $46,000,000 national-bank notes and the $44,000,000 reserve we should be disposed to rest.

Mr. DAVIS. Now, instead of $46,000,000 we have nearly $100,000,000 inflation or increase of the currency; so that it is not the $46,000,000 some Senators are after, but, as I said a moment ago, it is to instruct the committee to bring in the $46,000,000 increase; and yet there is something back of that, for the purpose of bringing it up to nearly $100,000,000.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. The Senator will understand that there are $26,000,000 of the $44,000,000 reserve out already.

Mr. DAVIS. I understand that, and I believe it has no right to be out. I believe that the Treasury issued it in violation of law. I believe, and I know, that the very act which calls in bonds, orders them to be retired and canceled, uses the same language as to the currency, and I think that there is no right and there is no law to-day, none whatever, in my opinion, to sustain the issue of the forty-four millions; and the Senator himself would not be willing to let this Congress go by without in some measure providing that that reserve should be put in circulation. He is a little afraid of that, and I do not know but what he has acknowledged that that twenty-six millions went out in violation of law.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. No; because my name is appended to a minority report, with that of the Senator from Iowa, dissenting from the report of a majority of the committee and sustaining the Secretary in issuing the forty-four millions; and, therefore, I am very consistent in supplementing his action by asking that Congress shall now fix that reserve as part of the permanent circulation.

Mr. DAVIS. The question why greenbacks are at 10 or 12 per cent. discount has not been explained yet to my satisfaction. The Senators have not said that it is because of the quantity, the abundance of the circulation; which they would have to say if they would come square to the fact.

I would not contract or expand the currency, but would transfer from the North and East to the South and West the excess of bank currency as fast as is provided for by the act of July 12, 1870. I admit you cannot legislate money in this or that place. As surely as water will find its level, or that two and two are four, money will find the trade and business centers. You might as well try to legislate that water should run up hill, as try to legislate that money shall go into certain places and remain there. The two are about alike, in my opinion.

In conclusion, permit me again to say that I believe it to be our duty, at as early a day as practicable, to fix and settle a plan, so that the business men of the country may know what to depend on. I am told that many persons are waiting and holding large enterprises in check to see what Congress will do concerning the currency. This keeps many men out of employment, and leaves in an unsettled state much of the business of the country. I hope we will amend the bill now pending so as to transfer forty or fifty millions, instead of twenty-five, and pass it at an early day.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President, I should like now to renew my motion to postpone the pending and all previous orders, and to take up the Army appropriation bill, if no Senator desires to go on with the financial discussion.

Mr. SHERMAN. If that can be done informally, so as to allow the pending matter to come up in the morning as the unfinished business, I have no objection. Perhaps the Senate may order otherwise, but I cannot agree to give way entirely.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. RANSOM in the chair.) Does the Senator from Louisiana move to take up the Army appropriation bill informally?

Mr. WEST. Before I make that motion I should like to understand the Senator from Ohio, and know whether that would involve bringing up the financial question regardless of a vote of the Senate.

Mr. SHERMAN. A majority of the Senate can at any time postpone any of these bills.

Mr. WEST. Then what business will be in order at one o'clock to-morrow?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the pending measure be laid aside informally, for the purpose of considering the Army bill, the finance bill will be considered as the unfinished business at the adjournment to-day.

Mr. SHERMAN. And the Senator may get a majority of the Senate to sustain him, so as to continue the consideration of the Army bill to-morrow.

Mr. WEST. I move, then, that the finance bill be laid aside informally, and that the Army bill be now considered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Louisiana moves that the finance bill be laid aside informally for the purpose of proceeding with the consideration of the Army appropriation bill, with the understanding that the finance bill shall remain the unfinished business to-night, and be the unfinished business at one o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. LOGAN. As I understood the statement of the Chair this morning, unless it was the special order that would not do; but if that will be the result I have no objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is the unfinished business of to-day, and will be so considered.

Mr. LOGAN. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Louisiana.

The motion was agreed to.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 1009) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President, on behalf of the Committee on Appropriations I now ask the attention of the Senate to the consideration of the Army appropriation bill. I think the chairman of the committee very justly remarked this morning, in some comments which he made upon the action of the Senate, that he considered it a very great compliment to the committee that so much was intrusted entirely to their discretion, and that the Senate was so willing to betake themselves to other occupations more congenial. It is a dry subject, and yet it has its interest.

In presenting the Army bill, as now before the Senate, I desire simply to call the attention of members to some contrasts that present themselves with the figures of last year; also with the estimates made for this year; and further as to the amount passed by the House of Representatives and the amount presented by the committee. The total amount appropriated by Congress for the support of the Army for the fiscal year now about concluding was $31,796,000.08. The original estimates for the fiscal year commencing on the 1st day of July next, as submitted by the Treasury Department, were $34,543,267, and as revised by a reduction of $325,000 to the amount of $34,218,267. The House curtailed these estimates and sent us a bill appropriating $28,301,916.60. The Committee on Appropriations of this body now reports the bill back with the recommendation that the sum total of the appropriation be $27,733,500; in other words, $3,484,767 less than the amount estimated for, and $4,062,508 less than was appropriated last year, showing a very material reduction in the amount proposed to be expended in the support of the Army for the current year.

This reduction is mainly due to what, in the parlance of the times and particularly in connection with the discussion that we have heard here for such a lengthy period, may be called shrinkage. It is not a pecuniary shrinkage. It is a pecuniary gain, resulting from the curtailment of the Army by a provision that limits enlistments under the sum appropriated for that purpose to the number of twenty-five thousand men. This, it has been thought, could be done without any prejudice immediately to the service, that it would be a yielding temporarily to the necessity of the times, and whenever the resources of the country would permit it that we could then expand the matériel of the organization without touching the integrity of the organization itself. There has been the main gain in the reduced expenditures now recommended by the committee, and I trust that the Senate will sustain the committee in that recommendation, or otherwise without that reduction we may look for an expenditure of some $3,000,000 more.

There are various clauses in the bill that will invite the attention of the members of the Senate as we approach them, and I trust that by the time we arrive at their consideration in the bill there will be a sufficient number of the Senate here to give consideration to them. There is a railroad section, if I may so call it. There is a provision in the bill on page 6, as follows:

That no part of the money appropriated by this act shall be paid to any railroad company for the transportation of any property or troops of the United States over any railroad which, in whole or in part, was constructed by the aid of a grant of public land, on the condition that such railroad should be "a public highway for the use of the Government of the United States, free from toll or other charge" for such transportation; nor shall any allowance be made out of any money appropriated by this act for the transportation of officers of the Army over any such road, when on duty and under orders as a military officer of the United States. But nothing herein contained shall be construed as preventing any such railroad from bringing a suit in the Court of Claims, &c.

The evident intention of Congress, so far as legislation on this subject has proceeded, has been to come to some conclusion as to the manner in which the land-grant railroads throughout the country should be dealt with by the Treasury Department. That is a most interesting subject, as we have, as Senators are aware, sixty-seven land-grant railroads in this country. We are paying them large sums of money under an arbitrary ruling of the Quartermaster's Department, which appears to me equitable and just; but still it is desired, on the part of the Government and the companies, that this matter should be adjudicated by some authority that will set the question between the railroads and the Government at rest forever.

There is a proposition relating to the uniform of the Army. Last year, when this bill was under consideration in the Senate, the Committee on Appropriations made an amendment to the House bill, which, had it passed, would have had the effect of confining the clothing used by the Army to such stock of that material as was on hand remaining from the war. There was quite an earnest discussion on the subject as to whether the clothing in which the soldiers of the Army had fought, who carried this country successfully through the great rebellion, was good enough for times of peace. Under the circumstances by which the change had been made—having been made by the President by virtue of the authority vested in him by law to prescribe the uniform of the Army—it was thought better in the Senate to allow the matter to remain as he had ordered it. On the occasion when this bill was acted upon by the House, that body provided—

That none of the money hereby appropriated shall be used in the purchase of hats, uniform caps, forage caps, uniform coats, uniform jackets, flannel sack-coats, and unlined coats, which articles the Quartermaster's Department shall issue from the supply now on hand, known as the old pattern.

We find that the Senate virtually decided what it would do in that case last session, and that it is now estopped from going back to the old uniform, for the reason that it would give the Army a motley appearance, and would also probably unkindly controvert the action of the President in the premises.

The only other feature of general interest that I know of in the bill is that relating to the consideration of war claims. The House provided for an increase of the present southern claims commission by the addition of two members to that body, with the intention of giving them jurisdiction of all claims for quartermaster and commissary stores originating in the States that were hitherto not declared in rebellion, and were known as the loyal States. Probably that question may elicit considerable discussion in the Senate, and I will not enlarge upon it at the present time.

These are the general features of the bill. First, such a reduction of the expenditures as accords with the necessity for economy now pressing upon the appropriation branch of Congress. Next, the question of settlement of the relations between the land-grant railroads of the country and the compensation for transportation. Third, whether the present uniform as established by the President of the United States in accordance with law, as when we discuss that question I shall be prepared to show, shall remain as he has ordered it. And fourth, whether there shall be a change with reference to the disposition of war claims in the loyal States, that is to say, shall they still remain under the jurisdiction of the Quartermaster-General and the Commissary-General respectively? But the committee has made a provision that all unexpended balances prior to July 1, 1872, shall immediately revert to the Treasury, which recalls from disbursement, as I will show to the Senate when we arrive at that point, between $4,000,000 and $5,000,000 now lying to the credit of those Departments in the Treasury.

I shall not detain the Senate, Mr. President, with my own remarks any further, but I should like to proceed with the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. PRATT in the chair.) The bill will now be read at length, and the amendments reported by the Committee on Appropriations will be acted on as they are reached in the reading of the bill.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the bill.

The first amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was in section 1, line 12, after the word "men," to insert "including Indian scouts;" so as to make the item read:

For expenses of recruiting and transportation of recruits, $105,000. And no money appropriated by this act shall be paid for recruiting the Army beyond the number of 25,000 enlisted men, including Indian scouts.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line 27, to reduce the appropriation "for pay of the Army, and for allowances to officers of the Army for transportation of themselves and their baggage when traveling on duty without troops, escorts, or supplies, and for compensation of witnesses while on court-martial service; for traveling expenses of paymasters' clerks; for payment of postage on letters and packages, and cost of telegrams received and sent by officers of the Army on public business," from $11,450,000 to $11,400,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WEST. I am instructed by the committee to ask for a verbal change in the language in line 29. The expression is a little unfortunate, "to any person whatever in the service of the United States," and the committee recommend that the words "whatever in the service of" be stricken out, and the following words inserted, "holding appointment or employment under;" so that the clause will read:

That only actual traveling expenses shall be allowed to any person holding appointment or employment under the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was continued.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was to strike out the following proviso in lines 34, 35, and 36:

Provided further, That nothing herein shall be construed to allow more than ten cents a mile for such transportation.

Mr. SHERMAN. That proviso, I think, is a great safeguard. Without that a person's traveling expenses might be more than ten cents a mile. I can imagine the cost of traveling in these luxurious days, with all the conveniences, might be more than ten cents a mile, and as I see this committee is very much in search of economy I think it is a bad thing to strike out that proviso. It is very easy to make traveling expenses run above ten cents a mile.

Mr. WEST. What the Senator remarks is very correct; but it is to be presumed that officers charged with the duty of auditing mileage accounts will see that they have not been incurred with any extraordinary extravagance. The object of the committee in striking out this proviso was to protect those officers who were engaged in moving about in the sparsely settled sections of our country where there are few facilities of transportation, such as in the Indian Territory, Oregon, Washington, and Arizona, where they would probably incur an expense of twenty cents a mile. Unless this proviso be stricken out, the very men who are obliged, under the orders of the War Department, to move from place to place, at an expense of from twenty to twenty-five cents per mile, would be ten and fifteen cents out of pocket every mile they traveled. It is solely to protect these officers that we move the amendment. It is not with a view of adding to the extravagance of the present service.

Striking out the proviso, the officer moving is restricted to his actual traveling expenses, which means from here to New York, if I am correct as to the railroad fare, about eight dollars. If he is ordered from here to New York, that is what he gets, eight dollars. But if he moves in the Territory of Washington, and it costs him fifteen dollars to go one hundred miles, he then does not lose five dollars, by getting ten cents a mile simply from the Government, but the Government allows him his actual expenses. The term "actual expenses," as construed in the Army, has reference entirely to the disbursement out of the officer's pocket as he travels, as I have had occasion to know. You are obliged to render a statement that you paid such and such stage-fare, such and such railroad fare, such and such steamboat fare, and on your certificate, upon honor, you are reimbursed that money; and under this provision, as now submitted by the committee, officers will be confined to such an expenditure. Had it not been for this change, officers were allowed ten cents a mile for traveling expenses. A man coming from New Orleans here, say fifteen hundred miles, was allowed $150, and yet his railroad fare cost but seventy-five dollars. That is what we propose; not to curtail the officers of the Army only, but that every man who travels for the Government of the United States shall only be compensated according to the actual amount that the traveling costs him. That is the intention of this clause, and it will allow more than ten cents a mile, if the officer can show to the authorities auditing these disbursements that he actually and warrantably expended so much.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. May I ask the Senator from Louisiana if there has been any complaint heretofore on the part of military men that the mileage that has been allowed for many years has been inadequate?

Mr. WEST. It has been too much, undoubtedly.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Then why not allow the limitation of ten cents a mile to remain?

Mr. WEST. Because, to give an illustration, it is two hundred and forty miles from here to New York, and a man can go there for three and a third cents a mile, and for that he is to get eight dollars; but he might travel two hundred and forty miles out in Oregon, which would cost him fifty dollars, and ten cents a mile would only be twenty-four dollars back to him?

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. And yet, as I understand the Senator, there has been no complaint about the mileage heretofore?

Mr. WEST. No; because the officer had his option to take either the ten cents a mile or his actual expenses; and in a country where he spent over ten cents a mile he was reimbursed for his actual expenses, and when he did not spend the ten cents he took the ten. Now we put them all down to actual expenses.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. This is understood to be a limitation on the present travel. At present rates ten cents a mile on regular travel is very much beyond the actual expense of travel. The clause, therefore, is a limitation on that expense. This proviso would seem to negative the presumption to some extent that ten cents a mile was in excess.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. May I ask the Senator from Maine if he will object to inserting, after the word "expense," the words "not exceeding ten cents a mile," and then let the proviso be stricken out?

Mr. WEST. It will be the same thing.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. What is that?

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Will the Senator allow this amendment: after the words "traveling expenses," on line 28, insert the words, "not exceeding ten cents a mile?"

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. That is the purport of the amendment now. The general object of this clause of the bill is to restrain, as a general proposition, the rule of ten cents a mile travel. For example, in the case of an officer traveling from Omaha here, or from across the continent, his mileage at ten cents a mile both ways would be very much greater than the actual cost of his travel. This clause is to restrain that. But it was stated to the committee, as a matter of fact, that there are exceptions to that rule, where an officer, traveling in Montana, Oregon, and perhaps Arizona and some of the other Territories, necessarily, in the amount he would pay to the common carriers there, would have to expend more than ten cents a mile. Therefore it would not be just to that class of officers; and as it was exceptional the Committee of the Whole thought that while the general rule would be true, there was no great abuse likely to grow out of the exception, and hence the proviso was stricken out. That is the object. If the Senate think there is danger in it, they ought not to concur in it.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Texas. I will say to the Senator from Vermont that in New Mexico and Western Texas there is a very extensive district of country where officers have to travel a great deal. On the public conveyances through that country my impression is the charge is at least twelve and a half cents a mile. I know that is the rate on the principal stage-routes in the settled portions of the country where there are no railroads, and outside of that I have no doubt the expenses are still larger and exceed twelve and a half cents a mile in specie. Now, if an officer can travel all over the United States and take the average of mileage, traveling on railroads from here to New York, and from New York to Chicago, and from there to Omaha and so on, and then occasionally on the frontier in stages, he might afford to average his mileage at ten cents and do very well; but if he is confined to stages alone and travels three or four times a year at twelve and a half cents a mile in specie and gets but ten cents a mile in currency, he would not like to travel, and would not, unless he was obliged to do it under the orders of the Department. I do not think there ought to be any objection made to striking out the proviso as proposed by the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. PRATT in the chair.) The question is on the amendment of the committee proposing to strike out the proviso.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am afraid this will defeat the very object of the committee. I appreciate the object.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Do not divide now, but let it be acted on in the Senate.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will reserve it for a vote in the Senate.

The reading of the bill was continued.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was in line 38, to reduce the appropriation "for subsistence of regular troops, engineers, and Indian scouts," from $2,452,416.60 to $2,409,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in lines 55 and 56, to reduce the appropriation "for regular supplies of the Quartermaster's Department" from $4,500,000 to $4,250,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MERRIMON. Is this bill accompanied by a report?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is a general bill. There is no report.

Mr. DAVIS. It is the regular Army appropriation bill passed by the House of Representatives, considered by the Committee on Appropriations, and reported here, and it has been on the table for three weeks or more. It is regularly reported from the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. MERRIMON. I have very great respect for the Committee on Appropriations, but I should like to act somewhat on my own judgment about it. I see enormous amounts set apart here for special purposes, and they certainly seem to me very much too great. I should like to be informed about the various appropriations and the reasons for them. I do not wish to vote so much money without knowing why we are giving a vote for such large appropriations.

Mr. DAVIS. Any particular point the Senator wishes information upon, either the chairman or the Senator from Louisiana will give to him with pleasure undoubtedly. Is there any point as to which the Senator wishes an answer to any question?

Mr. MERRIMON. Not in this particular clause. I am not prepared to say that I desire particular information about any particular clause in this section; but it does seem to me that a bill appropriating so much money for so many purposes ought to be accompanied by a report, so that the Senate could act somewhat upon their own judgment.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. My honorable friend would not expect certainly that there should be a report accompanying all these appropriations. That would not give him much information. Allow me to say to the honorable Senator that all these appropriation bills are based upon specific estimates; and if he will turn to the Book of Estimates, laid on our table very early in the session, he will find all of the items to which he refers specifically estimated for, and the statutes under which they arise referred to, or the branch of the service stated, and with such specifications as will enable him to judge in a general way of the demands of the service. If the Senator has in his mind any difficulty on any particular point, the committee will be very glad to give him any information.

For the regular supplies of the Quartermaster's Department, consisting of stoves for heating and cooking.

How many stoves? Where are they to be used? By whom? Are stoves used, while the Army is being conveyed about from place to place, for cooking, while they are in the course of transportation? Then further:

Of fuel for officers, enlisted men, guards, hospitals, store-houses, and offices.

How many officers? how many enlisted men? how many guards? how many hospitals?

Mr. WEST. I would commend the report of the Secretary of War to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. MERRIMON. That is a vast volume. It does seem to me that in acting on a bill of this character we ought to consider it at a time when the attention of Senators would be directed to its consideration. I confess very frankly that I have been engaged about a great many other matters, and I have had no time to consider the clauses of this bill. It seems to me that the time for taking up a bill of this character ought to be fixed in advance, in order that the minds of Senators might be directed to its consideration, and they be prepared to discuss the various items for which appropriations are made when the bill comes up for consideration.

Mr. WEST. Were the Senate to pause in its deliberations and in the transaction of the ordinary business of the nation until such particular time as each Senator might be fully informed of the matter immediately under consideration, there would be no termination whatever to our labors. That must be apparent to every Senator here. Consequently all matters of a peculiar character are intrusted to peculiar committees that are organized to have cognizance of them, as the Senator very well knows by his service on committees. He speaks of this report of the Secretary of War as being a vast volume. It has been the duty of the Committee on Appropriations to digest every particle of information that is in the volume, to form their conclusions according to their judgment based on the information contained in it. That has been the action of this committee. If the Senator is prepared now to object to anything, as has already been intimated to him, the Committee on Appropriations are prepared to inform him; but I submit to him and to the Senate that unquestionably, if we are to delay the transaction of the public business until each particular Senator has thoroughly informed himself of the advisability of every item, we shall never come to any conclusion at all. I say that it is the duty of each Senator either to be prepared to object and have his grounds of objection ready, or not to retard the public business.

Mr. MERRIMON. I do not complain of the committee. I have already said that I have very great respect for them. The point I make is, that a bill of this character ought to be taken up at a time fixed in the future, so that each Senator may have an opportunity to look through that volume to which the Senator refers me.

My eye has fallen on this item in line 153, page 7:

For preservation of clothing and equipage from moth and mildew, $30,000.

I do not know how that sounds to the gentleman, but it seems enormous to me.

Again:

For maintaining national military cemeteries, $150,000.

The cemeteries are inclosed, and I suppose all that is necessary is to keep one or two men to guard them and see that the fences are kept up and the grave-stones kept up.

Mr. WEST. Has the Senator any idea how many national cemeteries there are in the country?

Mr. MERRIMON. Suppose you say there are five hundred. I take it there are not that many.

Mr. WEST. I never heard the Senator's proposition paralleled but once before, and that was in a remark of a memorable individual who lived in Vermont. His name was Fiske. He was asked for a subscription for a new fence to a grave-yard, and he said he did not see the point; for the people inside did not want to get out, and nobody outside wanted to get in. [Laughter.] Undoubtedly the Senator must know that with some one hundred and fifty national cemeteries, where the dead of the Union are sleeping, it requires something like the sum that is appropriated in this bill to maintain those cemeteries in decent and respectable order. It is only about $1,000 for each cemetery, to maintain the walks from wash and from decay, keep the fences in order, and provide a custodian. I am not prepared to say now exactly how many cemeteries there are, but I think I am safe in saying at least one hundred and fifty.

Mr. MERRIMON. Suppose there are one hundred and fifty, then I do insist, and if I have an opportunity to look into the facts I believe I can show, that this appropriation is above what it ought to be.

Mr. STEVENSON. I hope we shall take up the bill in order; and when we get to the cemetery clause we may dispose of that. We have not yet reached the cemeteries. Let the bill be taken up in order, so that objection to section by section can come up; otherwise we shall never get through the bill.

Mr. MERRIMON. My friend does not take the point. I am merely pointing out the reason why we should not be considering now the bill section by section. I say if all other Senators are like myself, they are not prepared to consider any section. I know I am not.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The reading of the bill will be continued.

The Chief Clerk continued the reading of the bill.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was in the item "for incidental expenses of the Quartermaster's Department," in lines 70 and 71 to strike out the words "at posts and other places when ordered by the Secretary of War," and insert "when traveling on orders;" so as to read:

Expenses of the interment of officers killed in action, or who die when on duty in the field, or at posts on the frontiers, or when traveling on orders, and of non-commissioned officers and soldiers.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line 87, to reduce the gross appropriation for incidental expenses of the Quartermaster's Department from $1,300,000 to $1,200,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was continued until the following clause, lines 116 to 131, was reached:

That no part of the money appropriated by this act shall be paid to any railroad company for the transportation of any property or troops of the United States over any railroad which, in whole or in part, was constructed by the aid of a grant of public land on the condition that such railroad should be "a public highway for the use of the Government of the United States free from toll or other charge" for such transportation; nor shall any allowance be made out of any money appropriated by this act for the transportation of officers of the Army over any such road when on duty and under orders as a military officer of the United States. But nothing herein contained shall be construed as preventing any such railroad from bringing a suit in the Court of Claims for the charges for such transportation, and recovering for the same, if found entitled thereto by virtue of the laws in force prior to the passage of this act.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not desire to enter into any discussion over this proposition, but I do not know that I fully understand it. It is in reference to pay for the transportation of officers and troops over railroads. I wish the Senator from Louisiana would state what the object of it is. Officers of the United States are not such persons as the Government pays transportation for.

Mr. WEST. If an officer is ordered to go from here to New York with a detachment of troops, and is not provided with funds, he produces an order from the Quartermaster's Department to the railroad company that transports them, and the railroad company brings in the bill for transportation to the Quartermaster's Department. That is the way transportation is paid for. If you say "troops," that does not mean "officers," and so the phrase "officers and troops" is customarily used.

Mr. LOGAN. Officers and troops are provided for by the Government. But the point I wish to call attention to is, what is the meaning of the language that no money shall be used for paying transportation of troops over railroads where they have been in part built by a land grant from the Government of the United States?

I have no war to make upon this clause; I do not care anything about it; but I want to understand it. For instance, one of the railroads in the State of Illinois received a land grant under the general provision that applies to all railroads of that kind. I presume there is no construction which has ever been given by any Department of the Government that deprives that company of the right of receiving pay for the use of its cars and other material of that kind in transporting troops. I know the contract with the Government was to transport troops during the war; and they received pay for it. I presume this does not mean that a railroad shall be used for all time for the purposes of the Government during war and not be paid anything for it. The Government may have the use of the railroad; but, certainly, the machinery of the road the company is entitled to some pay for, no matter how the road was built, whether by lands or otherwise. At least, that has been the rule, and has been conceded to be the law. That was acceded to by the Secretary of War. I know the road in my State received pay for just such transportation as is provided for here. If it is intended to be cut off, very well. I merely wish to know what this is.

Mr. WEST. I stated in my opening remarks what the issue was between the land-grant railroads of the country and the Government. I find in a little manual of the Quartermaster's Department full information with reference to those roads. They are some six or seven in number. The grants have been conferred by the United States upon a variety of conditions, and the three prominent conditions will be demonstrated by what I shall quote from the respective acts making the grants. For instance, the first land-grant railroad, I think, was the Illinois Central, and there Congress stipulated that "the said railroad and branches shall be and remain a public highway for the use of the Government of the United States, free from toll or other charge upon the transportation of any property or troops of the United States." That appears to be language that was copied from some old turnpike charters in the different States, that where a franchise to a turnpike was laid down, the property of the State should be conducted over it free from toll or charge, the parties, however, the State or the authorities, whichever they might be, providing the means of locomotion on those roads. The same language is used in a variety of land grants to railroads. Among others I will cite the Grand Rapids and Indiana road. Then there was other verbiage in acts, and other intentions evidently expressed by Congress in its legislation. I will cite now the Cairo and Fulton road, and the great Missouri, Kansas, and Texas road, a road running from Saint Louis down to the center of Texas. In the case of the Cairo and Fulton road, by the act of July 20, 1866, it was provided that—

All property and troops of the United States shall at all times be transported over said railroad and branches at the cost, charge, and expense of the company or corporation owning or operating said road or branches, respectively, when so required by the Government of the United States.

So that whatever doubt there might have been as to the intention of the Government in making the grant to the Illinois Central Railroad with reference to the charge for transportation, there can be no doubt in reference to this, because it distinctly states that the property shall be transported by the railroad free from all charge. In the other case it was only provided that there should be no toll charged to the Government for the use of the road-bed.

Again, we have the great railroads to the Pacific, as to which it is stipulated that the whole amount due to them for transportation—that is the act of July 1, 1862—shall be reserved from payment by the Treasury of the United States and placed to the credit of these roads upon their bonds. In a subsequent act of July 2, 1864, that provision was amended so that "one-half of the compensation for services rendered to the Government by said company shall be required to be applied to the payment of the bonds."

This clause in the bill before us is now intended to bring to the adjudication of the courts the three separate principles that are involved in these three separate classes of legislation. One is that we should reserve all the money, or half of it; another is that they should do the entire work of transportation for the Government at their own expense entirely; and the other is that they should afford the Government the use of their road, upon which the Government might put its own means of transportation. As this question is now managed by the Quartermaster's Department, there are controversies continually arising between it and the railroads as to the amount of compensation, first, that should be reserved; next, how much should be reserved in the case of the Union Pacific and others; and next as to how much should be reserved on those railroads where we merely have the right of way without paying toll; and next whether we should pay on other railroads that agreed, according to their charters, to do the entire transportation free of charge. The practice is this: With the railroads running to the Pacific, 50 per cent. on the amount earned is retained. On the Illinois Central and other great railroads chartered on that same principle, the Quartermaster's Department reserves 33⅓ per cent. for the use of the road. And upon such roads as the Cairo and Fulton, and the Missouri, Kansas and Texas, they reserve it all. This provision of the bill is intended to submit all these varied questions of contest, as between the railroads and the Government, to the courts for adjudication. It cannot seem to be a matter of very great doubt to any mind that will examine the particular wording of the statutes how the courts will decide; but until you get such a decision, these controversies continually arise between the Quartermaster's Department and the railroad interest. Passing this bill as it is, it makes an issue to be decided by the Court of Claims in the first place. It is an issue that the railroad companies are quite willing to meet. They have made no objection to it; or at least the committee has heard none; or at any rate I, as the member in charge of the bill, have heard none. It is an issue that they want decided, and I do not think there can be much doubt as to the way it will be decided, equitably to all parties concerned. This is all that is proposed by the clause.

Mr. SCOTT. From the statement made by the Senator from Louisiana, it strikes me that this is taking one of these classes of cases into the Court of Claims only for the purpose of having a decision made against the Government. I refer to the case which he states as of the Illinois Central Railroad. The statement which I understand him to make is that the terms of the act granting the land were that the Government was not to be charged toll, but that the company was not to furnish the vehicles or motive-power for transportation. If that be so, the only question that would be left would be the relative proportion that the Government should pay for the use of the vehicles and motive-power. This, however, takes the whole question in, as to whether the Government is liable at all for transportation over the Illinois Central Railroad. It seems to me rather an idle ceremony for us to go into the Court of Claims for the purpose of having a judgment rendered against the Government, as on the Senator's statement it certainly would be. Here the Government would retain the whole amount due to the Illinois Central Railroad, when it is conceded that it is not entitled to retain the whole amount.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I did not understand the Senator from Louisiana to state any such proposition.

Mr. SCOTT. If I have misapprehended his statement I certainly should be glad to be corrected.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I think it is a misapprehension entirely of the ground on which we proceed. This is not a new question, as the Senator may remember. This question of compensation for transportation over roads which have been subsidized by the Government has been up several times. It was here during the war in 1862, and perhaps earlier, and also at a later period, and thoroughly discussed. There has been a question to what extent this privilege goes, whether it is, as the Senator from Illinois suggests, a privilege to use the rails, or whether it is a right of transportation over the roads by the Government. Perhaps the confusion arises from the fact that as to this particular Illinois road and some other roads the language was used which had been employed in prior grants with reference to turnpikes. It is said by these roads to the Government, "You may use our rails, but you must not expect us to furnish the rolling-stock; we shall not transport for you. You have declared this a public road, and you have the right to run over it. We know perfectly well you have no means of doing it." Anybody can see that if it is limited to that, it is no privilege at all, because the Government has no rolling-stock and no practical right to use the road. That is to say, the right is worth nothing. That is the proposition. Now, as I understand, this difficulty arising in regard to this class of roads has been compromised heretofore. I do not know what the fact is, however, but the Senator from Louisiana doubtless does.

In another class of roads it is provided specifically that they shall be transporters. The question is between that class and this particular class. The House of Rspresentatives, this being a moot question, say, we will have this question settled, and we will treat all these roads alike; they have all been subsidized alike. I do not mean in the amount, but the treatment of the Government has been about the same to all these roads. They have been subsidized, and certain rights of transportation have been reserved in all. In some of them it is clear, and no question arises about them; but from the employment of particular language a question arises to the others. Now, the object of this section is to submit the whole question to the courts, or, in other words, to require of these roads to afford transportation, with authority to submit the question, if they are not satisfied, to the courts for consideration. I understand that to be about the upshot of the whole thing.

Mr. LOGAN. I merely made the inquiry because I did not know what construction had been given by the committee to these grants which caused them to provide this clause. I know, in reference to the road to which the Senator has alluded in Illinois, that a contract was made between the Secretary of War and the company in reference to the transportation of troops, and, as he says, a compromise on this particular question, the Secretary of War, I believe, yielding the point. He contended that the Government had the right to use the road under the provisions of the charter, but admitted that it had no right to use the carriages and coaches of the company for the purpose of transporting stores, &c., without pay. Hence they made a division, allowing the Government the right to use the road, but making the terms for the use of the power and cars such as to harmonize with the opinions of the Secretary of War.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Undoubtedly that is the exact condition of the question, and the Senator will see the spirit in which this originated. Certain roads, we hold, are entitled to furnish actual transportation of troops and munitions of war, absolutely and unqualifiedly, without compensation.

Mr. LOGAN. That I am not discussing. In reference to those having that peculiar provision in their charter I have nothing to say and no opinion to express.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. But I am stating why this originated. Here is another class of cases, where the bounty of the Government has been bestowed precisely as in the other class, but the roads say, "As a matter of good fortune to us you were not quite happy in the choice of the language which you apply to us, and therefore our obligation is not so broad as that of the other class of corporations." That is the precise question that the House of Representatives proposes to submit to the courts by this clause, whether they are or are not liable.

Mr. LOGAN. But the principle on which the grant was made to the road in the State which I in part represent was the same principle that had applied to turnpikes; and on the theory of turnpike roads I do not think there can be any question as to what the law is, and as to the right of the Government.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. My honorable friend would hardly argue that the Congress of the United States supposed that the right of running over that road or using that road, having no furniture of its own, was a right of any value?

Mr. LOGAN. I am not arguing anything about it, but stating the theory on which the grant was made, and the settlement made by the Secretary of War, Mr. Stanton, who I think was a very good lawyer. I am only stating this proposition in my own mind as a legal proposition, in order to sever the grant to that road from these others, and let it stand alone. I do not think there is any question about the law at all.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. That is the precise question which it is proposed to submit.

Mr. LOGAN. Still I have no opposition to make to the clause. I only make these suggestions because I do not see the necessity of forcing people into costs and courts on a proposition as to which, as the Senator from Pennsylvania says on the case standing alone by itself, unless there is something in it that I cannot see, there can be but one decision rendered.

Mr. SCOTT. I do not wish to be considered as being at all in opposition to having any disputed question between the Government and any or all the railroads disposed of in court. My remarks were based on the quotation made by the Senator from Louisiana in reference to the Illinois Central Railroad, and the only point there was in them was that, if that was so clear a case as that there was no controversy about it, I did not see the policy of taking it into court along with others where the controversy did exist. If, however, the Senator from Maine, the chairman of the committee, considers that there is any controversy there which ought to be disposed of in the courts, so as to get the principle settled, I do not object.

Mr. LOGAN. I have no objection. I only called attention to it to see on what basis the committee had decided, because heretofore, thinking of the question and examining it when it was up, at the time the Government and the road had a contest I formed my opinion about it and have never changed it. I have no opposition to make to this clause; but I would make this suggestion for the consideration of the committee: whether it would not be better to allow these roads to have an action in the United States courts in the districts through which the roads run than to force them to come here to the Court of Claims. It seems to me much more convenient, and certainly no inconvenience to the Government, because it is immaterial to them. The question might be settled in the United States district and circuit courts in the districts through which the roads pass. I merely make that suggestion. No matter how the courts decide, the question would come to the Supreme Court of the United States, the highest tribunal in the land, to which we must all yield. It seems to me it would be more convenient to the parties litigant than to force them to come here to Washington City; but still I have no amendment to offer; I merely make the suggestion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reading of the bill will be proceeded with.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was in line 138, to reduce the appropriation "for hire of quarters for officers on military duty; hire of quarters for troops; of store-houses for the safe-keeping of military stores, offices, and of grounds for camps and summer cantonments, and for temporary frontier stations; for the construction of temporary huts and stables; and for repairing public buildings at established posts," from $1,500,000 to $1,400,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out the following proviso to the appropriation "for the purchase and manufacture of clothing, camp and garrison equipage, and for preserving and repacking stock of clothing, camp and garrison equipage, and materials on hand at the Schuylkill arsenal and other depots," from lines 145 to 152:

Provided, That none of the money hereby appropriated shall be used in the purchase of hats, uniform caps, forage-caps, uniform coats, uniform jackets, flannel sack-coats, and unlined coats, which articles the Quartermaster's Department shall issue from the supply now on hand, known as the old pattern; and none of the articles above enumerated shall be purchased until those now on hand are exhausted.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line 154, to reduce the appropriation "for the preservation of clothing and equipage from moth and mildew" from $50,000 to $30,000.

Mr. MERRIMON. I desire to ask the Senator in charge of this bill to give the Senate or myself some information as to what is meant by an appropriation "for the preservation of clothing and equipage from moth and mildew, $30,000." I confess I cannot comprehend the necessity for it.

Mr. WEST. The Senator asks me as to the necessity and not what is meant?

Mr. MERRIMON. What is meant.

Mr. WEST. It is meant to preserve clothing and equipage.

Mr. MERRIMON. How can it be in such a condition as to require so much money to prevent the moths eating it up?

Mr. WEST. There is quite an amount of material necessary to clothe and provide equipage for an army of thirty thousand men, as we have at present, though it will be reduced to twenty-five thousand men under this bill. There is a patent right in the possession of certain individuals to whom the Government has paid hitherto very large sums of money, and this is quite a small amount in comparison with what we have paid heretofore. It is recommended by the War Department, indorsed most thoroughly (and that is the strong point that commends it to the favor of the committee) by the Quartermaster-General, whose integrity none will question, and in favor of whose opinions there is a very general concurrence.

Mr. MERRIMON. What is purchased? What is the expenditure for?

Mr. WEST. The clothing that is to be worn by the soldiers is taken in the condition of its cloth to a certain manufactory in Philadelphia and there steeped in this patent process that belongs to certain individuals. The consequence is that the articles so subjected to that process are rendered almost impervious, and in fact for all practical purposes entirely so, to the attacks of the moth. The wagon-covers, the tents, and all other canvas appliances that are in use by the Army, are also subjected to the same treatment, and it is conceded that it is a very great economy that this should be done.

I suppose the Senator understands in his domestic economy that if he could provide a remedy against moth for his household goods and effects he would be very glad to pay such a percentage as is here paid upon the disbursement of the Army for clothing for the year. For instance, there is $1,450,000 of this clothing used every year, and we pay $30,000 for rendering that impervious to the attacks of moth and to preserve it against mildew.

Mr. MERRIMON. I move to strike out "$30,000" and insert "$20,000."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Carolina moves to amend the amendment of the committee by striking out "$30,000" and inserting "$20,000."

Mr. STEVENSON. I should like to ask the Senator from North Carolina, because I profess to be an economist not only in theory but in practice, if he has any estimate different from that which the Quartermaster's Department has furnished us as to the cost of preserving this clothing.

Mr. MERRIMON. I answer the Senator very frankly that I have not. I stated awhile ago that I was entirely in the dark so far as I was concerned, and I was anxious to raise discussion upon some of these points in order that I might get a little light. I frankly confess that I have very little light on the subjects embraced by this bill. I have not had an opportunity to examine them, and I desire to have that opportunity.

Mr. STEVENSON. The Committee on Appropriations, of which I am a humble member, investigated this subject. Of course no committee can go personally into an examination in minute detail of the estimates of the various Departments. Those estimates rest upon the Departments themselves. They have been printed and laid on the table for months, ever since Congress assembled, and are on the table of every Senator. He must, therefore, look at those estimates, and unless he can show that a particular estimate can be diminished with propriety to the service, we must acquiesce in it.

Mr. MERRIMON. Will the Senator allow me to ask him what induced the committee to reduce the amount of this appropriation from $50,000 to $30,000?

Mr. STEVENSON. We proposed that reduction because an examination having been instituted by the committee through one of its members, he reported to us that, after full consideration, and on consultation with the Department, he found that it could be reduced that much and no more. Now, when the Committee on Appropriations meet, the various bills for the expenditures of the Government are distributed to the various members of the committee, who each has charge of a particular branch. My honorable friend from Louisiana has charge of the military bill; my honorable friend from West Virginia has charge of the fortification bill; and so each bill is distributed to a member. He examines the estimates; he takes weeks in going round to learn the reasons for them, and he then reports to the Committee on Appropriations, "I think such an expenditure can be reduced to such an amount." Now, the honorable Senator who has charge of this bill, and who went to various Departments to ascertain what was the lowest point to which the estimates could be reduced, reported to us that this particular item for the preservation of clothing could, without detriment to the public service, suffer a reduction of so much money, and, after full discussion in the committee, they agreed on that sum.

Now, I should be perfectly willing to reduce it $10,000 more, if I could have any information from the Department or from Senators or from anybody else that the service would justify it. But we must act upon estimates and upon investigations made by committees to whose charge appropriation bills are committed, they being guided by the best lights before them. The committee, believing that this was the lowest sum to which this appropriation could go, placed it at this sum by a reduction of $20,000. We did not think we could go any lower. I shall have to vote for that, unless my honorable friend from North Carolina can give me information upon which I can reduce it still further.

Mr. MERRIMON. I cannot give the information now. It seems to me a very enormous amount for such a purpose; and, seeing that the report of the committee on the face of the bill appeared to be based on a vague estimate, I thought we might as well put it at $20,000.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I appreciate entirely the motives of my honorable friend from North Carolina. They are entirely proper. The idea of paying $30,000 for protecting clothing from moths naturally strikes the Senator from North Carolina; but allow me to call his attention to one or two prominent facts which will enable him to form some estimate for himself of the probabilities of the expenditure. At the close of the war we had an immense amount of clothing on hand, amounting to millions. We have a very large amount of clothing now, amounting to several millions.

Mr. MERRIMON. What is it kept for? Why is it not sold?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. That is another proposition. The Senator will allow me to confine myself to this particular point, because it is impossible for us to discuss at once the entire range of the public service. We have this clothing on hand. It must be preserved. We appropriated last year $200,000 for that specific end. The estimates for this year were $100,000; the revised estimates were $50,000. The House of Representatives appropriated according to the revised estimates. Looking at the whole thing as carefully as they could, as a practical question, I am bound to believe they thought $50,000 could be economically administered in the preservation of the large amount of clothing we have on hand, and so they appropriated it. But the vigilance of my honorable friend from Louisiana seemed to him to detect the fact that we might perhaps squeeze through with $30,000, and so we cut it down $20,000; and that is the way it stands.

These are the general facts in regard to it, and I think on the whole it will be conceded that they raise a reasonable presumption in favor of at least $30,000.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I wish to ask my friend from Maine if the provision in lines 141 and 142 does not cover that particular item:

For purchase and manufacture of clothing, camp and garrison equipage, and for preserving and repacking stock of clothing, camp and garrison equipage, and materials on hand at the Schuylkill arsenal and other depots, $1,450,000.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. That has nothing to do with this. It is entirely separate.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I cannot understand it so. "Preserving" it from what? From burglars, from moths, and from everything. It seems to me to cover the preservation of the material at the Schuylkill arsenal and other depots. It seems to me that provision covers the whole thing, and that this item is wholly unnecessary. If the other appropriation is sufficient to preserve it, take care of it at all these depots, then why is there a special provision for preserving it against moth?

Mr. WEST. I think I can satisfy the Senator from Delaware that the two propositions are distinct. On line 142 the intention is to provide other means for the preservation of this clothing temporarily. For instance, if tobacco is required to be bought in baling some of this clothing under the clause for preserving, that tobacco could be provided. Furthermore, the manual labor necessary to handle this clothing from time to time, to prevent it from being attacked by moths, is included in that appropriation, and it is very well. It is particularly for the interest of the Government that there should be a specific provision as to the amount of money that may be expended in paying for this particular process of preserving it against moth and mildew.

The Senator will notice that if you strike out lines 153 and 154, and do not give them any money to pay for using this patent process, under the preceding clause as to preserving they might use $250,000 of the previously appropriated amount. That is patent to anybody. Here is $1,450,000 appropriated for various purposes; one of them is for preserving. Now, if the Quartermaster's Department choose to be corrupt in the matter, they may use a quarter of a million of that appropriation for this patent process. On the contrary, in the subsequent clause we stipulate just how much money they shall pay for that process, and the other expression for preservation is merely for some little temporary expense, and also to pay for the manual labor involved in handling the clothing, to air it, &c.

Mr. CHANDLER. If my honorable friend from Delaware had had a little more experience in the way of family, he might perhaps have understood better the necessity for protecting woolen material against moths. I have had a little experience in that way myself, and I should say it has cost me more than forty or fifty dollars a year for the last fifteen years to protect against moths in my own household affairs; but probably my friend from Delaware can put a three-cent paper of tobacco in his trunk and protect all his surplus wearing material. [Laughter.] It is not so in the case of a family. There are carpets and sundry other things that must be protected from moths. I would advise my honorable friend to acquire a little more experience in that way. [Laughter.]

Mr. SAULSBURY. I hope my friend from Michigan does not consider his family a moth at any rate. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina to the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now recurs on the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations to strike out "fifty" and insert "thirty."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Chief Clerk read the next clause of the bill as follows:

Mr. MERRIMON. I ask the Senator in charge of the bill how many cemeteries we have. I do not wish it to be understood that I am opposed to taking all proper care of the national cemeteries. I am as warmly in favor of that as anybody. I believe they ought to be preserved and protected and adorned; but I should like to know how many we have got, in order that there may be some basis laid for this large appropriation of money, $150,000; and I should like to know how many keepers there are to each, the necessary employés there are, and the work they have to do.

Mr. WEST. We gave for this purpose last year $275,000. The amount estimated for this year was $275,000, and the committee has curtailed it $125,000, making the amount $150,000. I am not prepared to answer at this moment how many national military cemeteries there are at present in the United States. They are incidentally alluded to in the report of the Secretary of War, in which he makes reference to something over seventy-five, but those are the cemeteries where certain headstones were procured; and there are more than that number, I am satisfied. But in reply to what the Senator inquires of me as to what is done at these cemeteries, I will commend him to the report of the Secretary of War, page 119, from which I will read a few brief sentences:

The number of interments in the national military cemeteries by last year's report was 317,962. One hundred and forty-eight Union soldiers have been added to the list during the year. None have been removed. The number of the known is 170,187; unknown, 147,823.

The Quartermaster-General goes on to say that a new national cemetery is being established at Fort McPherson, to which the bodies of those who have fallen in the Indian fights of that frontier and been buried at neighboring posts are to be removed.

The cemetery established on the occupation of the city of Mexico by the Army of the United States has, under a law approved on 3d March, 1873, been designated a national military cemetery, and placed under the guardianship of the Secretary of War.

That is to be maintained. Then he goes on to mention the different improvements that have been made in the various cemeteries during the year, among which are those at Newbern and Raleigh, in the Senator's own State; I suppose he has seen them, or heard of them. At Beaufort and Florence, South Carolina. They have been putting brick walls around these cemeteries, and at Memphis, Tennessee; stone walls at Danville, Glendale, Seven Pines, and Staunton, Virginia; at Salisbury, North Carolina, and Forts Leavenworth and Scott, Kansas. Then, superintendents' lodges have been built during the year, or are being erected at Danville, Glendale, and Seven Pines, Virginia, at Raleigh and Wilmington, North Carolina; Camp Nelson, Logan's Cross-Roads, and Lebanon, Kentucky; Memphis, Chattanooga, Fort Donelson, and Knoxville, Tennessee; and Fort Smith, Arkansas. Then he says:

There remain to be provided for permanent inclosures at Andersonville, Georgia, Fort Gibson, Indian Territory, Grafton, West Virginia, and Fort McPherson, Nebraska.

There is a superintendent, whose pay is equivalent to that of a first sergeant, who has charge of each one of these cemeteries. I judge that there are over one hundred of these men in the service of the United States at the present time, and the money is expended, as the Senator will see, in providing in many cases walls and lodges at the places, and also in preserving the grounds.

Mr. MERRIMON. The honorable Senator has not answered, certainly to my satisfaction, the questions I propounded to him, and it must be manifest to every Senator here that this appropriation of $150,000 for this purpose is but a mere estimate and guess. We all know that the Senator from Louisiana is a highly intelligent gentleman, and he is put in charge of this bill, and yet he cannot tell us the number of cemeteries, the number of persons placed in charge of them, the number of employés, or how the money is to be expended. This vast sum of $150,000 is appropriated without even the gentleman in charge of the bill being able to tell us for what particular purpose it is to be used. This is only another evidence of how important it is that we should proceed very cautiously in the consideration of a bill that appropriates millions and tens of millions of the people's money. I do contend that we are not prepared to go on with the consideration of this bill. We are maturing the bill now, section by section. By and by we shall have to vote for the bill as a whole, or be placed in the position of voting against an appropriation bill for the support of the Army.

Mr. WEST. I scarcely wish to detain the Senate any longer, but I dissent entirely from the Senator's statement that I have not informed myself on this subject. It may be that I am not very happy in my expression, but I have told him that there are nearly one hundred national cemeteries in this country. I cannot say precisely how many, but I know over seventy-five, and, I think, up to a hundred. I have said that this fund is used to preserve the cemeteries from time to time, as the Senator knows every public ground in the country must be preserved. It is also expended in compensation to the individuals who have charge of the cemeteries, who are paid a compensation reasonable in amount. When the Senator reflects that we have—I will put it even at the lowest amount—seventy-five national cemeteries in this country, for their care and their maintenance and their preservation, and for providing permanent walls in a great many instances that shall endure to all time, it does seem to me that the amount of $150,000 is anything but guess-work. It has been based upon the estimates made by the officers in charge of this particular branch of the service. Those officers have examined into these expenditures; they have made their report to us. We have the advantage of the experience of preceding years of what these expenses have cost, and we have based our conclusion upon that experience.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will proceed with the reading of the bill.

The Chief Clerk resumed the reading of the bill.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations in the clause providing "for Army contingencies," line 157, to strike out the words "namely, such as are."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MERRIMON. I wish to ask the gentleman what sort of contingencies these are; what the appropriation of $100,000 in this clause embraces? It seems to me we make very large appropriations for everything that can be conceived of, and yet there are contingencies left out that require $100,000. I should like to have some information as to what those contingencies are.

Mr. WEST. After an appropriation has been made by Congress to provide for all the expenditures that might be conceived possible in the conduct and management of an army of thirty thousand men, it is to be presumed that some other expenses may arise which had not been contemplated; and it is to provide for such expenditures. It is made under the particular direction of the Secretary of War, and he makes a return annually to Congress of what the expenditure consists. I will give the Senator an instance. Take the Military Academy at West Point, or take the barracks down at Fortress Monroe. Some catastrophe or accident might arise there, such as the explosion of the magazine or the burning down of the quarters of the troops, that would require the disbursement of some such sum as might be embraced within this limit to put the place in proper repair again. If Congress is not in session we have no arrangement that will enable the Secretary of War to avail himself of any fund; and in a peculiarly specified disbursement of $28,000,000, which this bill provides for, we merely say here are $100,000 to provide for such accidents.

I have an official report here of how this money has been expended in previous years. For instance there is the item of advertising, which is not provided for in any other part of the bill. All that is to be paid out under the immediate direction of the Secretary of War to prevent any imposition in the charges that might be judiciously imposed. All the telegraphing done by the Secretary of War is paid for out of this fund. There are legal fees constantly necessary to be incurred by the War Department. The item last year was $5,000. Books of a military character for Army use were bought last year, probably many of them foreign books, to the extent of $5,000.

Mr. MERRIMON. What amount was appropriated last year under this head?

Mr. WEST. The same amount—$100,000. Whenever the Secretary of War, or any of the immediate attachés of the War Department, move about on public business their mileage comes out of this fund, and it is a fund expended directly under the immediate action of the Secretary of War, and he makes an annnal report to Congress of what he does with it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reading of the bill will proceed.

The Chief Clerk resumed the reading of the bill.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was in line 171, to reduce from $10,000 to $5,000 the appropriation "for the Army Medical Museum, and medical and other necessary works for the library of the Surgeon-General's Office."

Mr. MERRIMON. I move to cut that down one-half, by striking out $5,000, and inserting $2,500.

Mr. WEST. I had a suggestion to make, in which I think I was entitled to precedence as from the Committee on Appropriations. The committee instruct me to withdraw that amendment which reduces the appropriation from $10,000 to $5,000, so as to leave the amount stand $10,000; and I will state to the Senate, and to the Senator from North Carolina, what the object is.

This money is used by the Army Medical Museum to collect a variety of information on medical and surgical affairs, the benefit of which accrues to the whole medical profession throughout the United States. The mere proposition for a reduction of $5,000 in that item has, if I can so express it, invited the ire of the faculty all through the country. For instance, the medical societies of the State of New York have held indignation meetings on the subject, and have furnished us with their representations. Medical societies all over the country assert to us that this is the poorest economy this committee has been engaged in; and the result of the reduction from $10,000 to $5,000 will be to curtail the advantages that have hitherto accrued to the medical profession, and consequently to humanity, throughout the country, by the amount heretofore appropriated. I think myself that that is the poorest proposition of economy, in a reduction of $568,000 from the bill, that the Senate has yet indulged in; and under the instructions of the committee I withdraw the amendment, and move that the item stand at $10,000.

Mr. MERRIMON. I am not sure that I understand what the provision means:

For the Army Medical Museum, and medical and other necessary works for the library of the Surgeon-General's Office, $5,000.

I do not see how the mere fact that books are bought for this particular library, is going to enlighten the medical profession of this country and the world besides.

Mr. STEVENSON. I think I can explain to the Senator from North Carolina. We have a medical museum here fully supplied with the latest works. There are issued from this department medical works of its own for distribution. It has lately issued two volumes of the Medical History of the War, in which large plates of wounded soldiers are contained, which are of great interest to medical men.

They also furnish other medical statistics, of which each Senator and each Representative is entitled to a certain number. They distribute them among their constituents. I care nothing about indignation meetings that medical societies may hold. They have no influence whatever on me if my sense of duty happens to come in antagonism with their view; but on this subject I have received many letters and many resolutions from societies of the highest credit in Kentucky. They receive these works, and all the medical societies in the State not only receive benefit through this medical museum and through the Medical History of the War, and through the plates issued illustrating the latest treatment of wounds, whether gun-shot or otherwise, and of diseases of every character; but through this instrumentality the people of the United States receive this information; and it was because these societies in the various States thought we were going to cut down this supply and that the amount of the appropriation would not be sufficient to allow them to get it, that these manifestations came up to Congress.

I think my friend from North Carolina certainly has seen that Medical History of the War, and I cite that because I doubt whether there is a Senator on this floor who has not had applications for copies of that work ten or twenty fold more than he could supply. That has been my experience; and I think it is a work not only creditable to science in this country, but to the medical science of the world. I think, when we are having an expenditure for Army museums, that we should let the people get the benefit of them, and of all the publications which they publish. That is the case with the Patent Office Report and the Agricultural Report. As to how far this was originally constitutional in some of its branches, I should, perhaps, agree with my friend. I think the practice has grown up to be a very bad one; but as long as we have these medical museums under an express grant in the Constitution to maintain and regulate armies, I think we ought at least to let the people have the results of their labor, and we cannot do it under an appropriation of $5,000.

Mr. MERRIMON. I would not be understood as being hostile to the medical profession. On the contrary, I am very friendly toward them, and I am ready to vote an appropriation for the encouragement of science and learning anywhere and at any time. I appreciate the work to which my friend from Kentucky refers as much as any one. I am ready to vote for the publication of a new edition of it. I believe the medical profession of the country and the interests of the country demand it. I should like to see it distributed to the medical profession and public libraries all through the country. But the point that he makes against the exception I take, it seems to me, is not well founded. This appropriation is not for the purpose of publishing a book or paying some money to collect materials for a book; it is for the purpose of buying books to go into the library.

I suppose that is intended to pay for medical periodicals, and such other books as may come out as the Surgeon-General may deem proper to be added to his library.

Mr. STEVENSON. Let me ask my friend a question, to bring it down to a practical point. How can the Surgeon-General and his subordinates keep up with the progressive achievements of medical science without having the latest editions, the latest discoveries, both in Europe and America? The Surgeon-General hears that there is a great discovery in France or in Germany. He desires to get it. Where is he to get the money from? Will you keep him chained down? Will you deny him the knowledge which science, not only in medicine, but in other things, is daily achieving? And how can he have it unless you make these appropriations?

Mr. MERRIMON. I concede that the Senator is correct in that view; but I do maintain that it would not take $5,000 to buy up the current literature for the next year on that subject. It is now proposed not only to take $5,000 but make it $10,000. I am willing to agree to $5,000, but I will not go the $10,000.

Mr. LOGAN. I am opposed to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Louisiana to increase the amount to $10,000, and I will give my reasons.

I think the Senator from Kentucky is mistaken in reference to the manner in which this money is used. The medical works that he speaks of as having been distributed for the benefit of the medical faculty in this country are not works produced from the money that is appropriated for this library.

Mr. STEVENSON. I did not say so. My friend misunderstands me, and I am very glad to have an opportunity to explain. I say that all the medical works which we distribute cannot be produced without allowing the men who write those works to have the material with which to make discoveries. In other words, this medical museum asks $10,000. For what purpose? Not to furnish the books that I alluded to, but to qualify scientific physicians to furnish matter which, when compiled, we distribute.

Mr. LOGAN. The Medical History of the War was not extracted from scientific works particularly, but was made up from the reports of the different medical officers who acted as surgeons and assistant surgeons during the war, in reference to the manner of treating wounds of different characters, in reference to the manner of amputations, and everything applicable to surgery in the Army. It is a very valuable book. An appropriation was made by Congress for the printing and publication of so many copies of it, to be distributed to the different colleges and medical men throughout the country. But this appropriation is one that has been creeping in for the last few years, making a separate library from the Congressional Library. The truth is that the Congress of the United States ought to provide for the procuring of books for the Congressional Library, and not for a medical library. They may be procured by a person appointed by Congress on the recommendation of medical or other persons for particular purposes; but whenever you appropriate, year by year, money to enable different individuals to procure libraries, you have half a dozen different libraries without having them a part of the Congressional Library.

I made this very objection to this proposition once before. The Congressional Library ought to contain all the libraries belonging to the United States, for the benefit of all classes of its officers, whether medical, legal, scientific, or otherwise. It ought to be a part of the Congressional Library, and whenever you appropriate money to different scientific men belonging to the different scientific branches of this Government, you have separate and distinct libraries, separate and distinct appropriations, and you never know how much money is expended for that purpose. That is the objection I have to this. It is not because I oppose procuring scientific works. I believe in it. I was the Representative on the floor of the other House who advocated the appropriation which was made for the printing of this Medical and Surgical History of the War, and I did it for two sessions before I got the appropriation made. I have always advocated appropriations for purposes of this kind beneficial to science. But an appropriation like this ought to be in connection with the Congressional Library of the United States, and the books ought to belong there. All the books of the Government that are in use, it makes no difference whether used by the medical part of the Army, the medical part of the Navy, or any other branch of the public service, ought to be taken from the Congressional Library, and be charged of record, so that the Government may know what they are, and where they are, and what has become of them.

Now, $10,000 is more money than any medical college in the United States would use during any fiscal year for procuring scientific works on this branch of science, and it is too much. If I thought it was not too much I would vote for it; but I am satisfied it is too much. If gentlemen will examine into the prices of books, and the number of new authors in medical or any other branch of science, they will find that $5,000 expended every year for additions to a library will make you a very extensive library in a very few years. I think $5,000 is enough.

I merely make this suggestion which I have thrown out. I do not move any proposition to make this a part of the Congressional Library. I discussed it before, and it did not seem to have any impression on anybody. Hence I do not propose to do it again; but my impression is that $5,000 is ample; I will not say too much, but it is certainly sufficient.

Mr. STEVENSON. As to whether Congress ought to put its medical library under the control of the Librarian I have nothing to say. That might meet my view when the proposition came up. The law library is not in the same room.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not mean the same room. Control is what I am talking about, so that we may have some record.

Mr. STEVENSON. Whether the Librarian of Congress ought to have control of all this medical library and of the law library is a question on which I have nothing to say; but I have a word to say in reply to my friend, and I think he will agree with me when I get through.

I thought $5,000 was sufficient as he does, and I voted to reduce the item to $5,000. Upon information I afterwards received, and upon which I was compelled to rely, I shall be very willing that it shall be increased, though I care very little about it. The committee reported $5,000.

Mr. LOGAN. I think that is enough.

Mr. STEVENSON. Perhaps so; but who is to decide that?

Mr. LOGAN. The committee, I suppose.

Mr. STEVENSON. On what basis, as to correct results, shall the committee act? We reduced it to $5,000.

Mr. SARGENT. The committee subsequently changed their action.

Mr. STEVENSON. The committee subsequently changed their action upon information which the Senator who has charge of this bill reported to us as proper in consultation with the gentleman who has charge of this medical museum, the Surgeon-General. I presume the Surgeon-General knows exactly the wants of this department. It is true the funds to distribute the Medical History of the War do not come out of this item; but this medical museum had a great deal to do with the accuracy of that work. This medical museum was established during the war. Go into it and you see not only books, but every medical invention. Improvements in chemistry, improvements in anatomy, improvements in the various branches of medical science are found there. Then, in addition, you find representations taken during the war of every species of gun-shot and cannon wound; you find photographs of soldiers suffering from saber-cuts. These wounded soldiers, with their wounds, were photographed, and the photographs are to be found now in this medical museum.

Mr. LOGAN. That is true.

Mr. STEVENSON. Then you must furnish the scientific men there engaged with scientific works to enable them to study these wounds; and as you give them facilities, the various medical men studying these photographs, diagnosticating the wounds, they come to certain results, and these results constitute the history, which is then distributed. We all remember the great reputation of Dr. Physick, who lived in Philadelphia. There might be good physicians throughout the Union; but why was he regarded as pre-eminent? First, nature formed him a physician; and then he spent years abroad in the hospitals of Europe, and his reputation was established. Now we give to the young intellect of America, and especially to our military surgeons and assistant surgeons, every opportunity of acquiring knowledge in surgery and in medicine, and we post them as to their advances, and the results of their studies and investigations appear in the books to which I have alluded. The information which this appropriation has enabled them to obtain is redistributed by publications in every part of the Union.

Now, as to the sum, whether $5,000 or $10,000 be necessary, I do not know; but after we had struck it down to $5,000, the Surgeon-General insisted that that was not sufficient, and we had to act on his information.

Mr. LOGAN. I appreciate the position of my friend from Kentucky. I do not claim any credit for myself, but I do not believe any man in the Senate Chamber has done much more than I have, as a representative, to advance the interests of science during the term I have served.

Mr. STEVENSON. I yield that certainly. I think so.

Mr. LOGAN. Hence my opposition to this large appropriation is not because I am opposed to the spread of science. If you will look at the history of your geological surveys that are in operation now and from whence you are getting reports, you will find that I made the first motion in the Congress of the United States to appropriate money for that purpose. As I said before, I advocated the first proposition for the distribution of medical works; but there is one difficulty that my friend from Kentucky does not seem exactly to see. What I was calling his attention to was the difficulty we are getting into as members of Congress, in reference to these appropriations. We appropriate money, $5,000 or $10,000 in this case, for what? It is for no purpose on earth but to buy pamphlets and subscribe for medical pamphlets and medical journals, and to procure the newest works. I insisted before, and insist now, that no money should be appropriated for a library by Congress, except for the Congressional Library. To-day you can step into the Congressional Library and get every one of the pamphlets that these gentlemen will subscribe for. Your action here the last few Congresses (because this is a new thing that has crept into the appropriation bills) has been but to duplicate works that there was no necessity for. I did not want to say that, but I will say it now, because it is a fact. This practice of expending money merely to accommodate individuals and to please certain men, is entirely without any reason whatever. This money ought to be appropriated to the Congressional Library of the United States, and then, upon the recommendation of the courts, let certain law books be furnished; of medical men, certain medical works, and so on; but all should be paid for out of the same fund, the same appropriation. As to the place where they are kept, that is a different matter. This very thing we are doing now is encouraging the duplication of libraries in this country at the amount of the expense that you appropriate every year, without any benefit whatever.

I have made these suggestions to the Senate and to the Appropriations Committee. Whether they will be followed or not, or whether they will be considered, or whether any one deems them of any value or not, makes no difference to me. I have suggested them before, and my honest opinion is that $10,000 given to any man, I care not whom, cannot be expended in the next fiscal year prudently in purchasing magazines and medical works that have come out since the last purchase. I do not believe any such thing. It is an extravagant appropriation, and, as I said, it is a duplication of pamphlets and works that can be found in the Library of the Congress of the United States just as fast as they are published, for each publication, all over the world, just as fast as it is published, is sent here to the Congressional Library, and you can find it there to-day. Hence I say you are duplicating your libraries and expending money unnecessarily.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. There is no kind of doubt about what my honorable friend means. This is too much money for books.

Mr. SARGENT. I ask my friend to yield to me for a moment. I wish simply to remark in reply to the closing statement of the Senator from Illinois, that I understand these works are not to be found in the Congressional Library; that they are not collected by Mr. Spofford.

Mr. LOGAN. Which works?

Mr. SARGENT. The medical works which we are purchasing, and which have been purchased heretofore under similar appropriations.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not know whether I am correct or not, and if I am not, I am misinformed; but my understanding is that each publication is procured for the Congressional Library of every class of works.

Mr. SARGENT. These publications are European works, and of course they are not sent to our Library.

Mr. LOGAN. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. My honorable friend from Illinois gives prominence to a fact that is not in this case; and that is the difficulty and the infirmity of his argument, if he will allow me to say so. This is not to buy books.

Mr. LOGAN. What is it for?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. It is for the support of a museum, a medical museum.

Mr. LOGAN. Let us read it.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. There are some books in it.

Mr. LOGAN. It reads:

For the Army Medical Museum, and medical and other necessary works.

What other necessary works?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I was going to remark to the honorable Senator that the objective point is the support of a museum. Books are connected with it necessarily, but that is not the chief expense by any means. If my honorable friend had given attention to the subject and looked at the Book of Estimates, particularly that portion of it which treats of the disbursements, he would have seen that the principal portion of the $10,000 was expended last year in the support of the museum, and whoever looks in upon that museum will see that during the war there was collected in the city of Washington a collection of medical works and medical subjects treating of the whole matter of wounds and diseases that were connected with the Army that is invaluable to the country.

Mr. LOGAN. Everybody agrees to that.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. That is just what we are preserving; that is just what this $10,000 is for, chiefly and mainly. The books are ancillary. Now, it may be worth while to explain about the books. My honorable friend from California, who is always familiar with subjects of this kind, and so happens to be thoroughly informed about them, states what is undoubtedly true, that this is to purchase a class of books which are not found in the Congressional Library—specialties. I am not going to argue the question whether this is so or not, but my friend from Illinois should know this: that the Congressional Library has only two copies of any one book. Can these be loaned out to this institution? Does my honorable friend think that the books, the specialties of the profession, can be obtained in the Congressional Library and there be loaned out?

Mr. LOGAN. Not at all. I said no such thing.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. And for that very reason my honorable friend will see that the Congressional Library is not at all reliable for such an institution as this.

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator misunderstood me entirely. I said nothing about having these books put up here in the Congressional Library; but that this should be a part of it, because the Library of Congress should have jurisdiction, and exercise it, over all the books that belong to the Government as part of that library, it makes no difference where the books are kept.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. My honorable friend is stating a general proposition with which I am entirely in accord. I think as to the practice of the Government—and we are going to try to correct it to some extent this session—there is a practice of buying books for various public libraries, which is erroneous.

Mr. LOGAN. That is it exactly. I did not mention that, but I meant just that.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. But this does not touch that.

Mr. LOGAN. You can go to the Bureaus and find a book of the same kind in every one of them, and find the same in the Library, purchased three, four, and sometimes eight or ten times, by the Government.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I agree to that; but what I would be very glad to invite my honorable friend's attention to is the distinction between that and this precise thing. It is as broad as anything can be. When we look to the fact, which I got up to emphasize, that the object is the support of the museum, which I know my friend desires, and that the books are simply ancillary, the question becomes a very plain one in my mind. It was in this sense that the committee, with a desire to retrench, agreed to reduce this item to $5,000, but on further examination we came as clearly to the conclusion that the sum ought to be $10,000.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After twenty minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at five o'clock and fifteen minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, March 18, 1874.

The House met at twelve o'clock m., Mr. ALBERT in the chair as Speaker pro tempore. Prayer by Rev. GEORGE P. HAYS, D. D., of Washington and Jefferson College, Washington, Pennsylvania.

Mr. DONNAN. I move that the reading of the Journal be dispensed with.

There being no objection, the motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House meets to-day for debate only; no business whatever to be transacted. The subject of discussion is the bill (H. R. No. 1385) to regulate commerce by railroads in the several States.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

Mr. WILLARD, of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, the interest elicited in the discussion of this bill is sufficiently warranted by the ultimate object which it seeks to accomplish. That object is the exemption of our interstate commerce from unnecessary and unjust burdens. But while the bill embodies a plan for the regulation of fares and freights imposed by railway corporations, we may still assume that its real purpose is the permanent provision of cheap transit in the interchange of commercial products throughout the immense extent of country which owes allegiance to this Government, and is entitled to its care. The Government regulation of railway traffic is only a part of a much greater whole, and involves a question of much broader scope—one which has never intermitted its claims upon public attention, and can never cease to be of vital interest as long as we have a Government to uphold, or a people to uphold it—as long as we possess industries and require a commerce for supplying the demands of an extensive and varied population.

POPULAR INTEREST IN THE QUESTION.

The question thus presented is neither new nor of limited discussion. Its agitation is not alone confined to this Hall nor to the Chamber at the other end of the Capitol. It engrosses, perhaps more than any other topic, the thought and speculation of the people. It has been one of the leading subjects to occupy the columns of the daily and weekly press. It has called forth articles in our ablest magazines and reviews. It has been the problem that has sought solution at the farmer's fireside, in the shop of the mechanic, and in the counting-room of the merchant and manufacturer in every part of the land, as well as in workingmen's councils and in the chambers of commerce in all the prominent business centers. It has furnished the basis of repeated calls for conventions in nearly every county, especially at the West; and it has, in numerous instances, brought together deliberative assemblies representing the business interests, not alone of one or more States, but of the entire Union. It has been before State Legislatures and State constitutional conventions, and has there inaugurated new and untried measures of legislation; and now this question comes before Congress, not, indeed, as an utter stranger to these Halls, as I shall endeavor to show, but with an emphasis of demand far greater than it has hitherto possessed in our nation's annals.

NEW ERA IN THE NATION'S LIFE.

The reason of the increased importance which this question has acquired in the eye of the public is obvious. For there is scarcely need in this presence to mention the fact that our Republic has now entered upon a new era of existence, and has reached a stage of advancement which marks essentially a new period in its history. Our statesmanship in the future is to be chiefly directed to achievements which in the past have been comparatively subordinate.

WHAT THE NATION HAS ACHIEVED.

The first century since the date when the American people began to devise measures for the general welfare through the instrumentality of a Federal Congress, will during the present year have reached its close. The work of that century has been, indeed, a great one; and is displayed in results which it would be idle for me to enumerate, or, perhaps, even to mention. Suffice it to say that statesmanship hitherto has found an appropriate field for the performance of duty in the tasks imposed in the securing of our national independence; in the first creation of the Union of the States; in the practical adjustment of our political institutions to those principles and doctrines of democratic freedom upon which they are theoretically founded; in the provision of the requisite machinery for effecting the required purposes of the Government and the putting of that machinery into proper order; in establishing the relations of the new Republic with the family of the world's nations; and more recently in the removal of that greatest obstacle which has ever existed to the real completion of national unity and the reconciliation of sections, through an experience which, however stern and severe, has at the last culminated in the attainment of a ground-work for permanent prosperity and future growth, which may be deemed to fitly close the formative, unifying and organizing period in the life of the nation.

THE NATION'S NEXT DUTY.

The work which lies before the American people, and cannot fail to demand marked attention from the Government in the era upon which we are now entering, is the inauguration of more enlarged and comprehensive measures for the interior development of the entire country. It is the encouragement of industries in every portion of the land, and the devising of plans for rendering its almost immeasurable resources available for the well-being of the people who dwell upon the soil of the Republic. It is the especial task of the immediate future to make the territory we occupy a fitting theater for the activities and energies of a people who, in material thrift and business enterprise, are laying the best possible basis for the institutions of intelligent liberty, and a high and advanced civilization.

Everything, therefore, relating to the welfare of our material interests, our agriculture, our manufactures, our commerce, everything which provides for making capital remunerative, or for giving a generous reward for labor, comes to us weighted with incentives and obligations which no man can overlook and retain the least claim to true statesmanship or enlightened patriotism.

SURPRISING GROWTH OF COMMERCE.

This duty requires additional force at this particular juncture, from the fact that the business activity and wealth-producing facilities of the world are just now undergoing a remarkably rapid development. The unexampled increase of commerce among the civilized nations of the globe, appears to be exactly coincident with and is no doubt in large measure the cause of, that unprecedented urgency with which this question of interstate commerce is now forced upon the public consideration.

Within the last two decades, the aggregate foreign commerce of the leading nations of Europe, and on this side of the Atlantic, has been more than doubled. The total amount of the export trade of these nations was, in 1855, but $4,241,700,000, while in 1872, seventeen years afterward, this trade had reached the sum of $9,276,000,000, being an increase of 118½ per cent. The population of the countries whose trade has received this extraordinary growth, has indeed increased at the same time, but only at such a low rate compared with that of the development of their commerce, that the per capita increase has been 90 per cent., the trade of the great commercial nations of the globe having been in 1855, on the average for each individual of the population, $15.62, and in 1872, $29.76. This enlargement of the amount of foreign trade has been accompanied with a corresponding increase, both of production and consumption, by the people with whom, at home and abroad, the various industries of this country have been brought into commercial connection. The increase of business and wealth has also been attended with a like addition to the means of inland commerce and the transportation of the products of labor.

Within the brief period to which we have just referred, there were built in the United States 48,730 miles of railroad, and in Europe about 59,000 miles, at an aggregate of estimated cost, on both continents, for construction and equipment, of $10,000,000,000. The application of steam to manufactures and transportation, together with the opening of the gold-fields in California and Australia, as also the ambition for industrial achievements enkindled by the new ideas of political liberty, everywhere manifest, have contributed to this marvelous addition to the world's capital, have impressed a new feature upon the age in which we live, and have inevitably impelled us to a new crisis of statesmanship.

RESPONSIBILITY OF THIS CONGRESS.

Without undervaluing, therefore, the importance of the various other questions which now await legislative deliberation and disposal, there can be no hazard in declaring that the responsibility of the present Congress is so fully centered in the duty of clearing the way and taking the initiatory steps for the proper solution of the transportation problem, and in the adoption of the right method of Government action in regard to internal improvements, that the meeting of this responsibility on the one hand, or its evasion on the other, will respectively determine whether the Forty-third Congress will enjoy the credit of having nobly and courageously improved, or of having weakly and negligently missed the opportunity of a performance commensurate with the requirement of the hour.

THE BETTER POLICY INDICATED.

If, in my remarks upon the bill now under consideration, I shall be able to contribute something toward exciting a deeper sense of this responsibility, or toward indicating the practical methods of meeting it, I shall have accomplished all that I design, and almost more than I can dare to expect. In this attempt I shall leave to others the discussion of the legal aspects of the proposition now before the House, as well as the work of arraying statistics to prove the imperiousness of the demand for legislation in behalf of the interests of our interstate commerce, and shall confine myself to suggestions upon what I deem the true national policy on a great national question.

The end, Mr. Speaker, sought to be reached by the plan proposed by the very able Committee on Canals and Railroads, and supported by what must be confessed to be exceedingly cogent arguments, is one which cannot fail to challenge universal approval. Accordingly, it is with regret that I find myself obliged to dissent from the views of the committee, when they come to bring forward the measures by which they propose to secure that end. The result desired is cheap transportation; and the committee certainly deserve the thanks of the House and of the country for the earnestness, vigor, and patriotic zeal with which they have endeavored to grapple with the difficulties and to overcome the giant evils which obstruct the attainment of this result. In what I am about to say, therefore, if I shall oppose their method, it will not be because I do not most heartily sympathize with their purpose, but because I believe that for the attainment of this purpose there is a more excellent way. I firmly cherish the conviction that there is a better path through the entangling wilderness which is hedged about this question than can be found in any direct Federal interference with existing facilities—I mean the path of Government aid in creating certain great arteries of inland communication for commerce and trade, both by water and land—arteries which being kept open for the flow of our products, will afford every needed regulation for our interstate traffic.

The reasoning which, in my view, justifies a policy of this kind, is based upon the highest considerations of public utility, and is overwhelmingly conclusive.

A PROMINENT DESIGN OF GOVERNMENT.

When our fathers asserted in the preamble of the Constitution that the "general welfare" was one of the purposes for which that instrument was ordained by the people, they but declared the self-evident object of all government. The nation which they embraced under that Constitution we justly and proudly style a republic, because it aims to secure the common welfare of the people, and thus realizes the essential definition of that term, as applied to a popular form of government, by the most philosophic and accomplished statesmen of antiquity. "A republic," says Cicero, "is the common weal of the people; but a people," he continues, "is not every collection of men brought together, as it may happen; it is a collection of human beings, united together by the bond of common justice and the utilities to be derived from association." The American people, in their very union, indeed in the very notion that they are a people, have the obligation imposed upon them, not alone to secure individual rights by just laws, but to associate themselves for the creation of those great national improvements, those substantial and enduring utilities, which they and their posterity may possess in common and enjoy forever. Government is shorn of one of its most essential functions when it neglects to promote the general welfare. No political maxim can be more plain; and that every American may read it, and know it, this maxim has been engraved upon the very portals of the Constitution.

TRANSPORTATION THE GREAT CIVILIZER.

Equally unchallenged, also, is the fact that commerce and human welfare are shown by every lesson of history to be inseparably associated. Commercial facilities everywhere mark the course and give the measure of civilization. Were we to choose a single term which should at once serve as the index and the watch-word of human progress, it would be that term with which we have become so familiar in the agitation of the question before us. The word "transportation" is inscribed upon the front banner of man's highest enterprise and achievement. It indicates the line of march taken by the races distinguished for material and social improvement, art, culture, liberty, and religion. Where a bountiful nature had already provided facilities for transportation, there we find the theater of industry and enlightenment. Europe and Western Asia, intersected by numberless seas, inlets, and rivers, invited energy and business thrift, while Africa, with an even coast and an almost riverless interior, discouraged commerce and turned civilization from its shores. It was transportation that led the star of empire westward; and it is that which gives to America, with her inviting sea-coast, her inland lakes, her mighty rivers, and her artificial pathways of iron, an advancement and a social and moral condition which forty centuries of attempted improvement have denied to Asia.

ARTIFICIAL FACILITIES DEMANDED.

But these commercial facilities are never so adequately supplied by nature that they need no improvement at the hand of man. The incentive given by their partial supply naturally inspires an endeavor to make this supply more complete. This has led to great works for improving the channels of trade and inland communication at those periods when the spirit of enterprise has shed luster upon the age in which it was manifest. The military roads built throughout the Roman Empire were only second in importance to the Roman law in preparing the way for the institutions of modern society. The little state of Holland, in her bravely undertaken and bravely completed system of dikes and canals, laid the foundation of an industrial prosperity and of a stand for liberty which have surrounded her with a rare glow upon the historic page, and will ever continue to elicit the admiring attention of mankind. Nor is our own country without a conspicuous instance of the same kind. The State of New York, under the lead and inspiration of that illustrious statesman, DeWitt Clinton, with a courage then without example, and since almost without parallel on this hemisphere, opened the Erie Canal as the highway for western commerce, and thereby secured to herself a commercial supremacy freely accorded in the proud title she wears—the Empire State.

INDIVIDUAL EFFORT INADEQUATE.

Sir, we cannot doubt that to improve the channels of commerce is to promote the best interests of society and to lift the nation to true greatness. But we must remember that the accomplishment of such works is not within the reach of a single arm. Individuals cannot wield the force or provide the means requisite for so great a task. Hence an aggregation of capital and an association of effort must be secured. No one man's unaided enterprise can protect Louisiana from the overflow of the Mississippi, or Holland from the angry and destructive invasions of the North Sea. No one man's unaided ability is sufficient to connect the great lakes with the Hudson, or to span the continent with a railway.

CORPORATIONS OR THE GOVERNMENT, TO WHICH SHALL WE RESORT?

But the necessary aggregation of capital and association of effort can only be obtained through corporations or through the action of the Government. Between these we must make our choice. The danger of having no alternative but the uncontrolled power of the former has become clearly obvious; and the want of such an alternative has brought the industrial interests of the country to the embarrassment from which the bill of the committee proposes a way of relief.

We have seen that aggregated capital, wholly under private control and unregulated by any constant and reliable competition, is, like those two elements so serviceable to man, fire and water, a most excellent servant but a very dangerous master. The power of our railway corporations, and the wide reach of their influence, are not to be disguised. A Philip II, in the Escurial, with his iron will and unrelenting despotism guiding the movements of armies and determining the fate of populous communities by the quiet stroke of his pen, is reproduced in the railway president of our times, who holds the business interests and welfare of cities and States subject to his dictation. The corporations thus controlled may do much in providing the agencies for conducting our immense inland traffic, but that does not release the Government from the obligation to open those highways of commerce which the whole people can claim as their own, and which can alone place upon the tyranny of monopoly a safe, invariable, and practicable check.

THE DOCTRINE OF 1787.

The national Government, in a solution of the transportation problem by the method here indicated, would only adopt a policy which numbered among its advocates the ablest statesmen and the wisest patriots of a century ago. Indeed, as we have heard in the course of this debate, the regulation of commerce and the adjustment of the facilities of trade between the several States, more than any other one thing, gave birth to the Republic.

In the convention that framed the Constitution the question of aiding commerce by artificial means of communication opened by Government did not escape notice. The duty appears to have been generally conceded, though some members of the convention doubted the propriety of expressing it in distinct terms, for fear that opposition might be needlessly incurred in certain quarters from the expression of a prerogative which the new government would evidently possess without it.

VIEWS OF FRANKLIN.

Benjamin Franklin desired to give this prerogative explicit mention, and moved to add to the clause authorizing Congress to establish post-roads the following words: "and to provide for cutting canals when deemed necessary." With his prophetic eye the foremost sage of America seemed to foresee the imperious needs of the very crisis to which we have now come. He seemed to grasp and comprehend the demands of our inland commerce, and the pressing call of the measureless products of the Mississippi Valley for free and open pathways to the sea. And it is doubtful, Mr. Speaker, whether that chiefest of statesmen who adorned our history previous to and during the time of the formation of the Republic, is more entitled to the gratitude of posterity for the matchless sagacity with which, as the agent of the Colonies at the court of Saint James, he circumvented the designs of British tyranny, or for the scientific skill with which he showed how to ward the lightning's bolts from human life and property, than for his standing forth in the Federal Convention of 1787 as the advocate of a system of internal improvements to be inaugurated and conducted under the national auspices. He was for expressly ingrafting in the fundamental law of the land that provision which he deemed so vital to its prosperity, and to put beyond all cavil and doubt the authority of the Government, through this important instrumentality, to provide for the essential welfare of the vast population which was in successive generations to inherit this continent.

SECONDED BY MADISON AND OTHERS.

The proposition of Franklin received the cordial support of James Madison, who, in the course of the debate upon it, declared that, "the political obstacles to a union of the States being removed, a removal of the natural ones, as far as possible, ought to follow;" and the States of Pennsylvania, Virginia, and Georgia gave to the amendment an affirmative vote.

But the instrument, without the amendment, was not considered defective in its grant of power in this regard; for we find Edmund Randolph urging upon the people of Virginia the adoption of the Federal Constitution on the ground that it would open the way for the inauguration and perfection of great internal improvements by the General Government. The views of Alexander Hamilton upon this subject are familiar to all. He saw in the Constitution every agency which could be brought out and used for extending the vital currents of commerce throughout the land, and for infusing life and the means of growth into the industrial interests of the people.

SUPPORTED BY SUBSEQUENT STATESMEN.

Certain reasons, in a later period of our history, induced a construction of the Constitution which would place a limit to this power. At one time this doctrine was especially prevalent at the South. But, sir, I would remind you that it was a citizen of Georgia, Mr. Baldwin, an able and influential statesman, and afterward United States Senator from the present Empire State of the South, who stood up, eighty years ago, in the American Congress and advocated the policy of national internal improvements, for the very reason, which we find so strongly forced upon our consideration at this time, that these improvements could not be efficiently and successfully conducted by the several States. In the House of Representatives, February 11, 1794, on the bill to provide for an extended survey of post-roads, he struck the key-note of the argument for all similar measures, declaring that it was "the business of the Government to undertake the improvement of the roads; for the different States are incompetent to the business, their different designs clashing with each other."

By a force of expression and eloquence of statement which may be said to characterize all the writings and state papers of Mr. Madison, he, in his message to Congress in 1815, recommended a national system of roads and canals; though he afterward vetoed Mr. Calhoun's "bonus bill," which provided the preliminary means for giving efficiency to that measure. In the debate on that bill Mr. Pickering and Mr. Clay strenuously indorsed its constitutionality, and gave it a cordial and earnest support. Mr. Cambreleng, "after mature deliberation," as he says, "and having devoted much attention to the question," arrives at the view that the construction of roads and canals is one of the constitutional prerogatives of the General Government—a doctrine which gained the modified acquiescence of Mr. Berrien. Even Mr. Madison, whose change of view, induced by his extreme theory of strict construction, we have already noted, never relinquished his opinion respecting the advantages which national arteries of commercial communication would afford to the country; and later in life, when the question of national aid to these enterprises was conspicuously agitating the public mind, he reiterated his faith in their utility, and declared his conviction that the power of making canals of right should be vested in Congress.

CONFIRMED BY THE GREAT EXPOUNDERS.

But, whatever doubt may have existed respecting the constitutional power to charter, aid, or conduct enterprises of commercial improvement, it is safe to assume that such doubt is no longer seriously indulged. Those great expounders of the Constitution, Webster and Clay, with the sweeping might of an irresistible logic, and with a breadth of statesmanship that knew no horizon but the limit imposed by the national welfare, put this doubt among the things of the past, and established the policy of improving the rivers and harbors of the nation, and of encouraging other undertakings in behalf of the interests of internal commerce by the Federal authority.

THE PLAN OF THE COMMITTEE INEXPEDIENT.

The expediency of looking in the direction here indicated for the regulation of our interstate traffic is, therefore, the especial feature of the question which remains for the nation to consider. The greatest argument to be urged in support of this expediency is the difficulty of providing the requisite transportation facilities, at reasonable and controllable rates, by any other method. The people justly complain of the evils of monopoly in our internal carrying trade, but experience has shown that the evils of monopoly seldom find an efficacious remedy in direct governmental interposition for the regulation of values. The very life of business is freedom; and that life loses its energy when subjected to arbitrary laws, imposed by an authority other than its own. Human industry and its product, capital, are liable to innumerable conditions and to countless varieties of relation to each other and to society; and no wisdom has yet been great enough to point out a better plan than to leave them to the self-regulating balance-wheel which governs the movements of business and commerce the world over. Labor and capital, however invested and however directed, compose a complex machine, so intricate in its construction and so delicate in its motion, that the attempt to interfere with its automatic freedom by external dictation has invariably worked ruin to itself and disaster to the community. Schemes to fix the prices of products or to determine the profit of capital by municipal regulation or statutory enactment have never proved a success.

REGULATION BY A COMMISSION DIFFICULT AND DANGEROUS.

The principle of regulation by specific law, itself difficult and dangerous, gives place to greater dangers and greater difficulties when the regulation is submitted to the arbitrary control of a commission. This commission must be composed of men; and where are the means to be found for inevitably securing a class of men who shall approach the delicate and intricate task imposed upon them without favor and without prejudice? Setting aside the fact that, if the members of the commission should be among the most sagacious and just citizens that could be obtained for the purpose, they would still be unable to adjust the relations of investment and profit in a business of such immense magnitude, who is to guarantee that these men shall be wisely and judiciously selected? Who shall assure us that they will be wholly impartial? Who shall give us warrant that they will not be chosen in the interest of the railroads? Or, if we avoid this Scylla, who shall guard us from the opposite Charybdis of having a body of men in that position who would refuse to recognize for railroad corporations even the most common rights of property? Do we not know that the appointing power which should name this commission would be too great a stake for the railroad party on the one hand, or the anti-railroad party on the other, to forego the effort to secure it without a violent struggle? Thus we should have a strife in our national politics, an apple of discord in our public affairs, which, to say the least, it is exceedingly unsatisfactory to contemplate, and which, above all things, we should hesitate to invoke. We ought, I think, to pause before inaugurating a state of things in which the great body of the agricultural and other producers, and the exclusive owners of all the channels of our vast inland commerce and the highways over which the products of the continent are to be carried, shall be put into a necessary and inevitable condition of commercial and finally of political antagonism. The bill is objectionable, if for no other reason than that it offers a bid for the railroads to strive for the political supremacy of the country, and to gain the control of the national Legislature and the Federal courts.

A DESIRABLE CHECK.

The Federal authority might very properly be invoked in the creation of statutes for preventing railway officials from misapplying the capital under their control and converting it to their own personal advantage through the formation of transportation companies of which they are the stockholders and managers, and by which they monopolize for their own benefit the business and profits of the roads over whose interests they have been selected as the responsible guardians. It is this imperium in imperio, this monopoly within a monopoly, this wielding of the vast property of a greater public to the sole benefit of a lesser junta of custodians, that puts the grip of Hercules upon our struggling commerce, and tends to wither the life of every kind of business which seeks the channels of our interstate traffic. Find the way for making these unjust combinations impossible; make it a crime by law, as it is in fact, for the trustee to pervert his trust to his own emolument, and to obtain the power to lay tribute upon the business community by the means of other men's property, and you will then go far toward reaching the core of the evil of which the people on every side so loudly complain.

GOVERNMENT REGULATION BY COMPETITION.

But, Mr. Speaker, I apprehend that no restriction by statute, no limits imposed upon corporations, by any regulations, either State or national, will permanently secure cheap transportation. By a law of political economy, a higher law than Legislatures can make, cheapness is a result which must come from competition. But in our American railway system we have failed of the result in a large degree from not being able to provide its cause. Competition, when obtained, is soon lost in combination. The people have aided to build competing lines of railroad only to find that the consolidation of these lines had defeated their efforts. Is there not, however, some source to which we can look for the supply of a remedy which we in vain have sought from private enterprise? Is there no power that can give us competition, and thus insure to us cheapness? I believe there is such a power—a power which can be easily exerted for the universal welfare, and without trenching upon a single individual right; a power that can regulate commerce by the unerring and unfailing law of competition, and that power exists in the national Legislature, of which this House forms a part, thus directing the mighty arm of the Republic to one of the most beneficent ends to which a government can direct its energies, next to the preservation of liberty and the security of justice. The achievement of New York in the completion of the Erie Canal, by which competition was instituted by the State, has insured a cheapness of transit which has defied all the combinations of monopoly. It has furnished a sure and successful regulator of fares and freights, and has thus conferred untold benefit upon the producer. That channel of commerce opened by State authority, in its assured success for nearly half a century, points to a policy which the American people must inevitably adopt and utilize on a broader scale in the control and regulation of the rates of our interstate transit.

THE TWO GREAT NATURAL CHANNELS.

It is a fortunate circumstance that the facilities for cheap competitive routes of commerce, under the Government auspices, have already been partially afforded in the physical features of the continent. Nature has been generous of her aid in this consummation, and cordially invites the co-operation of man. Two rivers, numbered among the very chiefest on the face of the globe—the Saint Lawrence and the Mississippi—seek the ocean respectively near our northern and our southern border. If we except certain removable obstructions, these rivers possess a vessel-bearing capacity which enables them to extend the world's ocean traffic into the very heart of the continent, and to bring far the greater share of our wide territory into intimate communication with the common highway of the nations. The former of these is the outlet of the great lakes, and invited the special notice of Washington, who, just after the Revolution, on the shores of Lake Ontario expressed his gratitude for the beneficent care of Divine Providence in vouchsafing the grant of these immense inland seas to his country for the benefit of its internal commerce; while the purchase which a few years later gave to our people the control of the other channel was, as we all know, the crowning triumph in the statesmanship of Jefferson.

THE LAKES AND THE SAINT LAWRENCE.

The chief obstructions of the water-route by the lakes and the Saint Lawrence are the Falls of Niagara, foreign occupation, and the high latitude in which the river meets the ocean. These are to be obviated, first, by a ship-channel around the Falls, thus affording for the larger portion of the year direct trade between the young and rising emporiums on the lakes and the marts of Europe; secondly, by increasing the capacity of the Erie Canal, thereby bringing these emporiums into direct connection with New York, the point at which all the leading arteries of our continental and foreign commerce must inevitably center. This great pathway of trade should be extended westward, linking Lake Michigan with the Mississippi by a water-route and opening a communication with the immense river system which stretches thence to the base of the Rocky Mountains. It is the increase of facilities on this northern commercial line which more especially excites the interest of the State which in part I have the honor to represent upon this floor. The products of Michigan, as well as her imports, demand the opening of the freest and cheapest possible route eastward to the Atlantic; and this demand has found expression in the unanimous sentiment of her Legislature, embodied in a memorial presented to this Congress, urging the early construction of the Niagara Falls Ship-Canal.

THE MISSISSIPPI.

The obstruction which prevents the navigation of the Mississippi by sea-going vessels exists chiefly at its mouth, being produced by the same cause which gives constant enlargement to its delta. An appropriation immeasurably small, when compared with the resultant benefit, would give the means of avoiding this, and, with certain additional improvements to its channel, would make sea-ports of the cities which stud its banks for a thousand miles. New Orleans would be touched with a new life and become animated with a business vigor that would displace the complicated strife of her politics, would stimulate in her a generous rivalry with her commercial sisters, that would at once wipe out every trace of past alienation, and bind her merchants and all her citizens with those of the East and the North by the bond of a common interest and a common prosperity. It was the demand for free commerce through the mouth of the Mississippi that furnished to the great States of the Northwest the strongest incentive to preserve the integrity of the Union in the late war; and we may be assured that the facilities obtained by this commercial outlet are allied not alone with the material welfare, but with the patriotism of the whole people.

THE TWO INTERMEDIATE CHANNELS.

But, Mr. Speaker, between these interstate water-routes, which respectively reach the sea at New York Harbor and the Gulf of Mexico, an extent of territory intervenes, comprising numerous States, populous cities, and embracing a geographical surface which in the next century will sustain a hundred millions of people engaged in every variety of agricultural and mechanical industry. This region demands commercial accommodations not supplied by the lake route, or that of the Mississippi. But the provision for the supply is indicated by a single glance at the map. At one point the valleys of the Ohio and the James Rivers approach each other in close proximity; and at another point those of the Tennessee and the Altamaha, each traversed by large, navigable streams, and inviting the construction of canals and the opening of lines of communication, which would not only confer inestimable advantages upon the belts of country more immediately adjacent, but would afford, for well-nigh the year round, transportation facilities for the States lying beyond the Mississippi, as also those north of the Ohio. Thus Norfolk, in Virginia, and Savannah, in Georgia, would each become the gateway for the ingress and the egress, not of a mere provincial, but of a national commerce. These cities would take the commercial rank which is their just due, and would realize the most sanguine hopes of their founders and of succeeding statesmen. Their spacious harbors would no longer wait for the index that marks on the dial-plate of destiny the high purposes of nature in their formation, and would at once be covered with a forest of masts; their streets would become busy with a continental trade; and the lines of traffic which would connect them with the West and the Northwest would form, with the Mississippi and the Saint Lawrence, a quadruple cordon of commerce which, together with the net-work of subsidiary routes ramifying through every portion of the Republic, would vitalize the entire Union with a commercial life such as man has never yet seen, and render the goodly frame of our Federal fabric so perfectly indissoluble that nothing could dissever its firmly compacted joints, and no power could break it into sections, save the fiat of Omnipotence.

DOUBLE-TRACK FREIGHT RAILWAY.

These water-routes, however, may fail to supply the requirement of permanent and unvarying competition. They will probably need to be supplemented by a double-track freight railroad, chartered and controlled by the Government, under conditions for rendering it as nearly as possible an actual highway for the transit of products. The demand for speed and for winter transportation will cause the railway to be an indispensable means of carriage—a fact which removes our surprise when we observe that the most advanced thought upon the subject now under consideration tends toward the experiment for attaining cheap transportation by the establishment of this kind of a regulator of fares and freights under the auspices and by the aid of the Government. The board of railroad commissioners in Massachusetts, in their recent report, after a full and exhaustive discussion of the question of railway regulation as related to the State, arrive at a conclusion which most forcibly sustains this view. I will ask the Clerk to read from the report the following paragraphs which I send up to his desk.

While the experiment of executive supervision is upon its practical trial in Illinois, the discussion has made a step further in advance in Massachusetts, where a proposal of partial State ownership has been agitated. This is the final possible solution of what is known as the railroad problem. As a solution, it differs in two important respects from that now being attempted in Illinois. It neither seeks to effect any separation between the ownership and the management of railroad property, nor does it try to establish an arbitrary regulation of railroads, wholly inconsistent with the fundamental principle upon which the railroad system was founded. In Massachusetts, as in Illinois, that fundamental principle was competition, and it is to competition, through the light of experience, that the project of State ownership, as proposed in Massachusetts, seeks to make the system return. The proposal has been to attempt the regulation of all the railroads of the State, through the public management of one of them. The community is thus to experiment with its own property, and not with that of private parties. Starting from the fundamental proposition that competition is the best possible regulating power—far better than the arbitrary decision of any tribunal as to what may or may not be "reasonable"—the theory of partial State ownership next recognizes as a corollary to this principle the aphorism that where combination is possible competition is impossible. Both reason and experience show that the combination of railroads owned by private corporations is not only practicable, but that it is absolutely necessary to save them from destruction at each other's hands. Competition among railroads beyond a certain point can, indeed, result only in their consolidation. It therefore both has followed, and necessarily must follow, that either competition as a regulating force will be abandoned and recourse had, as in France and Illinois, to an executive substitute for it, or else that some competing agent must be introduced into the system so differently constituted from the other members of it that it will not enter into combination with them. This alien element it is sought to secure through diversity of ownership—a public road competing with private roads. But the end always kept in view is, not the abandonment of competition as the regulating force, but the return to it. It is, on the contrary, those most reluctant to accept a partial State ownership who propose the abandonment of all reliance on competition and a recourse to arbitrary regulation.

Mr. WILLARD, of Michigan. The argument which is here urged in support of a method of competition proposed for inauguration by the State may also be applied to the policy which the Government should adopt in the regulation of commerce between the States, and the facilitation of transit from the remote interior to the sea-board.

OMISSION OF DETAILS.

But in the remarks now made, Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to give the details of any of the plans which might be suggested for the action of the Government in cheapening fares and freights, by the method which I have endeavored to simply indicate rather than to unfold. The time allotted me in this debate forbids such an attempt, and besides, as already stated, I willingly yield that task to those whose experience may justly entitle them to lay that branch of the subject before the House and the country. I shall be more than satisfied if I can but add a grain to the weight of argument and encouragement which seems to impel the nation to this new step of duty in its triumphant march toward a great destiny. To this it is urged, not alone by every consideration of public utility, but by the inspiring voices whose echoes still linger in this Capitol, reminding us of the earnest convictions and high aspirations which from time to time, in regard to this consummation, have found utterance from the lips of the most illustrious statesmen of the Republic.

NATIONAL DEBT OUGHT NOT TO HINDER.

But in advocating this view of national policy, I am not unaware that I present a view which in many quarters is considered impracticable and even utopian.

Those who propose a system of national improvements on a scale sufficient to meet the wants of the country are accused of temerity, especially at this time, when the nation is so heavily burdened with debt. But the House should be reminded that wealth is the result of enterprise, not of a mere hard-fisted and grinding economy. Men in private business do not make improvements simply because they are sufficiently rich and abounding in means; but because, if poor, they desire to be so no longer, and if already wealthy, they wish to become wealthier. The path from poverty to riches is taken by those who have energy and enterprise; and the determination to pursue that path has inspired nearly every great undertaking which has lifted the human race to a higher level of enjoyment and prosperity. When a nation ceases to develop the resources of its wealth, then look for the destruction of its credit, for the financial embarrassment of its people, and a fixed paralysis upon all their energies.

That cheap transit is the national road to wealth we cannot doubt. The products of the country, if they can only command the prices they deserve, would soon relieve the nation of the burden of its debt, would give us the balance of trade with foreign nations, and thus at once solve the otherwise intricate riddle of the currency. It would give better rewards to the labor and higher profits to the investments of the western farmer, and also cheaper bread, cheaper clothing, and cheaper homes to the eastern workingmen. In short, there is no other key which will unlock so many of the trying and difficult questions of American statesmanship as this.

OBJECTION OF JOBBERY ANSWERED.

It is further objected to this policy of Federal improvements that it opens the way for jobbery and peculation. But this argument should not be allowed to have weight before an intelligent people, who are determined to exercise a watchful scrutiny over the acts of their officials. If the logic here used proves anything, it proves too much. If it has any force, as applied to the measure before us, it has force also against every measure which intrusts the Government with an expenditure of money. Perhaps we had better cease all operations whereby any financial outlay is made, because it affords a chance for mismanagement and plunder. But, Mr. Speaker, when we are prepared to concede that we can have no honesty of administration, the time will have come for us to abandon all hopes of having a government for this Republic. The people have faith in their form of government, for it is the people's own; and they will find a way for securing economy and judiciousness in the expenditure of the public funds. Indeed, a rigid watchfulness of the way in which their money is spent will be one of the most essential features of their policy. In this sign they will conquer, by this rule they will measure and determine the amount of the confidence which they repose in their public men; and by it they will largely judge of the qualifications which they shall demand in those to whom they shall confide the administration of their affairs.

REPLY TO THE OBJECTION OF UNEQUAL BENEFIT.

Another objection frequently urged against these undertakings by the Government is, that they do not confer equal benefits upon every part of the Union. But this objection is chiefly made by those who have hitherto reaped the most solid advantages from Federal legislation in behalf of their own industrial interests. If the western farmer has ever been induced to murmur at the unequal effects of the tariff, he has at once suppressed that murmur when confronted with the suggestion that the imposition, though somewhat unfair and unequal, was still for the general benefit of American industry. The laborer in Michigan and Iowa has realized his common fellowship with the laborer in Pittsburgh and Lowell; and as he has taken his way eastward from his wilderness or prairie home, and has stood beside the smoking furnaces or listened to the hum of the spindles in the great manufacturing centers of the East, he has been animated with the reflection that the encouragement of industry and the liberal reward of labor in his own country, in whatever portion, were worthy of being sustained, even though it were done in some measure at his own cost. Thus New England and Pennsylvania, and the Eastern States in general, have developed their mighty industrial resources; and the West has been content to aid in this consummation, not alone from a common pride in the achievements of American enterprise, but from the recognition of the undeniable axiom that the prosperity of one section is also the prosperity of all.

If the West and the South now put forth their claims, shall they not meet with a generous response from those portions of the Union whose industries have been made to thrive by the general acquiescence in the principle that the business of the country, and the material resources and prosperity of the country, must be developed, even if, in some quarters, this should seem to be done at the expense of a temporary sacrifice.

Gentlemen of the East, the West has been indulgent, nay, generous, in encouraging a system that would enhance the price of your products and the value of your property. We have aided to give thrift to your enterprises, to enlarge your cities, and to build up your truly imperial industries; and now, in our turn, we ask you to be equally indulgent and equally generous when we come with a demand that consideration should be given to a subject in which we have a special and peculiar interest. As we have been willing to see that our welfare was bound up in one common destiny with yours, so now may you see that your welfare is bound up with ours.

THE DUTY OF A CIVILIZED PEOPLE.

We all recognize the truth, Mr. Speaker, that this is a business age; and what man is there among us worthy to bear the name of American, whose pulse does not beat faster, and the current of whose life-blood does not have a quicker flow, as he observes the magnificent march and the constantly increasing conquests of our enterprise? This enterprise is the leading feature of the time in which we live, and conspicuously indicates the duty as well as the destiny of the people of this Union. And the people everywhere are lifting themselves up to the level of this inspiring thought, in regard to the obligations that lie immediately before them. We do not occupy this domain of territory, stretching from ocean to ocean, and bounded respectively, in its extreme limits north and south, by the Arctic Circle and the Tropic of Cancer; we do not occupy this territory as a race of savages whose only aim it is to gain a temporary subsistence from the productions of its soil, and to bequeath it to the generations that shall succeed us in the same condition in which we found it, without development and without improvement. Nor are we, as a semi-barbarous people, simply to extract the precious ores from its mountains, to cut down its noble forests, and to use its rivers and lakes as a means of communication, just as they may chance to have been provided by nature, without any attempt to improve and enlarge upon the munificence of her bounty. No, sir; our mission, the mission imposed by our civilization, is a higher and a nobler one. We are to embellish this country and to adorn it with useful and permanent improvements. Toward this result private enterprise is to contribute within the sphere of its ability, and where the need requires, municipal and State aid is to be rendered, and when these prove insufficient the strong arm of the Republic itself must be invoked, especially when the requirement of aid is enforced by obligations which are derived from one of the most weighty and solemn purposes for which the Union was created, the promotion of the general welfare of the people who made and who sustain this Government.

THE CRY OF THE WEST.

Especially do the people of the interior demand the improvements for which I now plead. The voice that is echoed throughout the Mississippi Valley, and which rings from the Alleghanies to the Rocky Mountains, is the same as that which sounded from the lips of the famous ten thousand Greeks, as they threaded their way through the fastnesses of Asia Minor, or that which became the watch-word in our own times of the army of Sherman in its march from Atlanta, and that cry is, "The sea, the sea!" We come with no hostile forces; we come with no warlike battalions; we ask no tribute and demand no forage; we come in the name of that Peace which hath her victories more renowned than those of War; we come in the name of a great people and a great industry, with an offer of blessing and prosperity to the entire nation—the East as well as the West, the North as well as the South—and we demand for ourselves and the millions who are to come after us, free, open, and unrestricted pathways for our commerce to both oceans, the Atlantic and the Pacific.

Mr. WOLFE. Mr. Speaker, the size of this body, the rules which govern it, and the practice observed by the Chair, and I might add, "the good of the service," do not permit every member to speak when he wants to, or upon any subject he may select. The division of the House into committees, and the assignment of the various subjects of legislation to the appropriate committees, wisely transfer most of the valuable labor of this often noisy and confused body to the quiet and orderly committee-room, where the subjects can and do receive patient and careful consideration.

At all events, such has been the case with the bill now under discussion. It has been very carefully considered by the Committee on Railways and Canals, both as it regards the necessity of some legislation on the subject and the power of Congress to enact it. And, as a member of that important committee, I now feel that it is not only my privilege but my duty to detain the House a short time in presenting my views upon some of the mooted questions presented by it; at least so far as to explain the reasons why I shall vote for the bill.

The time allotted for discussion here will not allow me to touch upon all the questions that are involved in the proposition, nor to answer all the objections that may be urged against it. I will, therefore, confine myself chiefly to the two main questions, namely, first, does the public welfare require any such legislation? and, secondly, has Congress the constitutional power to enact such a law? If either of these questions must be decided in the negative, the bill ought not become a law. But, sir, if the facts show that some such legislation is needed to protect the people from the extortions and unfair discriminations practiced by the mammoth railroad corporations, and to teach these corporations that they are not wholly irresponsible to all law except their own will, and to compel them to discharge their public duties with some decent regard to the rights of the public; and if we shall be compelled to say, as a naked question of constitutional law, that Congress, and no other body, has the power to intervene on behalf of the people and to apply the remedy, then our duty is plain. The oath that we have taken to "support the Constitution of the United States" is no more binding than is that part of the oath by which we are bound to "faithfully discharge our duty." It is our duty to support the national Government in all its just and necessary powers, as much as it is to support and protect the State governments in the exercise of all their reserved rights and powers.

Gentlemen who make such loud pretensions in defense of that Constitution must remember that it is just as much a violation of that sacred instrument for a State to exercise a power that is delegated to the United States, as it is for the United States to exercise a power that was reserved to the States. The two governments, so far as their rights and powers are concerned, are as separate and independent of each other as are the three great departments of the Government—the executive, the legislative, and the judicial—separate, distinct, and independent in their powers, privileges, and functions. The national Government, as well as the State governments, is our government, and I am proud of it. True, its powers are limited, and I am glad of it; but within those limits it is supreme. It was made by the people, and ratified by the States. The people and the States are both bound by it. Within the power conferred by the Constitution upon the national Government the States are wholly without power. There is no such thing as concurrent jurisdiction between the national Government and the State governments. A subject belongs to the one or the other exclusively. The question in this case is, to whom does the power of regulating commerce among the several States belong?

These governments, national and State, are the people's governments; both forms are necessary to the government of the country; and yet, to hear some persons talk about the national Government, one would suppose it was some foreign, tyrannical, and despotic institution, that by fraud or violence was forced upon the people to steal away their liberties and oppress them. Now, let me say to gentlemen that while it is their right and their duty to be watchful of their liberties, let the attack or the threat come from whatever quarter it may, these indiscriminate and false cries upon all occasions, "without rhyme or reason," do the cause of State rights no good; but, on the contrary, by tending to make it ridiculous, do it great injury.

I know, sir, that the people, and especially those who are opposed to the present Administration, are very and justly watchful of the encroachments of the powers of the national Government over the rights of the States. I know, sir, that numerous instances may be found in the legislation of this country, during the last twelve years under republican rule, in which the Constitution has been disregarded and the rights of the States encroached upon or seriously threatened. But these instances do not affect in any way the question before us, and they must not be permitted to be drawn into this discussion. Let this bill stand upon its own merits, or let it fall if it has none; but do not let its fate depend upon the sins that have heretofore been, or hereafter may be, committed by Congress. We want no vicarious punishment inflicted in this case; especially when all the benefits of such fallacies and such prejudices are to inure to the advantage of the great railroad corporations, whose power is the great danger to be feared; a danger beside which even the great dangers resulting from Federal encroachments are comparatively tame and harmless.

But let us see what it is that we are proposing to do. Let us see if it is true, as my friend from Kentucky [Mr. ARTHUR] stated in the beginning of his speech a few days ago, when he said we were proposing, "by act of Congress, to make a Federal incursion into the reserved province of executed contracts between man and man;" or let us see if it is true that we are proposing to make a raid upon the States, or to interfere in any way with any right or power that the State can claim or exercise under the Constitution of the United States. I affirm this bill does no such thing. I affirm that the powers which will be exercised by the Federal Government under this bill are powers which are expressly conferred upon it, and in which the States have no more power than they have to regulate commerce with foreign nations. It is not a right of the States to do what this bill proposes to do. As well might my learned friend from Kentucky, and others who may be wrapped in his web of abstractions, claim that Congress has invaded the province of State or of private right when it enacted the law regulating commerce upon our public rivers, as now to be frighted out of their wits by this proposition, which is simply to apply the same principle exactly to commerce carried on over the public highways known as interstate railroads. By what kind of reasoning can these gentlemen say that Congress may regulate commerce upon our rivers, and not "invade the province of private or State right," by providing in the minutest particulars how a steamboat shall be constructed, how its machinery shall be operated, the number of passengers it may carry, what means for their safety shall be provided, and a hundred other details involving plenary power over the whole subject, and yet when this bill, which falls far short of such minute regulations, and which only provides that the railroad carriers shall not rob their customers by unreasonable charges, and shall not make unreasonable discriminations, is submitted, exclaim, "O, hands off; our sacred doctrine of State rights stands in the way; you may invade the province of private right on the public rivers, but in the name of democracy, in the name of State rights, in the name of private right, you must not do the same, or anything like it, upon our public railroads?"

I tell gentlemen who make such a proclamation that they are not the oracles who hold in their hands the key of the temple in which I worship. The creed of my political church is not such a bundle of inconsistencies as they would have us believe. No, sir; the day, thank God, has gone by, and I hope never to return, when any political party in this country can be controlled by any of these "one-ideaed" abstractions. O, will my dear friends who seem so nervous on this subject never learn that the democratic party is a living organization simply because it is founded upon living issues; and that whenever it shall have nothing but the dead bones of the past to hold up to the gaze of the people the logic of events will prove that the dead bones and their worshipers alike will be consigned to the same tomb? First or last, that is the inevitable result. If gentlemen wish the democratic party to live and prosper they must infuse into it the spirit of life. This can be done alone by keeping it in harmony with the spirit of the age and the wants of mankind. The law of party life, when properly understood, will be found to consist of a single word—utility. This is peculiarly a utilitarian age, and we are peculiarly a utilitarian people. The American of to-day—I mean the ruling sentiment of to-day, of whatever nationality that rules America—has great veneration for the past honors and past glories of mankind; but that same American of to-day wants to see those honors and those glories recorded upon the monuments, the cenotaphs, and historic records of the country, and not upon our statute-books, where they would only mar its symmetry and clog the wheels of our advancement. In a word, if the democratic party will march square up to the front, and not belie its fame in all its past career, as the party of progress and of the people, it will by such a bold movement demonstrate to the world that it has not outlived its day of usefulness, and will thereby command and receive the admiration and the support of the people.

The bill under consideration is for the purpose of regulating that branch of our commerce that is carried on over those railroads, and only those which run into or through two or more States. The bill, it will be observed, does not propose to interfere in any way with those railroads that are operated wholly within a single State. The regulation provided for is to fix the rates and schedule of prices for carrying passengers and freight, prohibiting extortion, or the making of unreasonable charges for such services, prohibiting unfair discrimination as common carriers, and fixing penalties for such acts of extortion. And for the purpose of establishing such reasonable rates the bill provides for the appointment by the President, by and with the consent of the Senate, of nine railroad commissioners, one from each of the nine circuits of the United States circuit courts. Such commissioners are given the power to make all necessary examinations in regard to all facts in connection with such railroads as shall enable them to fix upon what would be reasonable charges for each railroad, and to make a schedule of such charges. And in all trials for extortion the rates so fixed in such schedule shall be taken prima facie to be reasonable charges; but on any trial for extortion the railroad company or carrier may show that the rates which are charged to be extortionate are, in fact, reasonable, notwithstanding such schedule. In other words, the burden of showing that any rates charged above the schedule rates are reasonable is thrown upon the railroad company.

Now, that is the substance of the "incursion" so elaborately, and I may say ably, opposed by my friend from Kentucky, [Mr. ARTHUR.] I have examined this bill carefully and listened to him patiently, and I am yet compelled to confess that I do not see where the incursion, as he calls it, comes in. The bill, in its broadest scope, and in its prime object, is simply to protect the people against the extortions and unfair discriminations of such common carriers as are engaged in interstate commerce. In other words, the bill proposes to interfere in behalf of the fifteen or twenty million farmers of all the interior portions or this great country, so as to enable them to transport their surplus produce to the sea-board at fair and reasonable rates. Now, sir, if that is a raid upon the States, I say it is far preferable to the raid the railroad monopolies have been making upon the people for the last few years.

This is not a contest between the Federal Government and the States. It is a contest between the people on the one side, and the railroad corporations on the other. Gentlemen must not be permitted to change the name of the parties to this contest. These corporations cannot be permitted to appropriate the cloak of States rights under which to maintain their claim of a right to lord it over the people. That game is too old, and we who are watching it are too old to be cheated by it. No, sir; let the parties to this contest stand upon their own merits; let them fight under their own colors. And, so far as I am concerned, they must fight under their own generals. When the rights of the States are assailed I will defend them. When the rights of the people are assailed I will defend them. But when the pretended rights of these great corporations are assailed, when their grasping powers are assailed, they must look elsewhere for an advocate.

The question of railroad extortions by charging unreasonable rates for carrying passengers and freight, and the power of Congress over the subject, are, perhaps, the most interesting questions now before the American people. During about the last forty years the railroad system of the United States has been established. That system now embraces about seventy thousand miles of road, whose iron bands stretch their wonderful net-work over the entire country. The value of that peculiar kind of property is estimated at something near $4,000,000,000; and the earnings of these corporations amount annually to $400,000,000, a sum about equal to the entire revenues of the United States. The obstructions at the mouth of the Mississippi River—which render that otherwise great highway, as an outlet to foreign commerce, almost useless—compel the fifteen or eighteen million people who inhabit the great valley of that river and its tributaries, including fifteen States, with their $1,000,000,000 worth of annual productions, to employ these interstate railroads in the transportation of their vast surplus productions to the sea-board, for sale in foreign countries, or to be consumed by the non-agricultural regions of the East, or the non-cereal-producing regions of the South.

The present condition of the avenues of our interstate and domestic commerce leaves the agricultural people of the great Northwest almost entirely dependent upon the railroads for the means of carrying their productions to market, while the East and the South are equally dependent upon the same carriers to receive these agricultural productions for the supply of their people with food. During nearly one-half of the year, while the Erie Canal, in New York, and the Welland Canal, in Canada, are closed by ice, the entire commerce between the West and the East is carried on over the four great trunk-line railroads, (not to mention the Grand Trunk, in Canada.) These are the New York Central, the Erie, the Pennsylvania Central, and the Baltimore and Ohio; and these have formed connections or combinations with, or obtained leases of, nearly all the most important western roads; and the result is, that both of the sections of the country, West and East, are compelled to pay tribute to these vast corporations, or, I might say, vast monopolies.

That these corporations have used their hitherto-unmolested powers in fixing their own charges at rates which have made them the most wealthy corporations on the continent is a fact that even the railroad advocates here will not deny. And the manner in which the exorbitant earnings of these railroads are covered up, under the cloak of moderate dividends, not only shows their frauds, but is conclusive evidence of their acts of extortion. To show how their power to fix their own tariff of charges is abused, just as such power always is abused when it is irresponsible, I need but refer to a single example. The total cost of the consolidated roads, now known as the New York Central, to the stockholders and bondholders, was less than $30,000,000; yet, by the device known as "watering the stock"—that is, issuing additional stock for the earnings of the road instead of dividends—the stock of that corporation has been swelled to the enormous amount of $90,000,000—three times the true amount; and upon that vast sum the earnings of the road now pay a dividend of 8 per cent. per annum, equal to a dividend of 24 per cent. upon the actual cash capital invested. To enable the owners of that corporation to thus nearly double their investment every four years, the agriculturists of the West and the consumers of the East are compelled to pay tribute. If that corporation earned only the reasonable compensation of 10 per cent. on the actual investment, it would yield $3,000,000 in dividends annually. But 8 per cent. on the watered stock amounts to $7,200,000; showing a grab of $4,200,000 which that one company is annually making over and above reasonable compensation; and that is the amount of the tribute the people are paying annually to that single corporation. And to enable these corporations to continue forever such extortions the sacred name of State rights is invoked. Verily, that is the old game of attempting to "steal the livery of Heaven to serve the devil in." My opinion is, the livery is slightly too thin to hide the monster's horns.

Yet, in the face of these enormous dividends, we are told that railroad companies cannot afford to carry passengers and freights at lower rates than they are now charging; and the only way the farmers of the West and Northwest can ever get cheap transportation is for them to compel the Government to expend one or two hundred million dollars to open up water-communications as channels of commerce to the sea-board. While I am in favor of these water-lines being opened, or at least some of the more important ones, as auxiliaries in cheapening transportation, I do not think such water-lines the only source of relief the people have.

The nature of the agricultural productions of the West and Northwest renders them peculiarly sensitive to these extortionate charges. Those articles that are light compared with their value, as cotton, worth usually eighteen or twenty cents per pound, and other light articles, as sugar and tobacco, are not so much affected by high charges for transportation. But nearly all of the principal articles produced by the farms of the great central basin of the Union are comparatively heavy compared with their prices; and the result is some of them do not bear shipping at all to the eastern markets. Hay and potatoes are of that class; for the value of the article would not pay the freight. At a cost of three cents per ton per mile it would take the whole value of the following articles to ship them by rail the following distances:

	Miles.
Cotton, at 19 cents per pound, could be shipped	12,666
Sugar, at 10 cents per pound, could be shipped	6,666
Tobacco, at 8 cents per pound, could be shipped	5,533
Wheat, at $1.24 per bushel, could be shipped	1,377
Potatoes, at 54 cents per bushel, could be shipped	600
Hay, at $22 per ton, could be shipped	733

From these figures it will be seen that the transportation question in all of its aspects is of the first importance to the people of the central valley. It is too important to be pushed aside in order to sustain any fine, hair-splitting abstractions. The people will not have, and should not have, any patience when their vital interests are threatened with perpetual restrictions with these fine-spun theories. My theory is, that the Government was made for the people, and should be so administered as to subserve their interests; and when it ceases to be of that character, it should be remodeled so as to accomplish that beneficent purpose.

Now, sir, in view of the depressed condition of agriculture in the West, and the causes which have produced it, which are a scarcity of money and the obstructions of interstate commerce by reason of these railroad extortions and a lack of proper water-communications to the sea-board—I say, in view of these facts, need we be astonished that there is a popular and indignant uprising and earnest protest throughout the country, known as the granger movement? For my part, my only astonishment is that the revolution did not begin sooner. That it has been so long delayed is evidence that the people are patient and long-suffering.

The questions that are presented by this bill are highly interesting, not only on account of the fact that they involve a grave issue in the old contest between capital and labor, but also because the questions in the form presented, as political questions, are new. We have no party platforms to guide us, or rather to limit and control our judgments and our actions. None of us are here under any pledges of a political nature, either expressed or implied. We are in that unbiased condition in which we can treat these questions fairly, if we are disposed to do so.

But, sir, the most interesting question in connection with the provisions of this bill is this: Has Congress the power under the Federal Constitution to regulate commerce "among the several States" to the extent and in the manner that this bill provides? I will express my views upon the whole question before I conclude; but for the present I desire to say that after mature and unbiased consideration of the question as to the power of Congress to regulate commerce carried on over the interstate railroads, to the extent of fixing a reasonable tariff of charges for carrying passengers and freight, and providing penalties for extortions practiced by such carriers, and to prevent unfair discriminations, I am clearly of the opinion that such power exists, and that it is plenary, and exclusively in the Federal Government; the States having no more power over the subject of interstate commerce than they have over foreign commerce.

But before examining that question, I wish to say or repeat that there is no one here or elsewhere who is a more firm and unwavering advocate of the old democratic—or, if you please, Jeffersonian—doctrines of "State rights" and "a strict construction of the Constitution" than I am; I mean when those doctrines are properly interpreted and applied. I do not, and never did, believe in that misinterpretation and misapplication of the doctrine of State rights as understood and acted upon by the extreme men of the Calhoun school of statesmen, when they claimed secession to be its legitimate sequence. The State rights taught by Jefferson and enforced by Jackson in his proclamation against the South Carolina nullifiers were the rights of a State in the Union, and not its right to go out of the Union. It has been said by the advocates of centralization of power in the Federal Government, by usurping and absorbing the powers of the States, that the democratic doctrine of State-rights was overthrown and wiped out by the results of the war. But that is not true. It was only the Calhoun construction of that doctrine that found its last grave at Appomattox. The true democratic doctrine was not in any way or in any degree involved in that contest. I say it found its last grave at Appomattox; it found its first grave in the great contest between Webster and Hayne, in this Capitol, over forty years ago.

The democratic doctrine of State rights, so ably promulgated by Jefferson in his first inaugural address, is, that our home, State governments are the palladium of our liberties, and that they ought to be preserved in all their vigor. That doctrine, truly applied, would remove the danger of territorial expansion, and lead to peace and amity between the sections. It would give us increased political purity, and a cheaper and more satisfactory administration of justice. Centralization, by removing the power away from the people, leads to irresponsibility on the part of office-holders, and renders abuses difficult to be corrected. In a country like ours, where there is such a great diversity in climate, soil, productions, business, morals, education, and wealth, it is only through the means of these home governments that these various and diverse local interests can be properly cared for, because there only can they be properly understood.

These things were well understood and appreciated by the fathers when they made the Constitution; and they did leave all the powers with the States that the general welfare demanded should be left there. But the fathers knew there were some powers that the States could not well or safely exercise. Hence they wisely withheld some powers from the States, and as wisely gave certain powers to the General Government. Yet, by doing so, they did not favor centralization; and we, who now favor the exercise by the General Government of those powers conferred upon it, are not in favor of centralization any more than they were.

The powers delegated to the Federal Government belong there; and it is the settled doctrine, settled by our highest judicial tribunals, that such powers cannot be exercised by the States. A power conferred upon Congress belongs exclusively to Congress, and the States cannot exercise it.

The Constitution of the United States (article 1, section 1) says:

The Congress shall have power to regulate commerce with foreign nations, among the several States, and with the Indian tribes.

This language, it seems to me, is too clear and explicit to admit of more than one interpretation, or, as jurists express it, too clear to admit of construction. Yet we may have politicians among us who have learned their knowledge of constitutional guarantees and limitations from loosely constructed and illogically construed party platforms, who may entertain some doubt as to the meaning and extent of this clause of the Constitution; and for their benefit, whether they are here or elsewhere, I now propose to give the question a brief consideration in the light of the highest judicial authorities of the country.

In the first place, it will be observed that the subject which Congress has been charged with the duty of regulating is commerce; and hence it is important to understand the meaning of that term and the sense in which it was used.

Judge Redfield, in his able and interesting work on Railways, at page 720, uses the following language:

The natural import and construction of the terms of the Constitution would not seem to admit of much doubt, judging from the language merely. The meaning of the word "commerce," at the time the Constitution was adopted, must have been definitely settled and well enough understood. The word, as is well understood, is derived from the Latin commercium, and which is found almost in its original form in most of the languages of modern Europe. It means, in its most literal sense, intercourse and exchange, both of persons and commodities. It is more nearly synonymous with "traffic" than with any other word in the language, probably. Its great natural divisions for ages have been "foreign" and "inland." The regulation of all the former and that portion of the latter which extended beyond the limits of a single State was, as we have seen, by the organic law of our national Government, secured to the nation, and the remainder was naturally left to the particular State where it exclusively existed.

It is obvious that the purpose of the provision was not to be confined to future commerce carried on in the same mode it then was, i. e., by ship and boat navigation, propelled exclusively by wind. If that had been so, the provision could not have been applied to that large portion of commerce now carried on by steam-power, which has already become very considerable, and is constantly increasing in a rapidly advancing ratio.

In the celebrated case of Gibbons vs. Ogden (9 Wheaton, 1) decided by the Supreme Court of the United States fifty years ago, that great jurist, Chief Justice Marshall, delivering the opinion of the court, uses the following language:

The subject to be regulated is commerce; and our Constitution being, as was aptly said at the bar, [by Mr. Webster,] one of enumeration and not of definition, to ascertain the extent of the power it becomes necessary to settle the meaning of the word.

The counsel of the appellee would limit it to traffic, to buying and selling, or the interchange of commodities, and do not admit that it comprehends navigation. This would restrict a general term, applicable to many objects, to one of its significations. Commerce, undoubtedly, is traffic; but it is something more, it is intercourse. It describes the commercial intercourse between nations and parts of nations in all its branches, and is regulated by prescribing rules for carrying on that intercourse.

According to this high authority, commerce is not limited in its meaning to "traffic" and "buying and selling," and hence something more than the mere traffic—the buying and selling of commodities—may be regulated. It means commercial intercourse in all its branches, "and is regulated by prescribed rules for carrying on that intercourse." This language leaves no room to question that Congress has the power to prescribe rules, that is, enact laws, to regulate the carriers and the carrying of commodities between or among the several States, as well as rules for carrying on all other kinds of commercial intercourse.

The subject of regulating the fare of passengers, and the price for carrying freight by common carriers, is not new to the law. The rules of the common law, with which all lawyers ought to be familiar, have for ages taken cognizance of the subject, and prohibit the charging of unreasonable rates by common carriers. This constitutional provision did not originate the policy of legal interference to prevent extortion by common carriers. It only determined which of the governments, the State or the national, should have jurisdiction over the subject so far as it relates to the three kinds of commerce mentioned, namely, "with foreign nations," "among the several States," and "with the Indian tribes." In each of these, and exactly alike in each, the Constitution has conferred upon the legislative branch of the national Government complete and exclusive jurisdiction. What Congress cannot do on that subject cannot be done by any power on earth. The entire subject—not only a part of it, but the entire subject—is committed to Congress. Judge Redfield, in his work on Railways, already referred to, at page 722, says:

The fact that the entire subject of regulating all commerce among the different States, including all the means and appliances by which it was carried on, was committed to Congress, and that thereafter the States were to have no concurrent action in the regulation of the same, would seem to reduce the question of Congress having the power of regulating interstate railway traffic to the single inquiry whether it forms any portion of the commerce of the country which requires to be regulated at all. Those who assume to argue that Congress has no power to regulate the traffic upon these extended lines of railway, reaching from one end of the Union to the other, must, if they would meet the question fairly, either say the traffic on these extended lines of railway, amounting to many millions annually, probably ten times as much as the entire commerce of the country at the time of the adoption of the Constitution, is not commerce at all; or, if it be, is not subject to any regulation or control whatever. For it is certain the States have neither the power nor capacity to regulate to any purpose, or with any efficiency, this interstate railway traffic. It must, then, come under the control of Congress, or be left to its own devices and impulses—an experiment never yet tried in any other country.

Mr. Justice Story, in his Commentaries on the Constitution, than which there is no higher elementary authority in this or any other country, lays down the doctrine in regard to this power of Congress to regulate commerce among the several States, that such power is plenary and exclusively in Congress. He says:

It is general and unlimited. Full power to regulate a particular subject implies the whole subject, and leaves no residuum. The grant of the whole is incompatible with the existence of a right in another to any part of it. A grant of power to regulate necessarily excludes the action of all others who would perform the same operation on the same thing.

This authority is as clear and pointed as language can make it. The power being granted to Congress necessarily excludes the power of a State to do the same thing. Then, if we voluntarily abdicate the power by refusing to exercise it, there is no power anywhere to exercise it, and the result would be that these pampered monopolists would be left in full possession of the field; and the vast agricultural and commercial interests of all the interior portions of the country would be now, and for all time to come, at their mercy. If they did not oppress the commerce among the States, it would be simply because they would choose not to do so. If the people's rights were respected it would be by the favor of these monopolies. I am not willing to leave the assertion of a right to the favor of any one, and especially to those whose pecuniary interest is against the right. The history of all such contests in every age, and in every part of the world, shows that these great corporations have oppressed the people whenever they have had the power to do so; and so far, their history in this country furnishes no exception to the rule. And yet the favor and good will of these corporations toward the people, are all the guarantees that those who oppose legislation by Congress on this subject have to offer us. In the light of history, and with our experience of the soullessness of corporations, this is poor consolation indeed. Is it possible that our fathers made such a terrible mistake in the organization of our Government as to leave such a power without any control? I do not believe they made such a mistake; and I would be extremely sorry to know they had done so. And I can inform my eloquent friend from Kentucky, [Mr. ARTHUR,] and all others who agree with him, that it will require more than his "glittering generalities" and obsolete abstractions to convince me that such a grave mistake was made by them.

And on this same general subject I quote again from the opinion of Marshall, C. J., in the case of Gibbons vs. Ogden:

To what commerce does this power extend? The Constitution informs us, to commerce "with foreign nations and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes." It has, we believe, been universally admitted that these words comprehend every species of commercial intercourse between the United States and foreign nations. No sort of trade can be carried on between this country and any other to which this power does not extend. It has been truly said that commerce, as the word is used in the Constitution, is a unit, every part of which is indicated by the term. If this be the admitted meaning of the word in its application to foreign nations, it must carry the same meaning throughout the sentence, and remain a unit, unless there be some plain, intelligible cause which alters it. The object to which the power is next applied is to commerce "among the several States." The word "among" means intermingled with. A thing which is among others is intermingled with them. Commerce among the States cannot stop at the external boundary line of each State, but may be introduced into the interior.

It is not intended to say that these words comprehend that commerce which is completely internal, which is carried on between man and man in a State, or between different parts of the same State, and which does not extend to or affect other States. Such a power would be inconvenient, and certainly is not necessary. Comprehensive as the word "among" is, it may very properly be restricted to that commerce which concerns more States than one. The phrase is not one which would probably have been selected to indicate the completely interior traffic of a State, because it is not an apt phrase for that purpose; and the enumeration of the particular classes of commerce to which the power was to be extended would not have been made had the intention been to extend the power to every description. The enumeration presupposes something not enumerated, and that something, if we regard the language or the subject of the sentence, must be the exclusively internal commerce of a State.

Again, I read from the same decision:

This principle is, if possible, still more clear when applied to commerce "among the several States." They either join each other, in which case they are separated by a mathematical line, or they are remote from each other, in which case other States lie between them. What is "commerce" among them, and how is it to be conducted? Can a trading expedition between two adjoining States commence and terminate outside of each? And if the trading intercourse be between two States remote from each other, must it not commence in one, terminate in the other, and probably pass through a third? Commerce among the States must of necessity be commerce with the States.

After a careful study of these authorities, the general power, and indeed I may say the plenary power, of Congress over the subject ought to be regarded as settled. The decision of Gibbons vs. Ogden has stood the test for fifty years unquestioned. While the court in the mutation of political parties has been in harmony with the political sentiment at different times of the different parties who seemed to entertain opposite opinions in regard to State rights and constitutional construction, yet that decision has never been questioned. But as well and firmly as these old authorities seem to settle the question, I desire to still further strengthen my position by a few other authorities, some of them of more modern date, and even more pointed and direct in their application.

In his able work on Constitutional Limitations, (page 586,) Judge Cooley, of the supreme court of Michigan, says:

It is not doubted that Congress has the power to go beyond the general regulations of commerce, which it is accustomed to establish, and to descend to the most minute directions if it shall be deemed advisable; and that to whatever extent ground shall be covered by those directions the exercise of State power is excluded. Congress may establish police regulations as well as the State, confining their operation to subjects over which it is given control by the Constitution.

In Gray vs. The Clinton Bridge Company, (see American Law Register, January, 1868,) Mr. Justice Miller, whose ability and character for conservatism on constitutional questions of this kind are unquestioned, in his decision uses the following language:

Navigation, however, is only one of the elements of commerce. It is an element of commerce, because it affords the means of transporting passengers and merchandise, the interchange of which is commerce itself. Any other mode of effecting this would be as much an element of commerce as navigation. When this transportation or interchange of commodities is carried on by land, it is commerce as well as when carried on by water, and the power of Congress to regulate it is as ample in the one case as in the other. The "commerce among the States," spoken of in the Constitution, must, at the time that instrument was adopted, have been mainly of this character, for the steamboat, which has created our great internal commerce on the rivers, was then unknown.

Another means of transportation, equal in importance to the steamboat, has also come into existence since the Constitution was adopted, a means by which merchandise is transported across States and kingdoms in the same vehicle in which it started. The railroad now shares with the steamboat the monopoly of the carrying trade. The one has, with great benefit, been subject to the control of salutary congressional legislation, because it is an instrument of commerce. Is there any reason why the other should not? However this question may be answered in regard to that commerce which is conducted wholly within the limits of a State, and is therefore neither foreign commerce nor commerce among the States, it seems to me that where these roads become parts of great highways of our Union, transporting a commerce which embraces many States, and destined, as some of these roads are, to become the channels through which the nations of Europe and Asia shall interchange their commodities, there can be no reason to doubt that to regulate them is to regulate commerce, both with foreign nations and among the States; and that to refuse to do this is a refusal to discharge one of the most important duties of the Federal Government. As already intimated, the shackles with which the different States fettered commerce in their selfish efforts to benefit themselves at the expense of their confederates was one of the main causes which led to the formation of our present Constitution. The wonderful growth of that commerce, since it has been placed exclusively under the control of the Federal Government, has justified the wisdom of our fathers. But are we to remit the most valuable part of that commerce again to the control of the States, and to the consequent vexations and burdens which the States may impose through whose territories it must be carried on? And must all this be permitted because the carrying is done by a method not thought of when the Constitution was framed?

For myself, I must say I have no doubt of the right of Congress to prescribe all needful and proper regulations for the conduct of this immense traffic over any railroad which has voluntarily become part of one of those lines of interstate communication, or to authorize the creation of such roads when the purposes of interstate transportation of persons and property justify or require it.

In the recent State freight-tax case, (15 Wallace, 232,) in the Supreme Court of the United States, Mr. Justice Strong, in delivering the opinion of the court, says:

Beyond all question, the transportation of freight, or of the subjects of commerce, for the purpose of exchange or sale, is a constituent of commerce itself. This has never been doubted, and probably the transportation of articles of trade from one State to another was the prominent idea in the minds of the framers of the Constitution, when to Congress was committed the power to regulate commerce among the several States. * * * Nor does it make any difference whether this interchange of commodities is by land or by water. In either case, the bringing of the goods from the seller to the buyer is commerce.

Again, in the same case, the court says:

It is not necessary to the present case to go at large into the much-debated question whether the power given to Congress by the Constitution to regulate commerce among the States is exclusive. In the earlier decisions of this court it was said to have been so entirely vested in Congress that no part of it can be exercised by a State. It has, indeed, often been argued, and sometimes intimated by the court, that so far as Congress has not legislated on the subject the States may legislate respecting interstate commerce. Yet, if they can, why may they not add regulations to commerce with foreign nations beyond those made by Congress, if not inconsistent with them? for the power over both foreign and interstate commerce is conferred upon the Federal Legislature by the same words. And certainly it has never yet been decided by this court that the power to regulate interstate, as well as foreign commerce, is not exclusively in Congress.

And again the court says:

The rule has been asserted with great clearness, that whenever the subjects over which a power to regulate commerce is asserted are in their nature national, or admit of one uniform system or plan of regulation, they may justly be said to be of such a nature as to require exclusive legislation by Congress. Surely transportation of passengers or merchandise through a State, or from one State to another, is of this nature.

Now, in the face of these standard elementary authorities, and these clear and pointed decisions of the highest judicial tribunal of this country—the court of last resort—will it be seriously urged, or can it be maintained as a legal proposition before the American people, that Congress has not the constitutional power to legislate as this bill provides? In the language of Mr. Justice Miller, supra, "for my part I must say that I have no doubt of the right of Congress to prescribe all needful rules and proper regulations for the conduct of this immense traffic over any railroad that has voluntarily become part of those interstate communications."

I hear it admitted by some persons, as my friend from Illinois, [Mr. EDEN,] in his speech a few days ago, that Congress has some kind of a general, undefined power over interstate commerce; but they deny that Congress has any power to fix the rates and fares that may be charged by the carriers who are engaged in the business of carrying over these public highways. To this I answer:

First. This bill, in fact, does not attempt to fix any rates; it only establishes a rule of evidence, by providing for a schedule of rates, which shall be prima facie evidence of what is reasonable compensation.

But, secondly, I claim that the power does exist to fix the rates and fares to be charged by such carriers of interstate commerce, because the admission that Congress has any power over the subject at all is, under the decisions of our highest courts, an admission that Congress has plenary power, that is, full, ample, and complete power over the whole subject. There is no limitation of the power. As was said by Chief Justice Marshall in Gibbons vs. Ogden, already quoted, the power is "one of enumeration, and not of definition." And Judge Cooley says Congress may "descend to the most minute directions, if it shall be deemed advisable." But if possible still more pointed is the statement of Judge Redfield, in the January number of the American Law Register, in which he says:

We are not aware that any fair question can be raised in regard to the right of Congress to control the fares and freights upon interstate railways. No such question has ever been raised in England in regard to the power of Parliament, and we do not comprehend how one could be raised in any country, unless there were some constitutional restriction upon the sovereign power.

There is no constitutional restriction upon the sovereign power of Congress over the subject of commerce among the several States; but, on the contrary, the same section 8 of article 1 of the Constitution which provides that Congress shall have power "to regulate commerce among the several States," also provides in the last clause thereof that Congress shall have power—

To make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any Department or officer thereof.

One of these "foregoing powers" is this identical power "to regulate commerce among the several States." Instead, therefore, of there being "a constitutional restriction upon the sovereign power," there is, in fact, a constitutional extension of the general power "to regulate." This certainly makes the power as plenary as human language can make it.

But I have another important authority upon the same point. Judge Dillon, of the United States district court, one of the very ablest jurists in this country, in his note to the decision in the Clinton Bridge case, (see American Law Register, volume 16, page 154,) says:

The necessity for some common, central legislative power [over railways] has been most seriously felt. Many of the evils to be remedied, growing out of the rivalries and the selfishness of these corporations, have proved to be beyond any effective State control. We rejoice to hear so careful and so able a jurist as Mr. Justice Miller, of the Supreme Court of the United States, declare that he has no doubt of the right of Congress to prescribe all needful and proper regulations for the conduct of the traffic carried on over any railroad which voluntarily becomes part of a line of interstate communication, and to authorize the creation of such roads when the purposes of interstate transportation justify or require it.

In still further support of the extent and the exclusiveness of the power of Congress over the subject, I call especial attention to the following decisions:

Chief Justice Taney, in Holmes vs. Jennison et al., (14 Peters, 570,) holds as follows:

All the powers which relate to foreign intercourse are confined to the General Government.

And it must be remembered that the power of Congress over interstate commerce is identically the same; and the Chief Justice adds:

When an authority is granted to the Union, to which a similar authority in the States would be absolutely and totally contradictory and repugnant, there the authority to the Federal Government is necessarily exclusive, and the same power cannot be constitutionally exercised by the States.

Justice Johnson, in Gibbons vs. Ogden, says:

The power to regulate commerce here meant to be granted was the power to regulate commerce which previously existed in the States. The power to regulate commerce is necessarily exclusive.

In Brown vs. The State of Maryland, (12 Peters, 466,) the Supreme Court of the United States uses the following language:

It is not therefore matter of surprise that the grant of commercial power should be as extensive as the mischief, and should comprehend all foreign commerce and all commerce among the States. The question was considered in the case of Gibbons vs. Ogden, in which it was declared to be complete in itself, and to acknowledge no limitations.

In Groves et al. vs. Stoughton, (15 Peters, 511,) Justice Baldwin says:

That the power of Congress to regulate commerce among the several States is exclusive of any influence by the States has been, in my opinion, conclusively settled by the solemn opinions of this court. If these decisions are not to be taken as the established construction of this clause of the Constitution, I know of none that are not open to doubt.

In Houston vs. Moore, (5 Wheaton, 23,) the court say:

We are altogether incapable of comprehending how two distinct wills can, at the same time, be exercised in relation to the same subject, to be effectual, and at the same time compatible with one another.

In Sturgis vs. Crowninshield, (4 Wheaton,) the court say:

Full power to regulate a particular subject implies the whole power, and leaves no residuum, and a grant of the whole to one is incompatible with a grant to another of a part.

Whenever the terms in which a power is granted by the Constitution to Congress, or whenever the nature of the power itself requires that it shall be exclusively exercised by Congress, the subject is as completely taken away from State Legislatures as if they had been forbidden to act upon it.

Justice McLean, in the Passenger cases, (7 Howard,) uses this language:

When the commercial power was under discussion in the convention which formed the Constitution, Mr. Madison observed that "he was more and more convinced that the regulation of commerce was in its nature indivisible, and ought to be wholly under one authority." Mr. Sherman said: "The power of the United States to regulate trade, being supreme, can control interferences of the State regulations, when such interferences happen; so that there is no danger to be apprehended from a concurrent jurisdiction."

A concurrent power excludes the idea of a dependent power. A concurrent power in two distinct sovereignties to regulate the same thing is as inconsistent in principle as it is impracticable in action. It involves a moral and physical impossibility. A joint action is not supposed, and two independent wills cannot do the same thing. The action of one, unless there be an arrangement, must necessarily precede the action of the other; and that which is first, being competent, must establish the rule.

If the powers be equal, as must be the case, both being sovereign, one may undo what the other does, and this must be the result of their action.

But the argument is that a State may regulate commerce until Congress shall act on the same subject; and that the State must then yield to the paramount authority. Is a commercial regulation open to State action because the Federal power has not been exhausted? Shall free goods be taxed by a State because Congress has not taxed them? Shall passengers, admitted by act of Congress without a tax, be taxed by a State? The supposition of such a power in a State is utterly inconsistent with a commercial power, either paramount or exclusive, in Congress. That it is inconsistent with the exclusive power will be admitted; but the exercise of a subordinate commercial power by a State is contended for. When this power is exercised, how can it be known that the identical thing has not been duly considered by Congress? And how can Congress, by any legislation, prevent this interference? A practical enforcement of this system, if system it may be called, would overthrow the Federal commercial power.

Whether I consider the nature and object of the commercial power, the class of powers with which it is placed, the decisions of this court in the case of Gibbons vs. Ogden and reiterated in Brown vs. The State of Maryland, and often reasserted by Mr. Justice Story, who participated in those decisions, I am brought to the conclusion that the power "to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States," by the Constitution, is exclusively vested in Congress.

In the same case the same distinguished jurist says:

No one doubts the power of a State to regulate its internal commerce. All commercial action within the limit of a State, and which does not extend to any other State or foreign country, is exclusively under State regulation. Congress have no more power to control this than a State has to regulate commerce with foreign nations or with the several States.

Another argument in favor of the right of sovereign power, whether that be the State, as in cases of purely State commerce, or the national Government in cases of interstate commerce, to control and regulate the operations of railroad corporations as carriers, arises from the admitted legal doctrine of eminent domain, as claimed and granted in behalf of such corporations.

Eminent domain is the ultimate and high power of the sovereign to take private property for public use. It is based on the doctrine that private right must be subordinated to the public good. It is a right incident to every sovereignty, State and national alike. Under that extraordinary power, asserted in favor of railroad corporations, private property is taken for the road-beds; and taxation, which can only be enforced for public purposes, is asserted, and its legality is sustained by the courts. This may all be correct; but if so, it conclusively establishes the legal proposition that these corporations, though private as to the rights of property, are public as to the use of it, and such use is at all times under the control of wholesome legislation so as to protect the public from extortion, or any other abuses and inequitable practices on the part of such corporations.

It would, indeed, be a monstrous doctrine, if it were true, that these corporations are so far public as to authorize them to invoke in their behalf the extraordinary powers, eminent domain and taxation, and yet they are so private that the sovereign power has no control over them, and that they must be regarded as independent of the people and the Government. Surely the common sense of the nation must repudiate such a doctrine as that; and I hope my friend, the eloquent abstractionist from Kentucky, [Mr. ARTHUR,] will repudiate it also before he is much older. Fortunately, our highest courts have repudiated it. In the case of Olcott vs. The Supervisors, (16 Wallace, 678,) the Supreme Court of the United States, upon this point, say:

That railroads, though constructed by private corporations, and owned by them, are public highways, has been the doctrine of nearly all the courts ever since such conveniences for passage and transportation have had any existence. Very early the question arose whether a State's right of eminent domain could be exercised by a private corporation created for the purpose of constructing a railroad. Clearly it could not, unless taking land for such a purpose, by such an agency, is taking land for public use. The right of eminent domain nowhere justifies taking property for a private use. Yet it is a doctrine universally accepted that a State Legislature may authorize a private corporation to take land for the construction of such a road, making compensation to the owner. What else does this doctrine mean, if not that building a railroad, though it be built by a private corporation, is an act done for a public use? And the reason why the use has always been held a public one is, that such road is a highway, whether made by the Government itself or by the agency of corporate bodies, or even by individuals when they obtain their power to construct it from legislative grant. It would be useless to cite the numerous decisions to this effect which have been made in the State courts. We may, however, refer to two or three, which exhibit fully not only the doctrine itself, but the reasons upon which it rests. Whether the use of a railroad is a public or a private one depends in no measure upon the question who constructed it or who owns it. It has never been considered a matter of any importance that the road was built by the agency of a private corporation. No matter who is the agent, the function performed is that of the State. Though the ownership is private, the use is public. So turnpikes, bridges, ferries, and canals, although made by individuals under public grants, or by companies, are regarded as publici juris. The right to exact tolls or charge freights is granted for a service to the public. The owners may be private companies, but they are compellable to permit the public to use their works in the manner in which such works can be used. That all persons may not put their own cars upon the road, and use their own motive-power, has no bearing upon the question whether the road is a public highway. It bears only upon the mode of use, of which the Legislature is the exclusive judge.

And in the same case the court say:

The railroad can therefore be controlled by the State. Its use can be defined; its tolls and rates for transportation may be limited.

It will be observed that this case maintains the right of a State to regulate the use of a railroad within its own jurisdiction by limiting or fixing the rates of toll for transportation; and that right is predicated upon the right of eminent domain, and the fact that so far as the use of the road—not the use of the franchise, but the use of the road—is for the public, the road is a public highway; and being a public highway, the State has the right to control and regulate its use.

The Dartmouth College case is relied upon by the railroad advocates as an authority in favor of the doctrine that no right of legislative control exists in the case of a corporation, unless such right of control is reserved in the charter; that in the absence of such a reservation all the franchises and chartered rights are in the nature of a contract and are inviolable without the consent of the corporation. To this I answer that that decision has no relation whatever to the incorporation of a company as a common carrier, or for the purpose of interstate commerce. Common carriers are a class of persons who, at common law, have always been under the peculiar regulations of law, materially different from persons of other occupations. Unlike other persons, they are not permitted to make any contract, as to charges for carrying, which they may see proper to make. The law wisely recognizes the fact that the contracting parties are not equal; the carrier has the advantage; and if not specially restrained from using that advantage, the greatest and most intolerable extortions and other oppression would be the result. Hence it is that the common law has always interposed its just control by prohibiting such carriers from contracting or receiving more than reasonable compensation for their services. A contract for any excess above what is reasonable and fair compensation is void. Such carriers are regarded, in some sense, as public officers.

Judge Redfield, in his able work on Carriers and Bailments, section 132, says:

Carriers of goods and passengers, who set themselves before the public as ready to carry for all who apply, become a kind of public officers, and owe to the public a general duty independent of any contract in the particular case.

Such was not the case with the Dartmouth College corporation. It was under no special restraint, and could make any contract in regard to the subject-matter involved in the case that it saw proper to make. There were no common-law or other legal limitations, and no questions of eminent domain, which in any way affected its right to take property exempted from taxation. Hence, that decision may be sound law, (which I am not bound to admit;) but it has no application whatever to the question under discussion.

But it may be contended that a State by granting a charter in such cases, without reserving the power to control and regulate it, by implication surrenders the right. It is possible that such a right in regard to these corporations for public use might be surrendered by an express provision to that effect; but that is doubtful; for such a surrender would, it seems to me, destroy the only foundation upon which the right of eminent domain can rest. But the point I desire to make is this, that the rights of the sovereign—be it State or national—are never lost or surrendered by implication. This is a fixed and settled rule of construction, and is applied in all cases in which the sovereign is a party.

But this is not the material question. It matters not what may be the rights of a State in regard to the railroad corporations and that class of commercial transactions that are confined exclusively to a single State. The State alone may have, and, indeed, I think does have the power to regulate the corporate powers of the railroad company which it has chartered. But the power to regulate the commerce that passes over such company's road is another thing entirely, and in no degree depends upon the charter. The "power to regulate commerce among the several States," and the right of Congress to exercise that power, depend upon the express grant in the Constitution of the United States, and not upon any provision in any State charter. It matters not whether the franchise is owned by a corporation or by private persons, or even by the State. The use of the road for the purposes of interstate commerce, or foreign commerce, or commerce with the Indian tribes, is the condition that gives Congress its jurisdiction; and it matters not what may be the provisions of the charter, or any other provisions made by the State, the power of Congress remains unaffected.

While a State is sovereign within its sphere, it must be remembered that the national Government is equally sovereign within its sphere. And neither has the right to encroach upon the other; and therein consists the true doctrine of State rights. It must always be considered in connection with national rights. Under our system of government the two must exist together. The one is no more sacred than the other.

Suppose the Legislature of Massachusetts, or any other sea-board State, should grant a charter to a steamship company to carry freight and passengers between a port in the State and some foreign port—and there doubtless are many such charters granted by State authority; and suppose that in such charter it should be provided that the company shall have certain powers or privileges clearly inconsistent with the laws of Congress which have been made "to regulate commerce with foreign nations." Will it be said that such a charter would limit, in any degree, the power of Congress over the subject, or in any degree nullify or affect the act of Congress? Was not a similar question settled in the nullification controversy in 1833, so effectually settled against the doctrine of nullification that its most ardent adherents abandoned it nearly forty years ago? Yet that exploded doctrine is practically contended for by those who claim that a State, by granting a charter to a common carrier, under which "commerce among the several States" is carried on, ousts Congress of all power to regulate such interstate commerce. I am satisfied not very many men can be driven to such an absurdity in order to sustain a false theory of governmental power, based upon a misconception and misapplication of those wise old Jeffersonian doctrines of "State rights" and "a strict construction of the Constitution."

To hear the opponents of this bill talk about the Federal Government, one would naturally conclude that they were wholly unacquainted with the causes and necessities that produced it. Our fathers were as ardently attached to the State governments as any modern State-rights man can be. But, fortunately, unlike the opponents of this bill, they were controlled by more than that one idea; they felt the necessity for a power to administer those subjects of legislation which were of such a general character that the States either could not at all or could not efficiently administer them. This subject of commerce among the several States was not then as important as it is now; yet it was even then considered so important as to be provided for in the Federal Constitution. It was provided that the whole subject, because it concerned more States than one, should be delegated or given up to the General Government. And now to exercise the power thus intrusted to the Federal Government is not only a right but a duty; as much so as it is the right and the duty of a State to attend to its local internal affairs.

Why, sir, did it ever occur to these gentlemen who oppose this bill that both of our governments, national and State, are essential parts of our system; and that each alike rests upon the same bottom rock, "we, the people," for its foundation? It is well enough to have a due amount of watchfulness and jealousy for the rights of our State governments, and to support them in all their vigor. When there is any real danger in that direction, as there often has been of late years, I shall willingly resist the invaders and do all I can to assist in their overthrow; but, sir, every act that the General Government does is not an invasion of State rights. A blind devotion to abstractions must not permit us to overlook the great want of this progressive age. We must be practical as well as watchful. And I can say to all, individuals and parties, that unless you do show yourselves practical, as living men in a live age, you will, and ought to be, "snowed under." Do gentlemen not know that abstractions in statesmanship and political economy, as well as all other matters that concern our welfare, must and will be displaced by the practical living ideas that mold public opinion and crystallize it in the legislation and the general policy of the country? Political leaders who cannot understand these things ought to, and will be compelled to, take a back seat.

Do you not know, sir, that this nation is now in the throes of a revolution on the great labor question, and in the great contest to curb the power of monopolies? It may take years to settle these questions. Party conventions must meet, and they must take action upon them, and woe be to that party that shall fail to take the side of the people against this and all other moneyed oligarchies. Certainly these monopolies will make a stand. Four or five thousand million dollars, now invested in the railroads of the United States, will not lack for newspapers and orators, here and elsewhere, to wage their side of the contest. Let not the friends of this bill or of the policy which it seeks to institute anticipate an easy victory. Capital, in any of its varied forms, never did surrender without a struggle; and we must not expect that it will do so now. No, sir; we must expect, and I do expect, to see the principles of this bill, and all other bills on the same subject, fought vigorously here, and it may be defeated. But it will go before the people. Whether this bill is passed, or whether it is defeated, the principal feature of it—the power of Congress over the subject—will continue to be agitated before the people. Parties will be compelled to take sides upon it; but if the people are true to themselves I have no fears for the result. But it is a contest that must be waged in earnest and with vigor on the part of the people if they would be victorious.

In conclusion I will say, as to the bill itself in its various details, and in its scope and intended operations, I do not intend to take up much time. Like all other new propositions it is only an experiment, and can be perfected alone by practical experience—by a trial. In fact, I do not expect that any legislation on the subject, any more than legislation on other subjects, will remove all the evils that exist. I am not so utopian in my expectations as to look for any such a result from any legislation on any subject. But, sir, I do expect that the passage of this bill will accomplish one great and good result. It will at least teach these great railroad corporations that they have a master; that they are not wholly irresponsible to both Government and people. Such a lesson will, of itself, do much good. Irresponsibility furnishes the opportunity and the encouragement for evil-doing. When these great corporations shall learn certainly that they can be and will be restrained and controlled, I am satisfied that such fact alone will have a moralizing effect upon their conduct. At all events, the enactment of this bill as a law will be a beginning in the right direction. It will form a basis upon which future legislation can be enacted that will be more beneficial than the warmest friends of this particular bill can reasonably hope for. And in this regard, without discussing the details of this bill, I think it is about as free from objections, as to matters of detail, as we have a right to expect possible in view of the novelty of the subject. I am satisfied that every member who would be willing to support any bill on the subject, involving the same general principle, can afford to vote for this one. At least I shall do so, in the confident hope that it will tend to promote the general welfare of the whole country.

Mr. DONNAN. Mr. Speaker, I agree with many of the positions which have been taken by the advocates of this bill. I support its general features, doubting, at the same time, whether it can accomplish all that is claimed for it. In the remarks which I shall now submit I do not propose to deal with the specific provisions of this bill, but rather to address myself to what I deem to be its ulterior objects, the securement of cheaper transportation, and a better prosperity consequent thereon, for the people of the country.

No nation can continuously permanently prosper, which permits any one or more of its large industries to languish. So closely interwoven are its varied material interests, so largely do the welfare and advancement of all depend upon the prosperity of each, that in the body-politic, as in the human organization, one member does not suffer without causing pain to be experienced throughout the entire system. Accordingly observation and history very well establish the fact, that wherever the energies of a people have been permitted, with the freest scope, to push forward in profitable employment, there has general prosperity most prevailed and national wealth most rapidly aggregated.

Legislation cannot create wealth, but it can greatly obstruct or broadly widen the avenues which lead thereto. Careless inattention to the circumstances and necessities of the time, which are always variable in a rapidly developing country; culpable negligence to properly provide facilities for the successful prosecution of any of the industries, when the necessity therefor is known and recognized, soon dissatisfy and dishearten the class of citizens pursuing such avocation which thereby has ceased to be profitable. If such obstruction be of long duration, loss of production, deleterious effect upon other industries, and irreparable injury to individual and to national prosperity ensue. When, however, the legislative power observes the requirements of the present and the inevitable necessities of the future, and by prudent enactment removes, if possible, every obstruction which bars the profitable employment of mind and muscle, enabling all branches of industry to move forward in united and general advancement, then the conditions-precedent to prosperity and progress are met, and their attainment is assured.

PROGRESS IN THE PAST.

If you turn back and view all these nearly ten decades of our national existence, you will find, indeed, here and there brief periods during which there has been a lack of successful prosecution of one or other of the great national industries. But, fortunately, such period has never been protracted. Either the party to whose political action such prostration of business was justly attributable has been replaced, or the policy so changed as to restore comparatively equal opportunity for the great mass of citizens to engage in profitable pursuits. The result has been an unparalleled development of the resources of the country. Some of that generation are yet alive who in boyhood could reach the uncultivated and unoccupied West without going beyond the limits of the Empire State; while the valley and plain of the Mississippi and the gold-ribbed mountains beyond were almost a limitless unknown. In so brief a period as has since intervened our hundreds of thousands have become tens of millions; the vast territory from ocean to ocean is being rapidly changed from a wilderness to fruitful fields; the north and south frontier line, although upwards of fifteen hundred miles in length, has, for a considerable term of years last past, been pushed westward sixteen miles every year by the resistless tide of empire, thus adding to the new settlements annually an area exceeding in extent three such States as Massachusetts. Over all this grand expanse of domain, old and growing and new, the groundwork of intelligence and culture, the elements of commercial and Christian civilization, are well founded, giving promise of a grander future than ever anticipated by the most sanguine in the past.

THE BAR TO PRESENT AND FUTURE PROSPERITY.

But, sir, under this grand progress we have been making, the center, especially, of our vast agricultural production, has been carried farther and farther westward, until it is now a thousand miles or more distant from the sea-board. The amount of the annual product beyond what is or can be consumed by the home market has increased until its aggregate is now counted by thousands of millions of bushels; and yet this is but a tithe of what the States west of Lake Erie can and will produce when under full cultivation. With a soil unsurpassed in fertility, easy of cultivation, and yielding annually immense harvests, the West ought to be to-day the most prosperous section of the country. It is not. Do you ask why? The answer is found in a single sentence. The Government has failed to furnish the proper and necessary facilities of transporting the rich products of their flocks and fields to a remunerative market.

It is said that the entire annual harvest of wheat in the State of Massachusetts is barely sufficient to feed her population from one breakfast to another; and yet when the people of that State are paying seventy-five cents per bushel for Iowa corn, its producer realizes less than twenty cents per bushel, the whole margin being swallowed up in transportation between the two States.

Do you wonder that a comprehension of the present situation and the inevitable certainty that the difficulty must continue to grow worse, if possible, in the future, as the volume of production increases, causes among all classes of our people a remedy, an adequate remedy, to be the all-absorbing topic of discussion?

It is claimed, and may well be claimed, that the prosperity of not only the Western States but that of the country generally, is largely dependent upon a profitable disposition of the mineral and agricultural products which now form and must continue to form so large a part of our real and substantial wealth, and the successful exportation of which will maintain for the people of this country an equilibrium of trade relations with the people of the world.

THE RAILROAD SYSTEM.

Where shall we find a remedy adequate to our necessities? Can we longer hope for it in the present or any possible railway system of carriage? I am not of the number who join in the present general denunciation of all railroads, and of the generous legislation by which they have been extended, in all directions, until their numerous freight and passenger trains are now drawn an aggregate distance of upward of seventy thousand miles. Ten or fifteen years ago any man who then could have the hardihood to oppose liberal aid for the extension of these lines for travel and traffic in Iowa, would have been denounced as an enemy to his community and to the State. I cannot forget that to them, perhaps more largely than to any other one agency, is due the magnificent development which my own and many surrounding States have made in the recent past. I cannot forget the absolutely helpless condition we would be in to-day, as to present and future progress, did no such system exist. The railroad system has been, is, and will continue to be, an agency, a powerful agency, of civilization and commerce. It is nevertheless exactly true, that as a freight line, it has largely failed to accomplish what was justly expected of it.

The railroad will always prove an inestimable benefit in furnishing a sure and rapid means of travel, and unequaled facilities for the transportation of express and postal matter and the lighter and more perishable articles of commerce. But for the heavier, bulkier, products of the farm, in case they must be freighted a long distance, the railroad has failed to furnish a reasonably cheap means of transportation; and now that such products have so enormously grown in quantity, the facilities offered by this means have become wholly inadequate. This incapacity arises through no fault of the railroad corporations; for they have shown most commendable enterprise in doubling their tracks and in building new parallel lines, so as if possible to meet the ever-increasing business arising from the astounding development and fertility of the West.

But the people complain and believe that there has been no effort whatever to furnish a reasonably cheap transportation by these corporations. Like all others organized for pecuniary profit, there is a continual tendency to take advantage of existing circumstances. It is estimated that we have now nearly fifty million tons of surplus products annually to be carried to the sea-board from the Mississippi Valley. The seemingly trifling excess of one cent per hundred pounds on freight charge amounts, on such an aggregate yearly shipment, to $12,000,000.

The Merchants' Exchange of Saint Louis, in their report to the Senate Committee on Transportation, say:

> There were shipped to the eastern sea-boards during last year wheat and flour to the amount of one hundred and forty million bushels, at an excess of freight of twenty cents per bushel, causing a loss to the producer, West, and to the consumer, East, equal to $28,000,000—

A sum in one year largely more than sufficient to complete a continuous water-route of large capacity from the Mississippi River, by way of the great lakes, to the Atlantic Ocean; a sum five times in excess of the interest which would annually accrue upon the necessary appropriations for the construction of the most extensive system of water-communication which I have heard proposed by the most enthusiastic advocate of such an independent means of transportation.

If competition has been relied upon, as indeed it has been, to reduce freights to the lowest possible sum, it is only to discover that combination of interests has taken its place, and to such an extent as to constitute absolutely a monopoly of the carrying trade; to discover that less than half a dozen railroad presidents are able at will to levy a tax upon the industries of a vast empire in the Mississippi Valley greatly exceeding in amount aught those people have ever been called upon to pay to the General Government, even in its extremest need; an exacting, burdensome tax, from which, through wise and prudent assistance of the General Government, there ought to be an early escape, a complete relief.

CONGRESSIONAL RESTRICTION.

There has been, and there still is, an urgent appeal that Congress shall exercise its fullest constitutional authority over these corporations, and put a stop to unjust discriminations and exorbitant tariffs, so as, if possible, to secure a more uniform rate and a cheaper transportation.

The bill now under consideration looks to the adoption and enforcement, under suitable penalties, of rules and regulations concerning commerce among the several States, as carried on by railroads for the taking of no more than fair and reasonable freights or compensation. This I believe to be within the rightful authority of Congress—a step in the right direction.

Without stopping to discuss specifically the provisions of the bill, which have been ably and fully discussed by a number of others, I shall here and now say that I shall support the general features of this bill. In case a system of water-transportation shall be inaugurated, an anti-discriminating freight law will be of material value in enabling localities a short distance from the water-routes to reach and transship their products, while, without it, discrimination by the railroads might render the water-line nearly valueless to such communities. But I question whether any fair pro rata freight law would not prove a detriment to those shipping a long distance by depriving them of the large reduction now conceded to through freights.

Besides, when you stop to compute the magnitude of the investments which have been made for construction, for depots, for rolling-stock, for repairs, and for operating expenses, I doubt—nay, it seems to me a certainty—that any reasonable use for the capital invested will prevent the attainment of any such reduction as the necessities of the country so urgently demand.

FREIGHT RAILROAD.

It has also been advised as a relief measure to construct a new double-track freight line of railway between the city of New York and some point on the Missouri River. This could only be done at the enormous cost of over $175,000,000; and with that sum invested in its construction its rate of carriage must inevitably be above that minimum which is the great object in search of which the people of the West are now engaged.

Besides, if chartered and constructed by private capital, how long would it be before existing companies would secure a majority of the stock, and so control it in conjunction with the present combinations? If you say it will be held subject to regulation as to charges for freight by Congress, that can only amount to the very same power which you now propose to exert over those lines already built. If it be proposed to construct, equip, and operate such a line wholly at Government expense, and by Federal officials and employés, then I submit that experience teaches the inability of Government to construct any such gigantic work as economically, or to operate it when constructed so cheaply, through its agents, as it may otherwise be done; and we shall have a fruitful source of contention, if not of corruption, for all time to come.

While, therefore, I cannot doubt that it would necessarily add greatly to the burden of taxation, I do most seriously question whether, if built, it would be of value commensurate with its cost, and whether it would or could accommodate the wants and relieve the necessities of the inland commerce of the country.

WATER TRANSPORTATION.

The requisite means for the interchange of commercial commodities which our present exigencies require, and which the future will still more require, must afford a large increase of capacity, accompanied by a large decrease of cost. To my mind, it is quite evident we shall not obtain both these results by rail or by any other known method of freightage by land.

But, sir, we can find both combined in water transportation. The natural water-channels of the country, when properly improved, will furnish highways for commerce, with a capacity almost unlimited. Belonging to the nation, there can be no exclusive privileges, for all desirous of so doing may engage in the carrying trade. Necessary as some limitation tariff law in regard to railroads may be, requiring commissions to examine and report upon, and penalties and forfeitures to enforce it, the water highway will protect from adverse combinations, and will execute its own restrictions as to freightage by the broadest possible competition.

IMPROVEMENT OF FOX AND WISCONSIN RIVERS.

Before proceeding further upon the general question let me here call the attention of the House particularly to the continuous water communication between the Mississippi River and the Atlantic Ocean by way of the great lakes. I desire to do this especially for two reasons: first, because my own section of the country is directly interested in its early completion; and, secondly, because, although the great advantage to be gained has been recognized by the General Government, and the improvement of that portion of the route between the Mississippi River and Lake Michigan has been energetically commenced, yet, so great has been the pressure for a decrease of expenditures, that it is now proposed to appropriate only $350,000 of the $750,000 which the officer in charge reports as the amount required for the proper prosecution of that work for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875.

Six years ago General Warren took occasion to say in his report that if this water-communication were made as good as it was susceptible of being made, that at least one-half the surplus product of wheat raised in the group of States tributary to this line would be shipped over it in preference to any other; and he adds:

> We believe it safe to say that a good line of water-transportation from the Mississippi to Green Bay can be built so as to profitably transport wheat at one-half cent per ton per mile. The line would be two hundred and eighty miles long, and this would make the cost $1.40 per ton. This, in the present wheat crop, would save, over what the railroads charge, $3.60 per ton, making a saving of $3,780,000. It must be kept in view that we have supposed one-half the crop to go by railroad and down the Mississippi below the Rapids, and we have not taken into account the benefits of the trade from Lake Michigan to the Mississippi, which will be quite as great an addition.

Thus was a loss approximating $4,000,000 sustained by our people in 1868, and each year since then, for want of the completion of these improvements, and that on account of shipments of the surplus wheat products alone eastward. Now, consider the ever-augmenting crops of wheat and other farm products which, since then, would have been thus transported with a comparative saving on freights returning westward from the lakes into the Mississippi Valley. The aggregate annually amounts to a larger sum than the entire estimated cost of improvement of these rivers. Remember that Iowa is paying to-day 16.2 cents per bushel for carrying her cereals from her eastern border to the lakes, and you will not be surprised that although she has three times previously memorialized Congress on this subject, the Legislature of Iowa, now in session, sends the following memorial and resolutions:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

The memorial of the General Assembly of the State of Iowa represents that the annual report of D. C. Houston, of the United States Engineers, on the Fox and Wisconsin Rivers improvement, shows that the project of rendering navigable the channels of the Fox and Wisconsin Rivers is entirely feasible at a moderate expense; and

Whereas the General Government has already entered upon said work, and as said improvement is of great national importance: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the General Assembly of the State of Iowa, That our members of Congress be requested to urge the appropriation of a sufficient sum of money to carry this great enterprise to a successful completion: Provided, That the regulation and control of the entire route from the Mississippi River to the lakes may be retained in the General Government, and shall not pass under the control of any private corporation or company, to the end that the transportation of the products of the country may be subjected only to such tolls as may be necessary to maintain said improvement in perfect condition and repair for public use.

Resolved, That the secretary of state is directed to forward a copy of this preamble and joint resolution to the President of the United States Senate and to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, with a request that they may be laid before each House of Congress, and that a copy be sent to each Senator and member of Congress from this State.

JNO. H. GEAR,
Speaker of the House.
JOSEPH DYSART,
President of the Senate.

Approved February 2, 1874.

C. C. CARPENTER.

I am just in receipt of numerous petitions, signed by upward of two thousand citizens of my own district alone, and am notified that many other petitions of like nature are on their way here, setting forth briefly the advantages to be derived and urging the early completion of this improvement. I heartily join in their request, and give such voice as I am able, to their petitions, at this earliest possible opportunity.

And yet, I doubt not, when the House is asked to appropriate the full estimate of the engineers in charge, we shall hear that much-abused cry of economy raised against it. In his last report, page 224, the Chief of Engineers says regarding this work:

There is no public work more national in its character than this. By it, the products of the Northwest will find cheap transportation to the sea-board, and the lumber and iron of the North, to the Mississippi Valley. One of the great problems of the day is to secure cheap transportation for these indispensable and bulky commodities, and while no one route will meet the demands of the country, there is no other route which will meet the necessities of so large a section of the United States at so small an expense as this.

To cut down the appropriations for the rapid completion of a work of this magnitude, importance, and necessity, because of present financial circumstances, while a vast and ever-augmenting loss is suffered in consequence, has no more the elements of real economy, or of common prudence, than it would be for a farmer heavily involved, to attempt to save up the amount of accruing interest from the necessary food for his teams, by the faithful service of which he must till the soil, cultivate the crop, and reap and market his harvest—upon which he must really depend to meet both the interest and principal of his debt. On the contrary, the largest appropriation which can be advantageously expended upon this route during the next fiscal year, looking to its early completion, is at once economy and duty. It never was, and it never will be, economical, to save a few hundreds of thousands at an annual loss of several million dollars. In view, therefore, of the great benefits which will accrue to a large section of the country, I earnestly hope and urge that Congress will not delay this work by small appropriations, but push it vigorously, so that its benefits may be secured at the earliest day practicable.

NIAGARA FALLS OBSTRUCTION.

There remains, however, another obstruction to a continuous east and west water-line to the sea-board at Niagara Falls. Twice heretofore the House of Representatives have passed a bill incorporating a company, and loaning the credit of the Government to the extent of $6,000,000, for the construction of a canal around this barrier to western commerce. In the last Congress I introduced a bill providing for such a canal, to be constructed by the General Government under the direction of the War Department. It was considered by the Committee on Commerce, who, in reporting it again to the House, among other things, said:

The question involved in the provisions of this bill is one of very great importance. It is no less than whether we, as a whole nation and people, shall continue to expand and increase in population, prosperity, and wealth, or whether, by a parsimonious policy, we shall hamper, cripple, and blight one of the most important industries of the whole country; indeed, the one upon which all others are dependent, to wit, the agricultural interest. It needs no argument to prove that upon the development and prosperity of this industry depend the prosperity and development of all others.

The committee's report goes on to show the aggregate product of the States clustering around the lakes, and estimates the value of their aggregate production (provided remunerative markets are secured) in the year 1880 at $1,744,482,677. The report also calls attention to the manifest advantages which would accrue to the various agricultural, manufacturing, and commercial interests.

As a part of some remarks which I took occasion to make when this report was presented to the House, I gave comparative tables of distances and cost per mile, showing by the one that the cost per bushel by the present route from the Mississippi to Liverpool, at the lowest rates heretofore charged, amounted to 51.6 cents, and by the other, the completed water-route, the same bushel could be transported to the same market for 30.4 cents; thus demonstrating the enormous saving which it was believed could be thus secured. I then said:

From these tables it appears that with the facilities asked for, the shipper at Dubuque, Iowa, on the western bank of the Mississippi River, can make a saving upon a ton of freight shipped to the foreign market of Liverpool amounting to the sum of $6.93, or a saving of twenty and one-fifth cents upon each bushel of wheat. Does any one say this is theory, and that the results of practice seldom approximate closely to the standard of theory? Then I ask him to discount it, if he will; to reduce it 100 per cent. if he deems it just; but to make the calculation for himself, and he will find that even when so reduced the saving upon the entire wheat crop of the States west of Erie and north of the Ohio River for last year alone would amount to the enormous sum of $20,000,000, more than sufficient to complete the great improvement provided for in this bill. Then I ask him to make a fair calculation of the entire saving upon all the commodities transported between the West and the eastern and foreign markets for a single year; and then to agree with me that this work ought not be longer delayed.

Our States at the West invite largely to agriculture. Their leading source of wealth lies in the abundant products of the soil. But the employment of the farmer has become far less remunerative than that of almost any other. We hear much in these Halls and elsewhere of taxation bearing heavily upon the people; and it is, and must for some time to come continue a burden. But it is as a feather compared with the tax which takes more than a moiety in the way of freight, which must be deducted from the market price of his product, and thus reduces the amount he receives, until his yearly toil and magnificent harvest recede into a profitless pursuit. Change this, as you can do, by giving him greatly reduced freights and thus enable him to save the greater portion of the market value of his crops; give him some profit for his summer's labor, and he will not only meet his legitimate taxes without a murmur, but he will bless the Government which shows a proper fostering care of the nation's great primary industry.

A year's delay has intervened only to confirm one's conviction that each succeeding year renders the necessity more imperative for the breaking down of this barrier to a vast and annually augmenting commercial business. When we assembled here in December last, owing to the financial condition of the Treasury and of the country, friends of this measure advising, by their request I introduced and had referred to the Committee on Railways and Canals a bill (H. R. No. 188) providing for the incorporation of a construction company, authorizing it to enter into a contract with the Secretary of War, with the approval of the President, for the early completion of this proposed canal.

I do not stop to discuss the provisions of that bill, because if the Government is too much embarrassed financially to undertake this work, is it not, at the very least, its duty to permit and liberally encourage her citizens to invest private capital therein if they are willing so to do? In my opinion, however, this work is of such national character that the Government should itsel fconstruct it for the public good. Besides, when completed, it ought to be open for the thirty-four hundred vessels which float upon the bosom of the chain of northern lakes, not at a toll, which would pay interest upon the capital invested and the cost besides, but at the lowest charge which might be necessary to keep the canal in good repair. I shall therefore favor such amendment of the bill.

Some one asks, why not use and depend upon the Canadian Welland Canal? Without stopping to consider the feasibility or probability of its enlargement to such capacity as to render transshipment unnecessary, I deem it quite sufficient to say that we should never depend upon a great highway of American commerce passing through territory foreign to the United States, and hence liable to exactions, either through selfish interests or inimical feeling, which might render it useless in time of peace and dangerous in time of war. If any one supposes that under the recent treaty the use of the Canadian canals is guaranteed to our people, he will be corrected by the following statement, made by Mr. White, of Montreal, at Chicago, in October last, before the National Board of Trade:

But, Mr. President, what I want to point out at this moment is this, that these water communications, when improved, are the communications of the Dominion of Canada, and under the control of the Dominion of Canada, subject to no treaty stipulations as to their use; subject entirely to the legislation, which, from time to time, the government of Canada may think it necessary to adopt. That is, to my mind, the consideration which belongs to this board to consider. And although the past policy of the people of Canada may lead them to believe that there will always be a liberal policy on the part of Canada in relation to the trade and commerce of this great continent, at the same time we must not overlook the fact that the people of Canada are like the people of the United States; that they are disposed to look after their own interests, and that if, in the future, they should see in this magnificent system of intercommunication the means of enforcing legislation on the part of the American people, which they considered to be to their advantage, it would hardly be considered, especially by our American friends, I should say, extraordinary if they should adopt that principle. I am aware that there is a feeling prevalent here, that by the Washington treaty the use of the canals has been guaranteed to the United States. The use of the canals has never been guaranteed to the United States by any treaty stipulation up to this time. What has been guaranteed to the United States is the free navigation of the Saint Lawrence.

Let, therefore, our commercial lines be within our own borders, especially when it is both possible and feasible. Let the teeming products of the interior, by cheap and uninterrupted water-communication, out upon Lake Ontario, and we shall be able to avoid the extortionate charges on transshipment at Buffalo, for that city sits like a toll-gatherer at the gateway of our present commercial thoroughfare, and her tax upon our prosperity is greater, comparatively, than that of the railroads and of the Erie Canal. Let us cheaply out upon Ontario, and we shall then reach competing routes for Baltimore and Philadelphia,

New York, Boston, and Portland, one of which is now insisting that it will soon be able to deliver our wheat from this lake in Boston for less than four cents per bushel. Let us reach Ontario and we reach an open water-route to the ocean, via the Saint Lawrence, upon which, under the Washington treaty, we may float our commerce to and from the ocean without let or hinderance from the Canadian or British government.

Statistics show conclusively that the Eastern States, year by year, are growing less of breadstuffs and are becoming thus more dependent upon the grain-producing Western States for food supplies; while we of the West not only are annually greatly enlarging such products, but are large consumers of eastern manufactured products. A greatly reduced freight between the sections will inure to the mutual advantage of both, advancing their prosperity and adding enormously to their accumulations of wealth. It is believed that during the year 1873 not less than three hundred and fifty million bushels of grain from the Western States have been carried to the Atlantic seaboard at an average cost of fifty cents per bushel. The present cost, therefore, of moving a single surplus crop of grain from the Mississippi Valley is $175,000,000. With a thoroughly improved continuous waterline, not subject to State tolls, at least one-half of this enormous sum can be yearly divided between producer West and consumer East.

NO ONE LINE SUFFICIENT.

Let me not be understood, however, as presuming that any one line of water-transportation can render all the relief required for the multiplied products and industries of the different sections of the country. The more eastern cotton-growing States want supplies from the bursting granaries of the Northwest, and we want to supply that market.

B. W. Frobel, of Georgia, says to the Senate Transportation Committee:

A single railroad brings annually to Atlanta, and other stations along its line, western products valued at more than $40,000,000.

Yet so expensive is the transportation that he also states the price of corn in those States last year to have been upward of ninety cents per bushel, when it was worth but ten or fifteen cents in Iowa and Missouri. Surely no length of argument could more effectually show the mutual and great advantage to be derived by a comparatively inexpensive canal system which would reduce this cost of exchange to a fraction of the present expense. Were this evil properly remedied, the six million acres which, in four of these States of the cotton belt, distant from the Mississippi River, are now planted in food crops, employing one-half their capital and labor in the cultivation of grain, being able to buy their bread from the Northwest cheaper than raise it, would again be largely devoted to growing cotton, the best exporting crop which the country can produce; while at the same time they would furnish an accessible market for tens of millions of bushels of our grain, which under existing circumstances is sometimes marketless and all but worthless on our hands.

THE MISSISSIPPI.

But, sir, who in earnest search for cheap water transit, as an independent means of conveyance, can overlook that channel, along which flows a grand current almost from the extreme north line of our territory to the Gulf of Mexico? Unlike the proposed great freight railroad, its right of way and road-bed require no expense, for they already belong to the country; no hundreds of millions of dollars to construct its track, for a beneficent Providence has furnished one which breaks not down and wears not out, free to all competition, and broad enough to accommodate the weightiest inland commerce of the world. Yet, for lack of improvements comparatively trifling in expense, we fail to realize even 10 per cent. of its real value as a commercial channel. Its upper waters, including the long arms bearing eastward toward the lakes or westward to the mountains, are left in a few places seriously obstructed for navigation, and, at its confluence with the Gulf, bars of sand and mud have been permitted to form and remain such a barrier that during the last year thirty ships at one time have been seen lying in the mouth of the river, laden with cargoes valued at upward of $8,000,000, struggling, some so long as thirty days, to effect an entrance or an exit, and subjected besides to an exorbitant tax for towage assistance. Under such condition of things our immense products are compelled to seek other and more expensive outlets to foreign markets, and ocean commerce is virtually excluded from the Mississippi Valley.

Aside from "the Union first, last, and always," no other sentiment so strengthened the purpose and nerved the arm of the hardy sons of the Northwest against the late attempt to disrupt the nation as the determination that no foreign power should be able to tax our commerce at the mouth of the Mississippi, or to obstruct or prevent our use of this open highway to the sea. Her treasure flowed freely, her bravest men bled, and her best men fell in this behalf. Preserved, as it happily is, for the use of an undivided country, it is not strange that the Northwest protests against being in great measure deprived of the practical benefits of this channel of interchange, for want of an inconsiderable expenditure from the general Treasury for its improvement. This river drains nearly a thousand million acres of the most fertile land in the world. Facilitate the advancement of this section of the country in conjunction with the others, and from soil and mine this valley will develop a wealth beyond the expectations of even her own remarkably sanguine people. Open cheap highways for her products, and a few generations hence will find a commerce floating from that valley greater than the entire commerce of the country to-day.

Cognizant of the benefits which would accrue to her citizens, the Legislature of my own State has again memorialized Congress within the last few weeks for the improvement of this great commercial channel.

CHEAPNESS OF INTERCHANGE MOST DESIRABLE.

In a memorial of the American Cheap Transportation Association I notice a statement by the late Commodore Maury, said to be based upon various tests and actual comparison of cost among existing lines of traffic, to the effect that transportation by railroad is 500 per cent. cheaper than by common wagon, and by free canal is 600 per cent. and by river it is 750 per cent. cheaper than by railroad. Probably these estimates quite closely approximate the actual cost as between the different modes of conveyance. If it be true that for the great bulk of our commercial commodities, celerity of transit is of little value, while cheapness of carriage is the great desideratum sought, it seems undeniable that these methods of which I have spoken can and will furnish an adequate remedy for the evil under which we now suffer. Believing it demonstrable to a mathematical certainty that a thorough system of water-transportation will save nearly, if not quite, the round sum of $100,000,000 annually upon the aggregate of our inland commerce now, and a much larger sum in the future, it appears to me the interest and duty of the General Government to provide such a system with the least possible delay.

All classes of our people are either producers or consumers. Every reduction on freight enhances the price of the article for the producer and lessens its cost to the consumer. Hence the entire millions which by this means may be saved will be distributed among the people. The manufacturing States will thus be enabled to compete more successfully with foreign nations in that branch of industry, and will cheapen these articles in turn to the agricultural States, enabling them to buy more largely and to pay for what they purchase. Expensive transportation, like high taxes, oppresses industry and becomes a grievous burden. Cheap interchange fosters industry, begets prosperity, and advances the interests of all.

FOREIGN MARKETS.

But I should stop far short of the legitimate range of this question, if not extended beyond the limits of our own country. Upon its proper solution depends our ability to supply a large demand for breadstuffs in Western Europe. Formerly England raised about four-fifths of the cereals which her population consumed. Her production has relatively decreased until at present she produces less than 40 per cent. of her consumption, with her demand for importations gradually increasing. Her requirements for last year were thus set forth by the London Times in November, 1872:

For ten months, ending the 1st of October, England has imported 130,000,000 bushels of wheat, over and above her own production, to feed her population of England, Scotland, and Ireland; and the probability, nay, certainty, is that for the next two months her importations will amount to 20,000,000 bushels more, making for the year 150,000,000 bushels, and that, too, over and above large importations of rye, barley, oats, and some corn from the States. The probabilities are that for the coming year this amount will be increased about 10 per cent.; in other words, our importations of wheat for the year ending the 1st of January, 1874, will be about 165,000,000 bushels, and more likely to be 10,000,000 bushels more than to fall short 5,000,000.

What nations secure the benefit of this market? Chili, three or four times more distant than ourselves, but on the sea-board, furnishes somewhat to this demand; Russia supplies very largely; while, with our splendid harvests, we have hitherto furnished not more than an average of 5 per cent. of the aggregate carried to this vast market. Why are we thus excluded? Because Russia, with an enterprise and wisdom which commend themselves to us to-day, has so improved her water-channels for transportation that she is able to deliver her wheat in Liverpool from the Baltic at thirty-five cents and from the Black Sea at forty-five cents per bushel. We can furnish a superior article of grain; but owing to our present expensive system of freightage she successfully competes—yes, all but excludes us from the English market. This can and should be changed.

Here is what Barings Brothers, the London bankers and European provision brokers, thought of our opportunities in this direction in 1868. In their circular they say:

The demand of the western European markets for the cereals, as wheat, corn, barley, &c., exceeds 500,000,000 bushels per annum. If the Americans will open up that water-route from the valley of the Mississippi to the Atlantic sea-board, by way of the great lakes and the river Saint Lawrence, and thereby inaugurate cheap transportation thereon, they can and will supply a very large proportion of that demand.

If, therefore, the cost of transporting grain from the fields of the West to Liverpool can be reduced to thirty-five cents per bushel, and I think I have shown that it is possible to reduce it to nearly thirty cents, we shall be able to supply hundreds of millions of bushels of the foreign demand and virtually control that market. The drain of gold from this country to meet the coin interest on the public debt held abroad, and the adverse balance of trade, is well-nigh to $200,000,000 a year. Furnish them the necessary cheap transportation, and our people will seize the golden opportunity, and pay your golden obligations abroad with their golden wheat, and keep the gold of the country at home.

This, in my judgment, will lead naturally, directly, and more speedily to specie payments than all the resolutions and enactments which it is possible for this Congress to pass, agreeing and obligating ourselves to pay gold when we have none to pay.

I look hopefully into the early future for a greatly increased and more advantageous foreign trade southwardly and westwardly through the Gulf of Mexico. An impediment lies in the way at present, in the want of reciprocal trade relations with the Spanish-American states and provinces.

It is true our treaty with Spain runs in the amiable language that the two nations, to "augment their prosperity and opulence, will in future give to their mutual commerce all the extension and favor which the advantage of both countries may require." It is also true, I believe, that our commodities are admitted into Spanish possessions on like terms with those of other nations. Yet, while we admit the products of Cuba untaxed, with the exception of two or three articles, averaging probably not to exceed 25 per cent. on her admitted products, her tax is almost prohibitive against us: as, for instance, eight dollars on a barrel of flour and forty cents per bushel on corn, averaging not less than 80 per cent. on our products. Surely, if a more generous reciprocity of trade can be secured it would promote the "prosperity and opulence" of both nations, and would certainly be of immense advantage to our Southern States and to the Mississippi Valley.

The rate of duties is still more oppressive in Mexico. The aggregate of taxes upon American commodities for that country is stated by our consul at Veru Cruz as amounting to 96 per cent. As a consequence we supply not more than 10 per cent. of the commerce which they receive. Their demand is large for such products as we raise, and it seems quite possible to open the way for a large and lucrative commerce with that country.

And when the interoceanic channel is cut across the Isthmus of Panama, as it will be before the younger members of this House shall see their "three-score and ten," then we shall be in position to reap the full fruition of the commerce of the East and of India, and to see our country become first in commercial power, as she now is first in her latent resources, in her rate of development, and in the unconquerable will of her people.

PUBLIC DEMAND.

No one doubts the emergency that is upon us. From Maine to the base of the Rocky Mountains, from Minnesota to Florida, the people of the country have joined in the cry of distress and the prayer for relief. Men in all stations, from day-laborers and farmers, to the President of the United States, have commended this subject to our present consideration. Public meetings, city councils, boards of trade, commercial conventions, governors of States in official messages, and State Legislatures by memorials, representing an undoubted majority of the citizens of the country, have asked for the improvement of one or all of the channels of water-communication, as least expensive and most certain to afford an adequate remedy.

If the Government will not undertake this system of internal improvements, then at least it ought to encourage private capital to invest itself in this direction. But it will be very generally conceded that such thoroughfares should not be controlled by corporations, authorized, as they inevitably must be if built by private capital, to tax the industries for their use, repairs, and cost.

Does some one say wait? Delay until we shall obtain a plethoric Treasury? Why, sir, we have already delayed too long. The very lack of cheaper transportation has largely caused this halt in our onward march of prosperity. If you leave the producers of wealth to suffer this vast annual loss, and even more in the future than in the past, pray when will you obtain a full Treasury and a flowing tide of prosperity?

ECONOMY AND DUTY.

Economy is always wisdom. But all is not economy which offers that effective plea. I will follow any gentleman upon this floor in behalf of that which gives best evidence of real economy. But, sir, I never have, and never will legislate for a republic like this, from a parsimonious stand-point. In our individual affairs we do not decline to sow one dollar when we know it will produce a harvest of five dollars; and this rule of action is equally good for legislative duty. If the sum of $100,000,000 can be saved annually from excessive cost of transportation, to be distributed among the various classes of industry by a governmental expenditure, the annual interest of which would be largely less than ten millions, every year of further postponement by Congress is anything but economy. It is not even parsimony. It is nothing less than a culpable neglect of public duty.

Suppose the Government could advantageously expend the sum of $50,000,000 upon such a system of navigation improvements during the next fiscal year. Suppose, for that object, it should accept from the people a loan for such sum, and instead of distributing the Treasury notes issued thereon to banks, pay them out exclusively for material furnished and for labor performed upon such improvements, thus placing the money directly in the hands of the more needy and now unemployed laboring men, and so reach the capitalist ultimately, rather than directly. Shall we pass any monetary relief measure which would be more quickly experienced or more keenly appreciated than something of this nature?

The people do not expect relief from the enormous tribute they are now paying without expense, nor do they so much fear that expenditure as they dread the lack of profitable employment. Give them but free scope for their energy, and remunerative pay for their industry, and a single generation of our brothers and sons will cancel the debt, principal and interest, and show you a more prosperous nation than we are at present, or have been during the past.

CONCLUSION.

This question comes to us through no political appeal, and should be considered in no partisan spirit. Yet the dominant party will be held responsible for such legislation as may be enacted, as it will also be held answerable for the neglect or failure to provide some adequate remedy for the existing evil to which I have referred.

The gravest questions which can arise in the history of a nation have come up within the last two decades. The republican party was born of the spirit of reform, and was elevated to power by a resistless sentiment of progress which pervaded the people. It has hitherto shown itself equal to the greatest emergency. Never have reforms equal in magnitude and in effect, never has advancement in all that exalts a nation in the recognition and guarantee of the rights of the citizen, been effected in so brief a time, by any other party, at any period in the history of this or of any other nation, as during its term of control. Nor has this party ever been so invincible with the people as when it has taken its boldest, firmest steps in favor of radical reform and progress.

The nation's life has been saved; the sole blot upon its escutcheon erased; American citizenship vindicated, and those who so recently met to take each others' lives, are now met in amity, working side by side as colaborers in behalf of our whole country's broadest prosperity. But, however brilliant they may have been, no party can stand upon its past achievements alone. It must prove its ability and willingness to consider and determine the issues of the living present, with a steady devotion to the best interests of the people.

I have no right, either through age, experience, or wisdom, to offer suggestions as to what direction should be taken by that party which has received my most willing allegiance since I attained the years of manhood. But, speaking for myself only, it seems to me the republican party cannot afford to rest its present record upon the number of clerks it can discharge, or upon a showing of what sum it may shave off from the usual annual appropriations for the working of this vast machinery of government. The cry of millions in this land to this Congress is, "Prepare the way for a better prosperity!" An evident determination in the halls of legislation to effect this object will reanimate the flagging energies of the industrial classes; and the party which shall inaugurate it will secure the confidence and support of the masses whose material interests are thus subserved.

I close as I began. Open wide the avenues which lead to wealth; give room for enterprise; foster and promote "industry in all shapes, in all instances, and by all means," and older nations may boast as they may of regal splendor, or of renowned and ancient history, but youthful America will lay her hand upon the scepter of the supremacy of the world.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. BABCOCK, one of his secretaries, informing the House that he had approved and signed bills of the following titles:

An act (H. R. No. 1365) to grant an American register to the Canadian schooner George Warren;

An act (H. R. No. 447) extending the time for the completion of the Green Bay and Sturgeon Bay and Lake Michigan Ship-Canal, in the State of Wisconsin;

An act (H. R. No. 2224) making an appropriation to pay the operators of the Government telegraph connecting the Departments with the two Houses of Congress;

An act (H. R. No. 919) to provide for the issuing of commissions to postmasters appointed by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate;

An act (H. R. No. 1402) granting a pension to John A. Fisher; and

An act (H. R. No. 1558) to amend the act entitled "An act to encourage the growth of timber on western prairies."

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate of the United States, by Mr. GORHAM, its Secretary, notifying the House that that body had concurred in the amendment of the House to the bill (S. No. 360) making an appropriation for a topographical survey of the Capitol grounds and plans for improving the same.

It further announced that the Senate had passed, without amendment, bills and joint resolution of the following titles:

An act (H. R. No. 1223) for the relief of L. S. Campbell;

An act (H. R. No. 2228) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to change the name of the propeller William M. Tweed, of Buffalo; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 52) explanatory of a resolution approved January 31, 1868, entitled "A resolution limiting the contracts for stationery and other supplies in the executive Departments to one year."

It also announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

An act (S. No. 176) to encourage the establishment of public marine schools;

An act (S. No. 192) for the relief of Siloma Deck;

An act (S. No. 259) to authorize the proper accounting officers of the Treasury to settle with Henry C. Carey;

An act (S. No. 419) for the relief of Sabastian Reichert; and

An act (S. No. 433) for the relief of Mrs. Susannah A. Shelby.

It further announced that the President had informed the Senate he had approved and signed bills and joint resolutions of the following titles, namely:

An act (H. R. No. 353) for the relief of David Braden;

An act (H. R. No. 365) for the relief of Matthew Woodruff, late first sergeant of Company G, Twenty-first Missouri Volunteers; and

INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

Mr. WOODWORTH. Mr. Speaker, the question before the House gives great latitude to debate. It involves the several propositions before Congress looking to the solution of the vexed problem growing out of the uses and abuses of the carrying trade as now practiced throughout the country. It is my purpose in taking the floor, if I can have the ear of the House, to speak briefly of these several propositions, but mainly of the constitutional power of Congress over the agencies employed in interstate commerce, and of the comparative merits of the bill recommended by your Committee on Railways and Canals and the one introduced by myself early in the session, it being House bill No. 1079.

Sir, in the remarks I may submit I shall not attempt to imitate the example of others who have participated in this debate by speaking of the magnitude and importance of the transportation question. I shall discuss nothing that is not a question here. The marked attention with which the House has listened thus far to this debate—an unusual thing, I have observed, for this very undeliberative body—clearly shows its sense of the importance of the subject, and manifests its disposition to give to it a most thoughtful consideration. This, to me, sir, is a hopeful indication that a result will be reached which will relieve the country of the burden that, like the "Old Man of the Sea," in the fable, is clinging to the shoulders of all our industries with a weight so crushing that it is a thing no longer to be borne.

I judge, by the indications I see about me, that gentlemen fully recognize the fact that, next to the currency question, of which my friend here upon my right [Mr. KELLEY] makes a specialty, and which ought to have been disposed of weeks and months ago, the transportation problem is the important subject of the session.

THE FORCE TO BE CONTROLLED—THE ABUSES TO BE REMEDIED.

In order to solve this problem we must understand the forces to be controlled, and we should know something of the nature and the extent of the abuses demanding a remedy. Primarily, the highways of a country, by whatsoever contrivances they may be operated, belong in common to the people. Our State Legislatures have hitherto pursued the policy of creating artificial persons and endowing them with the sovereign powers of eminent domain, have committed to them the building and management of railways and canals, until now the whole carrying trade is under their control. What was the prerogative of governments has become the privilege of corporations. You will doubtless, sir, recollect that the fathers, in order to prevent the dangerous accumulation of wealth in individual hands, or rather I should say under the control of the few, forbade laws of primogeniture. These corporations have entirely defeated the intent of this wise interdiction. The magic of legislative power has made them immortal. They drank of the elixir of life in the very charters which created them. Clothed with the power of a sovereign, and endowed by the acts of your State Legislatures with perpetual life, they have achieved complete control over the carrying trade, whereby they may levy such tribute and such exactions as they please upon the industry and the emprise of the country. With enormous capital, with immense revenues, with vast armies of men in their employ, with the practical immunity from law which they, in most States of the Union at all events, contrived to enjoy, with the robes of sovereignty wrapped about them, they are a power within the Government superior to the people and fast climbing to superiority over the Government itself. How they are managing to do this is best known to him who is most familiar with "the extra legal service accounts" and "the India-rubber accounts" of some of these corporations.

This, sir, is the force to be controlled. This is the autocracy that must be dethroned if we are to have a solution of the transportation problem, as proposed in the bill now under consideration. These corporations are the railway, the fast freight, the express, and the dispatch companies that control all the railways and nearly all the water-ways of the country. The abuses they practice, if I may presume to classify, seem to be of two sorts: first, such as immediately affect the general public; and, secondly, such as result from the mismanagement or malmanagement of the business in which they are engaged. Of the first class I may principally enumerate extortionate charges, unjust discriminations as between shippers and as between localities; failures to observe the common-law obligations of common carriers, and failures to provide for the safety and convenience of the traveling public. Of the second class the watering of stocks, the payment of enormous salaries to railroad officials, the delegating of the business of a railroad company to another corporation whereby railroad stockholders are defrauded, and the engaging in other business than that of transportation by transportation companies, are the most prominent. I could not, even if I understood them all, as I do not pretend to do, undertake to enumerate the schemes and devices resorted to by railroad kings and fast-freight-line princes to defraud the laymen of railroad corporations, and whereby they contrive to pocket the lion's share of the profits of all the industries of the land. The secret workings of railroad rings—such histories as that of the South Improvement Company—the practices of railroad corporations among the coal mines of Ohio and Pennsylvania, and with the farmers of the West, of which we have heard much in the course of this debate, are, however, sufficiently understood to make plain some of the abuses which demand a remedy. What that remedy shall be is the substance of the question, as I understand it, now before the House.

THE PLAN PROPOSED—RIVER IMPROVEMENT—COMPETITION BY GOVERNMENT.

The plans suggested by the several propositions that have been offered here for the remedy of the more apparent of these abuses may be grouped into three classes: first, the improvement of the Mississippi and the other natural water-ways of the country, which was so earnestly advocated the other day by the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. STANARD,] and which has so many friends upon this floor, especially among gentlemen from the West and the Southwest; secondly, Government competition; and thirdly, Government control.

Both the bill recommended by the committee and the one introduced by myself are based upon the idea of Government control. Of the other plans permit me to speak briefly before proceeding to the consideration of the questions presented by these bills.

So far as the improvement of our river navigation is concerned, I have no doubt that reasonable expenditures by Government in this direction would be amply justified by the benefits to be reaped by the people inhabiting large regions of the country. But, sir, those benefits would accrue to only a part of the people, and for only a portion of the time. Take down the map of the country. Look at the course of your rivers. Draw a line across it east and west upon the meridian that marks the northern boundary of winter navigation, and the reasons are before you. Although nature has bountifully supplied our continent with numerous rivers that run seaward from many regions, yet both the climate and geography of the country forbid a reliance upon them to meet the commercial needs of all our people. The rapidity of railway transit, its independence of the seasons, the fact that it may reach its arms out from commercial centers into regions where no navigable rivers run, make it, it seems to me, the method upon which we must chiefly rely to meet the commercial needs of the people of all sections and for all seasons.

To the scheme of Government competition which the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WILLARD] so stoutly advocated a few moments ago I have two objections: first, it would add too largely to the burdens of the country; and, secondly, it would be a departure from the true prerogative of government, and would centralize power in the hands of an existing administration to a degree, I fear, inimical to the success of our republicanism. Let us for a single moment look at these objections a little more in detail. It is true that of the bills pending before the House two or three are framed upon the hypothesis that private capital will come forward and build railroads to compete with those already in existence. I do not believe it, sir. With all due respect to the judgment of the gentlemen who are the authors of these bills, I repeat that I do not believe it. Sir, these bills are drafted upon the delusive idea that capital will seek the poorer instead of the better investment. A railroad built solely to afford cheap transportation can only return a limited profit upon the investment, and the capitalists of the country have yet to earn the reputation of unselfishness. I have no objections to these bills if Government aid lurk nowhere in them, for they are innocent of harm. They are likewise impotent for good, unless it be true that you expect to compel such investments by failing to afford any other relief from the abuses the people now suffer. In that case I object to the principle. Why should the people be compelled to purchase an immunity from evils from which it is the clear right and duty of Government to protect them?

Other bills—at any rate the one introduced by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HURLBUT]—propose Government aid. Whether his bill proposes Government aid direct, or the guarantee of a certain interest upon the bonds of the company, it means that in the end Government must pay for the road. Sir, we have had enough of this. The people of this country have seen lands from which empires might be carved pass from their ownership into the hands of corporations, and they have witnessed gigantic swindles practiced upon them in the name of internal development, until they will shrink in dismay from any such proposition as is contained in the bill of the gentleman from Illinois. The people of this country will never suffer such a proposition to be accomplished as long, at any rate, as other remedies are within our reach.

Mr. Speaker, without enlarging upon the reasons, permit me to say that I do not believe that the competitive scheme can be made successful without Government aid, and to this I object, first, because it would impose a burden upon the people of the whole country to benefit only a portion of them, for you cannot build these competing lines to run everywhere; secondly, because it would add too largely to the volume of our national burdens; and, thirdly, because it would be a wide and dangerous departure from the true office of governments. The immense aggregation of power given by railroad ownership is well illustrated in Belgium and in Russia. It may do in a monarchy, in which a change of administration by the people is never in order, but in a republic the machinery of government should never become so ramified or interwoven with the industries or speculations of the people as to become impeditive to the free constitutional exercise of the popular will. Let us not forget that the only prerogative of governments is to govern; not to engage in the industries or speculations of the people, but to control them with the power of sovereignty—with the jura summi imperii that resides with government—whenever those industries or speculations interfere with natural rights or become obstructive to the prosperity of the people.

My friend from Michigan [Mr. WILLARD] said in substance that the statesmanship of the future must aim at development and progress in material things, through the energies of government. Something of the policy of France under the empire must enter into it. Rather should he have said that the wisest statesmanship of the future will seek to develop our resources and prosper our people, through a polity which will foster our industries, secure to labor its due rewards, and encourage enterprise in its widest fields, by throwing over each the shield of protection against whatsoever cripples or feeds upon them. With such a policy the hope of to-day may be made the fact of to-morrow. Our commerce, which, as the gentleman said with a classic metaphor, is now pent up in inland valleys, and like the ten thousand Greeks in Asia Minor, is echoing the cry "The sea! the sea!" would under such policy find ample pathway to either ocean. As Xenophon found the way for these ten thousand to the Euxine by his energies and force, so will our commerce by the like qualities of our people find way to the marts of the Atlantic seaboard, and to those that stand by the Golden Gate beckoning to Asia for its traffic across the western sea. Protect the people against wrongs and their emprise will do the rest. This should be the ambition of the statesman, and by this, the grandeur of which we have heard to-day as possible may be realized.

DANGERS TO BE AVOIDED.

In listening to this debate, both to-day and heretofore, I have been much impressed by a sense of the danger we are in of committing some grave error by hasty or ill-considered legislation. Whatever we do must be so done as to remedy the abuses, without disturbing the uses, of the agencies employed in the carrying trade. We must seek to remedy evils without discouraging the investment of capital in railway enterprises, those enterprises which have been so potent in the development of our grand civilization, and in the progress of the grand age in which we live. I am quite certain that the most extreme anti-railroad man on this floor will agree with me in this remark.

NATIONAL CONTROL—THE POWER UNDER THE CONSTITUTION.

A somewhat troublesome feature of this question arises from the obscurity that seems at first glance to envelop the question as to what power in the premises resides with the States and what is delegated by the Constitution to the General Government. This question is discussed somewhat at length in the very able and lawyer-like report submitted by the Committee on Railways and Canals, and has likewise been discussed at much length by gentlemen who have participated in this debate. It, nevertheless, is still regarded as the most difficult feature of the transportation question; and I therefore, if the House will continue its attention, propose to discuss it briefly, in doing which I shall, as far as possible, avoid a trespass upon the ground so ably and so well occupied by others.

Article 1, section 8, of the Constitution gives to Congress the power "to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes." What authority did the framers intend to give by this language? It is a prime rule of construction that words not technical shall be understood in their usual and ordinary sense. Webster defines the word "commerce" to mean "an interchange or mutual change of goods, wares, productions, or property of any kind, between nations or individuals, either by barter or by purchase and sale." The same authority tells us that to regulate means "to adjust by rule." If these significations are to attach, and no others can, then Congress has power to adjust by rule or law all interchange of commodities between parties separated by State lines.

There is an overwhelming reason why this power must reside with Congress. The jurisdiction of a State is exhausted at the limit of its territory. When an article of commerce passes across a State line, it goes from one jurisdiction into another. While one power may regulate the delivery and the other the reception, neither can exercise full control over the whole transaction without treaty or agreement between them. This treaty or agreement, made necessary by the force of the situation, is contained in the words of the Constitution which I have quoted. The necessity for a power to regulate commerce among the States was a chief cause which led to the formation of the Federal Constitution, as all familiar with the history of that document know. I understand the structure of our system to be such, that States have exclusive control of all matters of police that are purely internal to them, to be exercised without impingement of defined principles of republicanism, while the Federal Government has exclusive jurisdiction over all matters that are wholly or partially external to a State. From this it follows that the Federal Government has control of all commerce across State lines, and, ex necessitate, has control of the machinery through which it is conducted. This view is supported by the dicta of the best writers upon the Constitution, and by a formidable line of Supreme Court decisions from a very early time down to the present. There was a time very early when this doctrine did not obtain, so tender were our courts and statesmen then of State rights. It was once said that, in order to determine the jurisdiction of Congress over a river, its waters must be tasted. If salt, Congress might legislate; if fresh, Congress had no jurisdiction. It was from this period that the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. ARTHUR] was able to exhume utterances in support of his constitutional objection to the bill of the committee. This idea, however, passed away with the now-nearly extinct race of State-rights sticklers, who had but very little confidence in the power or uses of the Federal Union.

As early as 1824 that profound jurist, Chief Justice Marshall, in the case of Gibbons vs. Ogden, (found in 9 Wheaton's Reports, and so often referred to in this debate,) announced the doctrine of national jurisdiction over interstate traffic, and from that time hitherto courts and authorities have indorsed it, until now it is a matter well settled by adjudication. I will not consume time to quote from these decisions, as others have liberally quoted from them, except in the single instance of the most recent one in point. In the Clinton Bridge case, (1 Woolworth's Circuit Court Reports,) decided in 1867, Mr. Justice Miller said:

> When these roads [railroads] became parts of the great highways of the Union, acting an important part in a commerce which embraces many States, and destined, as some of these roads are to become the channels through which the nations of Europe and Asia shall interchange their commodities, there can be no reason to doubt that to regulate them is to regulate commerce both with foreign nations and among the States, and to refuse to do this is a refusal to discharge one of the most important duties of federal government. As already intimated, the shackles with which the different States fettered commerce, in their selfish efforts to benefit themselves at the expense of their confederates, was one of the main causes which led to the formation of our present Constitution. The wonderful growth of that commerce since it has been placed exclusively under the control of the Federal Government has justified the wisdom of our fathers. But are we to remit the most valuable part of it to the control of the States through whose territory it must be conducted and to all the vexations which they may impose? And must all this be permitted, because the carrying is done by a method not thought of when the Constitution was framed?

An act of Congress approved July 15, 1866, entitled "An act to facilitate commercial, postal, and military communication among the several States," broadly assumes the power which good reasoning and the best authorities say is vested in the General Government. The act of March 3, 1873, regulating the transportation of live stock over railways, is likewise an assumption of this power. Both this act and the one first named, which was passed upon the memorial of the late Governor Tod, of Ohio, to remedy a hardship arising in the district which I represent, by reason of the refusal of the State of Pennsylvania, or rather of the Pennsylvania Railroad Company, which is "the power behind the throne" in that State, to allow a local Ohio railroad to cross the State line, are each notable precedents for the legislation now proposed. It seems to me that this power to regulate commerce among the States by control of the agencies it employs, whether a canal, a river, or a railroad, is now, in view of these precedents and holdings, scarcely a question for debate. At any rate it has been so fully discussed by others, that I will not speak to it further.

There is, however, one branch of the constitutional question that has not yet been discussed upon this floor in my hearing, except perhaps by inference; that is as to the power of the national Legislature to regulate interstate commerce, by fixing rates or prescribing rules in conflict with corporation charters granted by States. For instance, if a railroad corporation, whose line extends through Ohio and Pennsylvania, holds charters from these States giving to it the right to charge five cents per ton per mile, can Congress limit its charges to a less sum? Upon this I have no doubt. The power of Congress is exclusive and supreme. A State, in granting a charter, cannot vest a right outside and beyond the limits of its jurisdiction. It cannot in any way abridge the power of Congress to regulate commerce among the States.

Story, in his work on the Constitution, volume 2, section 1067, says:

> It has been settled upon the most solemn deliberation that the power (to regulate commerce among the States) is exclusive in the Government of the United States. The reasoning upon which this doctrine is founded is to the following effect: The power to regulate commerce is general and unlimited in its terms. The full power to regulate a particular subject implies the whole power, and leaves no residuum. A grant of the whole is incompatible with the existence of a right in another to any part of it. A grant of a power to regulate necessarily excludes the action of all others who would perform the same operation on the same thing. Regulation is designed to indicate the entire result applying to those parts which remain as they were, as well as to those which are altered.

Again, in section 1068 of the same volume, he says:

> The power to regulate commerce is not at all like that to levy taxes. The latter may well be concurrent, while the former is exclusive, resulting from the different nature of the two.
> But when a State proceeds to regulate commerce with foreign nations or among the several States, it is exercising the very power which is granted to Congress.

In section 1071, he uses this language:

> The reasoning by which the power given to Congress to regulate commerce is maintained to be exclusive has not been of late seriously controverted, and it seems to have the cheerful acquiescence of the learned tribunals of a particular State, one of whose acts brought it first under judicial examination.

There are numerous other dicta to the same purport, but I will not consume time to make further quotations. If gentlemen wish to examine the question further I refer them to Kent's Commentaries, section 19, and to Rawl on the Constitution, chapter 9, pages 81 to 84, and also to the case of Gibbons vs. Ogden, to which I referred a few moments ago, and in which the whole subject is discussed with much learning and perspicuity.

I deduce from what I have said upon the constitutional question that Congress has the full and exclusive power to correct all the abuses practiced by transportation companies engaged in interstate commerce.

I do not forget that a few days ago, upon motion of my colleague, [Mr. SMITH,] the House resolved that Congress had this power, by a vote, I think, of 171 to 64. This indicates the views of a majority here, so that I have no fear of the defeat of national supervision upon the question of the jurisdiction of Congress, notwithstanding the elaborated effort of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. ARTHUR,] and of other gentlemen, to convince the House to the contrary. This resolution of my colleague a western metropolitan newspaper derisively styled "God in Congress." Such expressions only show how new this question is to the general public, and give some faint color for the idea prevailing abroad, unpleasant expressions of which occasionally come to us, that nothing is less understood by Americans than the dual system of government under which they live.

Mr. Speaker, I have now given what seems to me to be good reason for the opinion that the easy and ready solution of the transportation problem lies in legal supervision, and also for the opinion that this supervision may be constitutionally exercised by Congress. I beg now to be permitted to speak briefly of the comparative merits of your committee's bill and the one introduced by myself, to which I made allusion in the early part of my remarks.

I understand, sir, that if the pending motion to recommit be withdrawn, or if the demand for the previous question be not sustained when it shall have been made, this bill of the committee will be susceptible of amendment. I give notice now that I shall move to substitute my bill for the committee's bill, if I shall be permitted to do so. It lies, I suppose, within the will of the chairman of the committee, and at the proper time I shall ask him for the opportunity to make the motion.

I have already said that both my bill and the bill of the committee are based upon the idea of Government control. I hope that gentlemen will carefully consider them both with a view to a friendly criticism of the means which each employs for the exercise of that control.

THE M'CRARY BILL—OBJECTIONS TO IT—MERITS OF THE TWO PLANS FOR NATIONAL CONTROL.

The committee's bill, in brief, is this: it directs whatever of power it gives against the evils of extortionate charges and unjust discrimination, without defining what shall be considered to be an extortionate charge or an improper discrimination. Its vagueness in this respect is peculiar, and I call the attention of the House to it.

It creates a board of nine commissioners, one for each judicial district in the United States, which board may sit at such times and in such places as its members may elect. This board may establish schedules of rates to be observed by railroad companies, unless such companies shall choose to litigate the question of reasonableness of rates. It may summon witnesses; it may prosecute for penalties; it may gather statistics, and it may make recommendations to Congress. This, I believe, is a fair and full synopsis of the provisions of the bill of the committee.

My first objection to it, sir, is that it strikes feebly and vaguely at only two of the abuses from which our people now suffer. There are other wrongs practiced by railroad corporations than those of extortionate charges and unjust discriminations. Those are the main ones, I grant you, but still there are other abuses that aggrieve the people. I enumerated some of them in the early part of my remarks. Gentlemen will have no trouble to recall them to recollection. Not one of these abuses does this bill pretend even to reach and remedy. It is a half-way measure, emasculated, weak, vigorless.

The principal shaft from the quiver of your committee which has been incubating for months upon this subject, and, let me say, grappling with commendable zeal with the most difficult problem of the times, is directed against the abuse of extortionate charges. How is it proposed to prevent extortion? Let us look for a moment into the practical workings of the bill and see. Under it your commissioners go forward and establish a schedule of rates. If these rates are less than what a railroad company desires to exact, it refuses to be governed by the schedule. Thereupon your commissioners institute a prosecution for the penalty. Now, if the railroad company can secure the decision of a court or the verdict of a jury, to the effect that the schedule is unreasonable, then it will not be liable either for the penalty or in damages to the aggrieved shippers. We were told the other day by the chairman of the committee recommending this bill, [Mr. MCCRARY,] in his very able and exhaustive speech in support of it, that by common law that obtains everywhere railroad companies are liable in damages for practicing extortion. Therefore, all the benefit which the shipper will reap from this legislation will be in the shadowy advantage it gives him by casting the burden of proof in an action at law upon the railroad company upon the question of reasonableness of rates. All the benefit that it will give to the public will be the remote possibility of the collection of the penalty, of which I apprehend railroad corporations will stand in little fear.

What an idea for the exercise of sovereignty is this. What a control, when it is no control, unless a court or jury, sitting away off somewhere in some obscure corner of the country, should happen to agree with your Government officers upon what would or would not be reasonable in the schedule. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HURLBUT] said, with much more of truth than forcefulness, as a fact making in favor of the committee's bill, which he advocated, that in "New York railroad companies control Legislatures and own courts." I have too much confidence in the purity of our judiciary to believe that this is very generally true throughout the country; but I submit to the gentlemen of this House that it would be unwise to make every court or panel of jurors that may happen to sit under the provision of this bill a sovereign independent commission to establish or disestablish the rates to be charged by railroad companies. Under this bill no schedule of rates could be established upon which the public could rely with confidence and certainty. There would be "nothing constant but change." Schedules would constantly fluctuate between the sittings of courts and the sessions of your commissioners. Weak old Lear never held his scepter with a feebler hand or to a more uncertain purpose than would Government by this bill assert its sovereignty over the mightiest and most unscrupulous power in the land. You will not control by such weak and uncertain measures a power which for two decades has laughed at State laws and snapped its fingers at all efforts of control. You attempt to bind a giant with hairs. This legislation will do the country no good, except as it may be initiative of a better law hereafter. If I vote for the committee's bill, as I expect to do if the House should refuse to substitute a better one for it, it will be mainly in the hope that it will be followed by better legislation in the future.

Another objection to the committee's bill seems to me to lie in the loose and imperfect organization of the board it creates. It will not be a department. It will not be a bureau. It will sometimes sit, and sometimes it will not be in session. It will have no definite duties to perform beyond those stated with great generality in the bill, of instituting an investigation into the rates charged by railroad companies and to fix schedules. Is this, Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the Committee on Railways and Canals, the sort of instrument you would select with which to control corporations?

Still another objection to the bill recommended by the committee seems to me to lie in the fact that its provisions affect only railroad companies or corporations. Sir, without the figures before me, I assert that three-fourths of the freights of this country are not transported by railroad companies direct. The fast freight-line, the express and the dispatch companies, do a large share of the business now; and if this bill should become a law, it would be a very easy matter indeed for them to do it all for the purpose of evading its provisions.

My final objection to the bill recommended by the Committee on Railways and Canals lies in the fact that the board it creates may exercise an arbitrary power in the establishment of rates. No rule is to guide them; nothing whatever but the judgment or the caprice of the commissioners, as the case may be. This, sir, in my judgment, is unwise; it is dangerous; it is unsafe legislation. If you happen to get upon your board a majority of men who, by reason of corruption or with honest intent, favor these monopolies, then all the abuses of which the people complain will be continued. If, on the other hand, you happen to get upon your board a majority of anti-railroad extremists, the railroads will be crippled—possibly crippled out of existence—if the courts should happen to be hostile to them. This would be sadly to the disadvantage of our internal commerce, and obstructive to the material progress of the age in which we live.

These, sir, very briefly and imperfectly stated, are my principal objections to the bill recommended by your Committee on Railways and Canals. I have already trespassed upon the patience and attention of the House longer, I know, than is the usual right of a new member on this floor; and I have not the time to exhaust the entire field of objections. But I do hope that gentlemen will carefully consider the provisions of this bill before the vote is taken upon the question of substitution, if the chairman of the committee permits me to make that question when the proper time arrives.

BILL NO. 1079.

The bill proposed to be substituted, although perhaps not perfect in all its details, is certainly free from the objections of which I have been speaking. It creates a permanent bureau, carefully organized, and guarded against corruption—a bureau that will have fixed and definite duties to perform—and that will have ample power to enforce its own mandates and the laws of Congress.

I am sorry, let me say in passing, that we have not in the economy of our Government a department of industry, to which this bureau might be attached. The wealth, the jurisprudence, the internal affairs, the Army and Navy, and the commonwealth, are each represented by secretaries in the executive councils of the nation; but the industries of the country, that which is at the base of all other interests, has, directly, no voice there.

In the absence of such a department as that, this bureau is to be annexed to the Department of the Interior, but except in minor matters is to be entirely independent of it. This bureau must regulate rates; it must guard human life by superintending the condition and the repairs of railroads; it must require that the public convenience be subserved in the running arrangements of railroads; it must gather statistics upon definite and fixed inquiries, so that Congress and the country may rely upon the information or the statistics that they will from time to time receive; and it must, in the name of the United States, enforce the provisions of the bill for the remedy of the various abuses of which I have been speaking.

Let me call the attention of the House to the fact that this bureau will exercise no arbitrary power in the establishment of rates. It will be governed by a definite, a fixed, and, as I think, a just rule. Rates must be so regulated as to yield a net earning of 10 per cent. upon the capital necessarily employed in the business of transportation, for unindebted companies; and 15 per cent. for companies indebted upon their construction account. If this be too much or too little, change it. The principle is certainly the correct one.

This, sir, will give to the people of this country cheap transportation. At the same time capital invested in railways will yield a profitable though not speculative return.

How much this will cheapen transportation a few figures will show. The Railway Monitor states that we have in the United States 71,564 miles of railway, which cost $3,728,416,000. The net earning of 54,454 miles of this railway was, in a year not named, $174,350,913. The cost of these railroads is not stated; but railroads average to cost in the United States $50,000 per mile, and the equipments not far from $4,000 per mile; so that the cost of these 54,454 miles of railroad would be not far from $2,940,516,000. Now, sir, a very simple exercise of arithmetic will show what an enormous reduction would be made by the provisions of this bill in the cost of transportation, if these figures are reliable, of which there can be no doubt. The cost, earnings, and expenditures of particular roads are very accessible; so that the reduction to be made in any particular instance can be readily ascertained.

There is another feature of this bill, and I came near forgetting it, which ought, it seems to me, to commend it to the support of the House and the favor of the country. While the bill recommended by your committee will, as has been said here to-day, require a considerable yearly expenditure by the Government, the bureau proposed by my bill will cost the Treasury nothing, inasmuch as its expenses are to be paid by a tax upon the income of those corporations whose practices have made this legislation necessary. This is exact justice. At this time, when your Committee on Appropriations is laboring to reduce expenditures, and at all times, the question of expense is by no means unimportant. Although the cost of this bureau will come indirectly from the patrons of these corporations, it is right that the expense should be borne by those benefited in the proportion that that benefit is received.

CONCLUSION.

One word more, sir, and I have done. I have not sought to influence the legislation upon this subject because I hear the tramp of grangers in the West or the resolutions of cheap-transportation associations in the East. While to heed the voice of the people is the duty of the Representative, to scramble to be in the popular tide without convictions is unworthy the man who is worthy to be here. I gave expression to the view which I take now in another legislative body long before the bugle-notes of the rallying grangers echoed over the champaigns of the West, or the earnest demands of transportation associations were heard among the hills of the East. I have no ambition in connection with this subject but to see the Forty-third Congress incorporate into its history that it grappled with and solved the most intricate problem of the times in the interests of the people and for the prosperity of the republic. This, sir, will be a grand history, and it is my ambition to be a part of it by voting for the most perfect bill upon the subject which the wisdom of the House can furnish.

I thank the House for the marked attention with which it has listened to me.

Mr. NIBLACK obtained the floor.

Mr. POLAND. I am not aware any other gentleman desires to speak on this question, and if the gentleman from Indiana will yield I will move that we take a recess until this evening, to go on with the codification of the laws.

Mr. NIBLACK. I do not desire to occupy much time, and may as well say what I have to say this evening as to postpone it.

Mr. POLAND. Very well; I will not make the motion.

Mr. NIBLACK. Mr. Speaker, in what I have to say on this bill I will not attempt an argument on the general power of Congress to regulate commerce among the several States. That has been sufficiently discussed by those who have already spoken.

The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. ARTHUR] who opened this debate in opposition to the bill has left but little to be said by one holding my views as to the power of, and limitations upon, Congress in that respect. In fact, the whole ground of opposition to this measure has been so well occupied by him and other gentlemen who have preceded me that I shall only seek to add a few words on what seem to me to be some of its most objectionable features.

Whatever may in reality be the power of Congress over the commerce of the country, whether foreign or domestic, it is not claimed, I believe, that Congress has ever at any time heretofore attempted to exercise that power to the extent now proposed. Congress has complete and undisputed power over our foreign commerce in all its ramifications and all its details, yet in all the various acts regulating our intercourse with foreign nations not the slightest approach has ever been made toward anything like intermeddling with the prices of freight or of any other article or commodity connected with commerce, or with charges for the transportation of passengers. Consequently it is now proposed to apply to our domestic commerce a rule, a regulation, which is entirely new in our legislation and wholly without a precedent in any parallel case. We are therefore invited by this bill to enter upon a new field of legislation and within the boundaries of a newly discovered and undefined power. In view of the immense interests involved, both public and private, it behooves us to see that nothing is hastily and inconsiderately done simply because the country expects us to do something to revive our drooping commerce, and because we may not just at the moment know what else to do.

If Congress may regulate the prices of freight and passengers carried by a railroad because they happen to be taken across a State line, then it may do the same thing as to a vessel of any kind, whether large or small, which may navigate any of our lakes which lie between States. It may also regulate and prescribe the charges and tolls on ferries and bridges across rivers which constitute the boundaries between States, as well as upon omnibus lines, which, in many instances, form a connecting link between railroads. The principle involved in the power is just as applicable to any other method of conveyance as to railroads. It will apply all the same to lines of stage-coaches, of wagons, or of pack-mules, which carry freight or passengers across State boundaries.

If the power of Congress really extends to the cases enumerated, then why may it not extend to the hotels and eating-houses which are connected with, or under the control of, these lines of interstate communication? The prices charged at these hotels and eating-houses are as often extortionate and unjust to passengers as any other charges they are required to pay. Then why not regulate those prices also? Ought not a provision looking to the regulation of such hotels and eating-houses to have been embraced in the bill we are considering, if we are expected to cover all the grounds of complaint?

Sir, if we are to enter upon this business of regulating prices and charges, where is the limit to be fixed beyond which we may not go? In that respect where shall the power of Congress cease and that of the State begin? It does seem to me that the committee have confounded the power to regulate with the power to create. Congress is not specially charged with any duty in the creation of commerce. That is the work of the States, of the local municipalities, and of the people, in their private pursuits. Commerce has first to be created before the power of Congress attaches to it, and Congress is not charged with any of the duties of proprietorship or ownership concerning commodities which enter into it. Hence it is that heretofore we have always acted on the theory that charges for freight transportation and travel are outside of the domain of congressional legislation.

The demand for cheap transportation, Mr. Speaker, which comes up to us from the States of the West and the South, is a most natural demand, and the only surprise with me is that it has been so long deferred; and in that respect the people of those sections especially have been patient and long-suffering. We of the West are no longer able to find a market for most of our surplus products in the South, as we used to do. We have had to seek new markets and new channels of commerce. These new channels consist almost entirely of railroads, of greater or lesser extent. To build these roads we have borrowed immense sums of money, often at ruinous rates. As a result they cost too much money to be profitable as an investment, at fair rates for transportation. When they are built, a struggle for quick reimbursement begins. A wide-spread dissatisfaction with their management very often, and, indeed, very generally, ensues.

In casting about for a remedy as to some particular grievance, we look into the charter of the company of which we complain. To our surprise, we find that in our anxiety to get the road we have granted away much more in the charter than we ought to have done, judged in the light of subsequent events. We find, in most cases, that we have not even reserved to the State the power to control the prices for freight or passengers, and that hence the Legislature which gave the charter is often powerless to afford relief. Much of which we complain, therefore, arises from careless and inconsiderate State legislation, and is hence beyond the reach or jurisdiction of Congress. If the worst shall come, however, there is still a remedy left to the people as to charters inconsiderately or unwisely granted. They can, by means of amendments to their existing State constitutions, or by the adoption of new constitutions in their respective States, amend or modify those charters, or sweep them out of existence, as they may prefer. The recent action of the State of Pennsylvania is a notable instance of what the people of a State may do by the means of a constitutional convention, to amend their constitution. Our railroad system is yet new, however, and very incomplete. Many important links are wanting. Many new connections have yet to be made before we can judge fully of what railroads are capable. The softening influences of time and greater experience in the management of railroads will, I trust, very much mitigate many of the evils now complained of, and perhaps may remove others altogether.

The great remedy, however, and the one on which I mainly rely, is competition. That can be created by the improvement of our great rivers, and the construction, if necessary, of other lines of water-communication.

By the construction of a canal near the mouth of the Mississippi River of only a few miles in length, or by deepening the channel at its confluence with the Gulf, as may be found most expedient, so as to allow the largest class of vessels to pass and repass without hinderance, we can at once reduce the price of freight more than one-half between the whole Mississippi Valley and the great markets of Europe. If this shall be found insufficient, then let us connect the waters of the Mississippi with the lakes of the North, and when found practicable, bring together the navigable waters by similar means in other sections of the country. I should prefer to spend many and increasing millions in this way, from time to time as we may be able, even with all the risks that some of the money shall be wasted, than to enter on the policy which this bill proposes. The development of these water-lines only involves a given amount of money, while the passage of this bill introduces into the Government a new element of political power which may prove unrelenting and even destructive.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. Will the gentleman from Indiana permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. NIBLACK. Certainly.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. Will the charges on through freights from Southern Indiana and Missouri be reduced by the passage of the McCrary bill?

Mr. NIBLACK. I fear not, Mr. Speaker. We have certainly no guarantee that such will be the result. On the contrary the chances are, sir, that these charges will be increased on many of the through lines, so as to bring them up to the general average. But, sir, that brings me to another branch of this question, to which I was about to allude.

One of the most irritating causes of complaint which I have ever heard against the management of our railroads arises from discriminations against local freights. These discriminations are often real grievances and call loudly for a remedy. These grievances, however, are, as a rule, of local concern only, and are remediable, so far as any remedy can be applied, by the proper State Legislatures. Even if these Legislatures have in many instances, if not in most cases, granted away the power to control the rates of charges, they certainly have the power to intervene and to prevent unjust and unreasonable discriminations as between different classes of shippers. Congress is therefore not called upon to interfere in these local troubles, as it clearly has no jurisdiction over them.

But, sir, grant that there are some evils in railroad management which cannot be fully reached by State legislation, or by legitimate competition as proposed. Shall we then rush into this untried experiment of congressional intermeddling, which if not successful will rivet our chains only the more tightly? The nine commissioners proposed to be appointed under this bill will practically have control of the charges for freights and passengers all over the country. These commissioners are to be appointed by the President, and removable at his pleasure. Congress will have power to amend or change the law at any time under which these commissioners are appointed, and from which they derive all their power. These commissioners will necessarily be subservient to the President for the time being, whoever he may be. Being, too, also greatly dependent on Congress, they will of course desire to be also in harmony with that body, and personally useful to its members as far as practicable.

The railroads of the country when combined can wield a very powerful, if not a controlling influence in national politics. Very naturally the President would, in the end, if not in the beginning, seek the friendship and influence of this great power, and possibly often endeavor to combine it in his favor by the appointment of commissioners acceptable to the railroads. As an almost inexorable consequence these commissioners would be expected so to discharge their duties as to secure the friendship and support of the railroads to the administration in power at the time. This friendship and support, when secured, would, of course, be used to elect from time to time a Congress in harmony with the administration. Then, sir, would it be Congress regulating the railroads, or would it not rather be the railroads really regulating Congress?

We of the West have, for many years past, had strong and decided views in regard to the currency and the finances, in which we have had reason to believe an actual majority of the people of the country have largely shared. Yet we have at all times been and are still unable to enforce our views, simply because the weight of capital has been and still is against us.

Sir, if under this bill any perceptible power shall be exercised over the railroads, it will necessarily introduce them as a new element in Federal politics, and especially in our presidential and congressional elections. They cannot be expected to feel indifferent as to results which may exercise such an influence over their business and the profits of their investments. The ultimate effect must be to still further extend and more closely cement the partnership already existing between the concentrated capital and the political power of the country. This new alliance consummated and what will become of the demand of the people for cheap transportation? What, then, indeed, would become of the demand of the plain people of the country for anything which capital might not be inclined to give?

Can we afford to risk so much in the mere hope that we will occasionally be able to save a few dollars on a car of freight, or on some journey to a distant State? Are not the chances too great against the probable success of the experiment?

If this bill shall become a law, new and most responsible duties are at once imposed on the Federal Government. It is not to be presumed that nine commissioners will long be regarded as sufficient. We may reasonably expect soon to have at least one for each State. A new tribunal is thus at once brought into existence, with most important and extraordinary powers, without any direct responsibility to the people. A new swarm of officers will be created, whose salaries must be provided by increased taxation, under the specious pretense that transportation may be cheapened over the great through lines of the country, when the greatest grievances arise out of the shipment and delivery of our local freights, over which these officers will have no jurisdiction.

Sir, during the earlier period of our national existence our greatest strength consisted in the simplicity of our Government. There were but few opportunities for the enrichment of men in office, and hence the inducements to peculate or misgovern were not great. The events of the last few years have worked a revolution in this respect, and drifted us away from our ancient simplicity. By assumptions on the one side, and concessions on the other, new and greatly increased powers have already been added to the national Government, and correspondingly new duties imposed upon it. It is now almost imperial in its power, in its revenues, and in its patronage. Shall we still further increase this patronage by passing this bill? Ought we not, rather, to retrace our steps in many respects, and reinaugurate greater simplicity and greater economy?

Sir, it is folly to think of conferring imperial powers and imperial duties on a Government like ours, and long continue it a real republic. The spirit will first be driven out and after awhile the form will necessarily disappear. For the purposes of this argument I have based my opposition to this bill mainly on grounds of expediency alone. I might add still other reasons for my opposition, but it is unnecessary now. With my present views of public policy I cannot vote for this bill, nor can I vote for any similar bill without doing violence to theories of government I have long entertained.

CHEAP TRANSPORTATION AND CURRENCY.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, I desire to address myself to this House at this time upon subjects not altogether political, but such as I deem of intense interest to my constituents.

TRANSPORTATION.

I am aware that, with certain elements in this House, one who may attempt to urge here the necessities of the West and South, in the way of cheap transportation and more money, is at once accused of sprinkling his hair with hay-seed and rushing to the grangers' camp. Be it so. I have no hesitation in accepting the situation in that particular as well as all others.

I find that as a democrat I can well indorse every measure advocated by the grangers, as I understand them. Indeed, their principles are such as have been maintained by the party to which I have always acknowledged allegiance.

Old issues of a sectional character, growing out of and anterior to the war, are well-nigh obsolete. We probably more readily recognize the fact that those issues are out of question because new ones have arisen of such moment with the people as to overshadow the worn and jagged remnants of war bickerings. A country suddenly stricken with poverty, financial panics, and wide-spread bankruptcy, finds too much of present pressing trials, exciting common sympathies and mutual grievances, and demanding united action for relief, to permit stale prejudices to longer divide them or impede their efforts for reform and justice.

We may rejoice that old issues of a sectional character are dead. But let us not suppose that grave ones have not taken their place. We should not overlook the fact that the questions now agitating the farmers of the Northwest, West, and South are in many respects sectional; nor should we disregard the further fact that, though sectional in one sense, yet in a broader sense of general prosperity, they are truly national, and should be so regarded and dealt with.

Notwithstanding Heaven has smiled upon the agricultural portion of the country, rains have fallen, and the radiant sun has ripened year after year rich and abundant harvests, yet the people have become poorer, money scarcer, and times harder than ever known before. These results the people attribute partly to unwise and unjust legislation, and partly to withholding necessary legislation for their relief on the part of Congress.

Congress has neglected the improvement of the water-courses of the West and South. While the Federal Government has been wantonly lavish in granting lands and other vast subsidies to corporations for building railroads, out of which have grown up gigantic systems of corrupt jobbery, the great water outlets to the sea have been shamefully neglected. Mr. Speaker, when we reflect that the people of the West and Northwest took up arms in the late civil war, more than all else, for the purpose of forever securing to themselves the free navigation of the Mississippi River and its tributaries, that their produce might find easy, cheap, and ready transportation to the markets of the globe; and further consider that this great river, the "Father of Waters," is now practically without a mouth or outlet because of our neglect—I might say as completely blockaded as Jeff. Davis ever was or ever could be able to make it—we then in a true and comprehensive sense realize the criminal dereliction to duty of which Congress has been guilty with regard to the improvement of this national highway.

It may be alleged by those who have controlled the legislation of the country that reconstruction, "civil rights," so called, and kindred measures have overshadowed all other subjects, and demanded the very first attention of Congress to the exclusion of all others. This may answer for those who had more interest in railroad jobs and the diversion of trade and commerce North and East on the lines of these roads, but for a Western or Southern Congressman, be he republican or democrat, that answer is simply an insult to the people.

But no such pretext longer exists. The people are sick of those stale issues. None now are agitating these civil-rights humbugs, except a few noisy politicians, who desire to divert the attention of the people from the searching investigation they are now giving to this party misrule that is crushing the laboring interest of the country. It is our duty, irrespective of party or party issues, to devote the time of this Congress to the relief of the people.

The republican party has an unlimited control in both Houses of Congress, and will be held responsible for the legislation that takes place as well as for any neglect of needed legislation; yet every democrat here is in duty bound to assist the republicans in all measures for the advancement of the material interests of the people. This duty they will perform. The people are passing through an ordeal that will not permit them to patiently submit to the behest of any party or party measure. There is no party in their poverty and trials; all are on an equality there, and unless the existing parties show a disposition to relieve them, they will disregard party and party discipline, and lead off in a bold determination to right their wrongs outside of party.

I think I speak advisedly when I say that the people have resolved, and that irrevocably, to compel the opening up of water-communications. The people of the Mississippi Valley have determined that, cost what it may, this Government shall open and keep open the mouth of that river. If this Congress fails to do its duty in that behalf, they will try a different suit; if the party in power fails to perform that duty, another party will be accorded the opportunity.

Mr. Speaker, I shall not attempt to arrange statistics showing the wealth of the Mississippi Valley, its productions, and means of reaching markets, in order to show the necessity or justice of this demand. Our desks are now loaded with them sent here by the people interested. Besides, it is enough for us to know that this people demand it. This is the very heart and vitals of this Republic. This valley is its substratum of wealth and greatness. More than half our population are urging this measure. This we all know, and we further know that this fact of itself is sufficient reason why it should be done.

If I were to speak as a democrat and in a strictly partisan point of view, with no other desire than party ascendency, I might express the hope that this Congress would disregard this demand of the people, for I assume but few will come back here from this section who now flag in this duty. But I above all other considerations desire some relief to the people who sent me here. I feel that I ought to be of some service to them other than as a partisan. I believe I cannot better serve them than to work for the opening of the mouth of the Mississippi River, and the ultimate improvement of all its tributaries. I do not believe that the vexed question of cheap transportation can be otherwise permanently and satisfactorily settled.

The project proposed by some for the Government to build lines of railways is a dangerous one. We have had too much already of jobbery of this sort. It results usually in nothing but peculation and a dishonest waste of the people's money. While I am ready to admit that Congress may have the lawful power to regulate materially the railroads of the country passing through different States, yet its exercise is of very doubtful propriety, and can be tolerated only upon the principle of an experiment where the necessities of the case demand the trial of doubtful remedies as a last resort. It will make place for an army of agents and Government commissioners, who, if we are to judge from past experience, will more likely combine with the managers of railways to further oppress us than institute any measures of reform and regulation that will result in benefit to any one.

There is another danger, that they may adopt unwise and harsh measures, and thus cripple the roads we have and render them less able to accommodate the people, and, besides, deter further investment of capital in that kind of enterprise.

It is our duty to so legislate as not to cripple any interest of the country, but to foster and protect all. We need all the competition we can properly secure from the investment of capital in railroads in order to induce competition. For the same reason we should improve our rivers and resort to competition in this way, for in competition, and in that alone, can we reasonably expect a solution of this question of transportation as well as all other questions of trade and commerce.

FINANCES.

Mr. Speaker, I cannot close without adverting to another subject that, in my opinion, is of no less importance to the people I have the honor in part to represent than that of cheap transportation. It is probably unnecessary for me to say that I allude to the financial condition of the country.

In order to properly understand this matter, we must consider it from the beginning of the present system of paper-money issue by authority of the national Government.

It is too late now to argue whether the departure from the democratic principle of hard money and opposition to national banks, or the supervision of Congress over the finances of the people, was the part of wisdom or not. It is enough for us to know that it has been done, and that financial ruin and disaster have been the result.

I am opposed to any system of congressional supervision of the amount of money the people shall have as a circulating medium. This evil we can avoid, and should immediately do so. The volume of currency the country needs and should have ought to be left with the people, subject to the law of demand and supply. Free banking may accomplish this; at least it would probably obviate the objection to our present system. It is not so much owing to the limited amount of money now in circulation that the country is suffering financially, as to the fact that the people, as a class, in the South and West went largely in debt during the periods of an inflated currency, and now find these extravagant debts hard to pay, because of the policy of contraction.

During the war greenbacks flooded the country; and owing to the novel character of this money and its abundance, as also to the uncertainty of its redemption, the people distrusted it. The consequence of this was to cause extravagance to be the rule. They desired rather to enjoy the luxuries to be procured by this money than to save it for future use or risk. Of course it sought investment in all manner of property and schemes of speculation. Property went up in proportion as money was more plentiful and of depreciated value. States, counties, and municipal corporations issued their bonds to assist in the building of railroads and other enterprises. These bonds were sold at large discounts, and the building of these improvements carried on while labor and material were at the highest figures, thus costing largely in excess of what they could now be built for.

After the people had thus contracted debts, both in public and individual capacity, believing that money would continue plentiful and all property valuable, the Government began a system of contraction in order to get back upon a specie basis. As contraction went on, of course money became, on account of its scarcity, more valuable; in proportion as money neared a specie standard, property, produce, and labor fell in price. This system of contraction was the anaconda that has crushed the debtor class.

The gradual contraction of the currency more seriously affected the South and West, because it was here that internal improvements were needed. The South had been devastated by war; it was necessary that she should borrow in order to carry on her business and commercial relations. The West were in need of railroads and the improvement of farms, and were in debt for these and similar purposes. Besides, being an agricultural people, they were not provided with the ready money that always seeks commercial centers and mercantile communities. Another cause that materially affected these sections was the unequal distribution of the currency under the national-bank system. It requires no argument to show that these debts and interest thereon could be met with less difficulty if money was now as plentiful as when they were contracted.

Is it just toward the debtor class that the means of paying their debts, relied on when contraced, should be taken away?

The money-lender profits by every measure of contraction, because he can buy with his money, owing to its scarcity and the consequent depression in property values, double what he could at the time it was loaned. A, who loaned B $5,000 during inflation, and took a mortgage on B's farm worth $10,000, now takes the farm to pay his $5,000 mortgage, when to have purchased it at the time of the loan would have cost him $10,000.

The West and South, as before remarked, and especially the agricultural portions, are the debtor class. They feel the squeeze of this anaconda more tightly than any other part of the community. If I am permitted to express my opinion of the real cause of the poverty of the farming community, I should say that this monetary question explained it. The want of transportation doubtless has much to do with it, but it is not the only reason. Give agriculturists the means to pay off their debts and the problem will be solved, unless they commit the same error of going in debt while times are easy and money plentiful.

It cannot be expected, nor do I think it would be policy, to go entirely back to the days of inflation, and issue money without stint or limit; but there ought to be some system devised whereby more money could be put in circulation and partial relief given to the people. This would enable them to emerge from debt, and at the same time prevent a repetition of extravagance.

Mr. Speaker, as a rule, I am opposed to any currency except such as is based on specie payments. But we must not undertake to reach a specie basis all at once; the resumption must be slow. Give the people time, that by rigid economy they can gradually reach a specie basis without utterly bankrupting the farming community.

This question of currency is one of extreme difficulty to deal with, and great caution should attend every effort to legislate upon it.

Of one thing, Mr. Speaker, I am, however, convinced; and that is, the policy for the great mass of the laboring community is to give them more money, that they may be the better enabled to extricate themselves from the load of debt that now oppresses them. In order to partially accomplish this result, we ought to issue the reserve of forty-four millions, and if we must continue the present banking system, let it be free to all. I am opposed to this policy of congressional monopoly in the shape of banks. Nor should we undertake to say how much money the country should have; but let that matter be regulated by the laws of business.

I have felt it my duty to express in my humble way what I deem to be the wants of the people whom I in part have the honor to represent on this floor. I know that there is a strong opposition here and in many other quarters to any further increase in the volume of the currency. But this opposition comes from the money centers, from those who are fortunate enough to be out of debt.

During the war there was a circulating currency in the Northern States alone of about $2,111,000,000, giving about $100 per capita of circulation. Since the close of the war there has been withdrawn from circulation about $1,241,000,000, leaving but $869,000,000; which, less the reserve, $234,000,000, leaves a balance of currency of $635,000,000. There has been probably a loss of at least $7,000,000; and this would leave now in circulation for us, about $627,000,000.

If we estimate our present population at forty-three millions, we find that we have now per capita, $14.58; while England has about $24.28, Germany $24.80, and France $34.72.

Owing to the unjust and unequal distribution of the national-bank issues New England has about thirty dollars per capita, while the West has but about seven dollars, and the South less than three dollars. This all comes of the pernicious legislation of Congress.

It is not at all wise for Congress to undertake to limit the circulation of the money of the people, nor to make divisions of it among the States. Because we have no means of knowing what amount of currency is needed, in making the distribution among the States it seems that by some hook or crook New England got the lion's share of this as well as all other favors at the disposal of the party in power. Hence it is that New England and all those who are controlled by their interest in national banks are opposed to disturbing this system of currency, or to such a modification of it as will give more money to the people.

The South and West are borrowers from the older States, and went in debt at a time when the circulation of the country was nearly double what it is now. Hence it is no mystery that the one should desire more money, and why the latter should insist on a policy of contraction. New England wants gold or its equivalent for the greenbacks she loaned when gold was from 25 to 50 per cent. premium.

The West and South, being sparsely settled and yet to be developed, should have more money per capita than the older-settled States; but under congressional rule the reverse is the case. The whole financial system ought to be so amended as to allow the people to regulate for themselves the amount of currency to be placed in circulation. Until this is done we shall have financial panics, wild speculation on the probabilities of the legislation of Congress upon the financial question, whether it is to be expansion or contraction. The business of the country is now paralyzed and stagnant, because of the uncertainty of our legislation on this subject. The whole matter of the volume of currency should be regulated, as before stated, by the laws of supply and demand.

Mr. Speaker, I have offered these crude and hasty remarks upon the great questions that now agitate the people of the West and South, and in which my constituents are vitally interested. Cheap transportation to the sea-board, and a currency stable in volume and amply expanded to meet a populous and growing country, is what they demand. At least that is my honest conviction of their true interest; and I should do less than what I conceive to be my whole duty did I not place their case before this Congress, and ask for them at least a respectful hearing. I shall continue to demand these measures, unless I shall be differently instructed by those who sent me here.

Mr. Speaker, I have said thus much upon the general subjects of transportation and currency. I come now to the particular bill under consideration.

This bill proposes to place, directly and immediately, under the control of the appointing power of the President, the regulation of all the railroads of the country, constituting over two billions of property.

The proposition is at once startling, and is equaled in audacity of conception and reckless departure from all former legislation of Congress only by the recommendation of the Chief Magistrate himself, in his last annual message, that palatial mansions should be erected here at the expense of the people for the accommodation of their servants.

When and where shall end this greed for centralized power and regal pretensions of this Administration?

Mr. Speaker, when I voted some time ago for a resolution directing the committee that reported this bill to report a bill having in view the regulation of this species of commerce, I then supposed that a measure having that object in view would be brought forward, but I am astounded at the result.

Here we find a bill that, whatever may be the intentions of its authors, will have no other effect than to place at the disposal and patronage of a political party the whole power of the railroad corporations of the country. Shall we have in this country a coalescence of political and corporate monopoly, that will rule the people as with a rod of iron? For one I solemnly protest against such a corrupt union.

When this Administration, under the lead of one who has been accused by a lamented founder of the party as aiming at Cæsarism in this Government, shall have thus seized the control of the vast railroad interests of the country, to be followed by a like seizure of the whole system of telegraphs, as recommended by one of his Cabinet officers, the country has just cause to be alarmed. Indeed, when this act of Cæsarism and centralism shall have been accomplished, the people may as well take a long farewell of not only all hope of cheap transportation, but of their liberties as well. When shall this deception cease?

Under the name and pretext of reconstruction States were reduced to mere dependencies, stripped of their political liberties, and despoiled of their property. Having accomplished the plunder of States and their subjection to the political control of the Administration, the next step is, under the name of cheap transportation, to take possession of the railroads and telegraphs throughout the country, and run them in the interest of Cæsarism.

The people ask for bread, but you give them a stone. They ask to have their water-ways improved and made available for competition with these roads, thus securing cheap transportation, permanantly and effectually. But this demand is met by a proposition to turn into political machines the vast power of these railways.

I am in favor of regulating these roads, and would go to the very verge of constitutional power for that purpose; but I cannot support this bill in its present shape. Why not allow it to be amended, so as to permit these commissioners to be elected by the people instead of being appointed by the President? Or, what would answer the same purpose, let the governors of the several States, elected by the people, constitute the board of commissioners, and give to the State courts concurrent jurisdiction with the Federal courts in all cases where citizens of the particular State may be a party to any suit arising under the provisions of the bill.

Stripped of centralism and Cæsarism, I would support any measure that would give a reasonable guarantee of regulating these roads in the interest of cheap transportation. As a political grab I protest against it.

From the indications here I am led to the conclusion that the railroad managers are desirous for the passage of the bill in its present shape, in order that there may be a combination of railroad and political power—the republican party to rule the country and the railways to rule the republican party; thus forming a political and railroad monopoly, to serve which the people would be but serfs, "the hewers of wood and drawers of water."

Mr. Speaker, I desire the regulation of these roads in the interest of the people, and at the proper time, if allowed, I desire to offer amendments to the bill that in my opinion will accomplish this result.

Mr. WHITEHEAD obtained the floor, but yielded to

Mr. POLAND, who moved that the House take a recess until half-past seven o'clock this evening.

The SPEAKER pro tempore stated that under the order of the House the session this evening would be for the purpose of proceeding with the codification of the laws, and that Mr. ALBRIGHT, of Pennsylvania, would occupy the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

The motion of Mr. POLAND was agreed to; and accordingly (at four o'clock and forty-five minutes p. m.) the House took a recess till half-past seven p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The House reasssembled at half-past seven o'clock p. m., Mr. ALBRIGHT in the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

REVISION OF THE STATUTES.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House meets this evening to resume the consideration of the bill reported from the Committee on Revision of the Laws of the United States. It is entitled "A bill (H. R. No. 1215) to revise and consolidate the statutes of the United States in force on the 1st day of December, A. D. 1873."

Mr. SAYLER, of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, my work to-night begins at title 58, "The public health," page 1232. This title is substantially the act of the 25th of February, 1799, respecting quarantines and health laws, and is found in the first volume of the Statutes at Large, page 619. It is only changed in the arrangement and order of the sections, somewhat in its words to meet the present condition of affairs, but not at all in its meaning. I have, therefore, no amendment to suggest to it.

The next is title 59, "Hospitals, asylums, and cemeteries," chapter 1, "Hospital relief for seamen." I have examined carefully, compared with this revision the several original acts of which it is made up, and have no amendment to suggest to the title except the following to section 4876.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 1236, section 4876, in lines two and three, strike out the words "officer, warrant officer, petty officer, seaman, ordinary seaman, fireman, and coal-heaver," and in lieu thereof insert the words "officer, seaman, and marine," so it will read:

SEC. 4876. The Secretary of the Navy shall deduct from the pay due each officer, seaman, and marine, in the Navy, at the rate of twenty cents per month for each person, to be applied to the fund for Navy hospitals.

Mr. SAYLER, of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, the reason for that amendment is this: the words suggested are the precise words of the act of March 2, 1799, and are the same words everywhere else used throughout this title, or chapter 1 of this title.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SAYLER, of Ohio. Chapter 2 of this title, "The Soldiers' Home," is a codification of the acts of March 3, 1851, March 3, 1859, and July 5, 1862. I have compared the text with the original acts, and find no amendment to suggest.

Chapter 3, "The National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers," is a codification of the acts passed on the 21st March, 1866, and the 23d January, 1873. I have also compared this revision with the original acts, and find no amendment to suggest.

Chapter 4, "The Government Hospital for the Insane," is a codification of the acts of March 3, 1855, February 7, 1857, February 28, 1861, and July 16, 1866. I have an amendment to offer to section 4907.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 4907. The chief executive officer of the Hospital for the Insane shall be a superintendent, who shall be appointed by the Secretary of the Interior, and shall be entitled to a salary of $2,500 a year, and shall give bond for the faithful performance of his duties, in such sum and with such securities as may be required by the Secretary of the Interior. The superintendent shall be a well-educated physician, possessing competent experience in the care and treatment of the insane; he shall reside on the premises, and devote his whole time to the welfare of the institution; he shall, subject to the approval of the visitors, engage and discharge all needful and usual employés in the care of the insane, and all laborers on the farm, and determine their wages and duties; he shall be the responsible disbursing agent of the institution.

Mr. SAYLER, of Ohio. I offer the following amendment. Add at the end of the section the following words:

And shall be ex officio secretary of the Board of Visitors.

This is found in the original act, and we see no reason for its omission.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SAYLER, of Ohio. The only other changes that are made in this chapter are to adapt the language to the present form of the government of the District of Columbia, and are found in section 4918. In the fifth line of that section the words, "the governor of the District," are substituted for the words in the original, "the corporate authorities of the city of Washington and of Georgetown." And so elsewhere there are changes of this kind made, pertaining to the courts; they are made so as to correspond to the present form of the government of the District, and hence the language is supposed by the committee to be just as it ought to be in this revision.

Chapter 5, "The Columbia Institution for the Deaf and Dumb," is a codification of six acts passed from 1857 to 1870. There are no changes in this chapter except those which are of the same character as I have just suggested in connection with the previous chapter. I have no amendment to offer to it.

Chapter 6, "National cemeteries," is a codification of acts from 1862 to 1873. I have compared the text here with those acts, and have no amendment to suggest.

This, Mr. Speaker, is all the portion of the work that I have to present to-night.

Mr. POLAND. I now yield to my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. MOORE.]

Mr. MOORE. The portion of the work assigned to me commences with title 38, "The currency," on page 930. The first amendment I have to offer is to section 3632.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 3632. The whole amount of notes for the fractions of a dollar, issued as currency, shall not, at any time, exceed $50,000,000.

Mr. MOORE. I offer the following amendment:

In line 1 insert the words "or stamps" after the word "notes."

That is the language of the original act.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MOORE. The next amendment I have to offer is to section 3636.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 3636. No portrait hereafter engraved shall be placed upon any of the bonds, securities, notes, fractional or postal currency of the United States while the original of such portrait is living.

Mr. MOORE. I offer the following amendment:

In line 1 strike out the words, "hereafter engraved."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MOORE. The next amendment I have to offer is to section 3639.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 3639. When any United States notes are returned to the Treasury, they may be reissued, from time to time, as the exigencies of the public service may require.

Mr. MOORE. I offer the following amendment:

In line 3 strike out the word "service," and insert the word "interests" in lieu thereof.

That is the language of the original act.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MOORE. My next amendment is to section 3679.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 3679. All proceeds of sales of old material, condemned stores, supplies, or other public property of any kind, except the proceeds of the sale or leasing of marine hospitals, or of the sales of revenue-cutters, or of the sales of commissary stores to the officers and enlisted men of the Army, or of the sale of condemned Navy clothing, or of sales of materials, stores, or supplies by any exploring or surveying expedition authorized by law, shall be deposited and covered into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts, on account of "proceeds of Government property," and shall not be withdrawn or applied, except in consequence of a subsequent appropriation made by law.

Mr. MOORE. I offer the following amendment:

In line 6, strike out the word "by," after the word "supplies," and insert the word "to;" so that it will read, "supplies to any exploring or surveying expedition."

That is the language of the original act.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MOORE. My next amendment is to section 3721.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 3721. The heads of Departments, in communicating estimates of expenditures and appropriations to Congress, or to any of the committees thereof, shall specify, as nearly as may be convenient, the sources from which such estimates are derived and the calculations upon which they are founded, and shall discriminate between such estimates as are conjectural in their character and such as are framed upon actual information and applications from disbursing officers. He shall also give references to any law or treaty by which the proposed expenditures are, respectively, authorized, specifying the date of each, and the volume and page of the Statutes at Large, or of the Revised Statutes, as the case may be, and the section of the act in which the authority is to be found.

Mr. MOORE. I offer the following amendment:

In line 8 strike out the word "he," at the commencement of the sentence, and insert the word "they" in its place.

This change is necessary because the reference is to heads of Departments.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MOORE. My next amendment is to section 3753.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 3753. All moneys received from the leasing or sale of marine hospitals, or the sale of revenue-cutters, or from the sale of commissary stores to the officers and enlisted men of the Army, or from sales of condemned clothing of the Navy, or from sales of materials, stores, or supplies by any exploring or surveying expedition authorized by law, shall respectively revert to that appropriation out of which they were originally expended, and shall be applied to the purposes for which they are appropriated by law.

Mr. MOORE. I offer the following amendment:

In line 5 strike out the word "by" after the word "supplies," and insert the word "to" in its place; so it will read, "supplies to any exploring or surveying expedition."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MOORE. My next amendment is to section 3768.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 3768. When any officer or agent duly authorized to receive, redeem, or cancel any Treasury notes issued under acts passed prior to August 10, 1846, shall receive, or pay, any Treasury note which has been previously received or redeemed by any officer or agent having authority to receive or redeem such note, and which has subsequently thereto been purloined and put into circulation, the Secretary of the Treasury, upon full and satisfactory proof that the same has been received or paid in good faith, and in the exercise of ordinary prudence, may allow a credit for the amount of such note, to the officer or agent so receiving or paying the same.

Mr. MOORE. I offer the following amendment:

In lines 2 and 3 strike out the words "under acts passed prior to August 10, 1846," and insert in their stead the words "by authority of law."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MOORE. I move to strike out section 3772.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 3772. It shall be the duty of each of the Executive Departments of the Government to publish in one of the daily newspapers in the city of Washington, on Tuesday of each week, a list of all contracts which have been solicited or proposed to it during the week next preceding The list shall state briefly the subject-matter of each contract so solicited or proposed to be made, its terms, the name of the proposed contractor and of all persons known to be interested therein, directly or indirectly, and of all persons who solicit, request, or recommend the making of any such contract.

Mr. MOORE. I move to strike out that section altogether, for the reason that it appears to be obsolete in operation.

The motion to strike out the section was agreed to.

Mr. MOORE. These are all the amendments I have to suggest.

Mr. POLAND. I now yield to my colleague on the committee, from Indiana, [Mr. CASON.]

Mr. CASON. The first amendment I have to offer is to section 4728.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 4728. No light-house, beacon, or landmark shall be built or erected on any site until cession of jurisdiction over the same has been made to the United States.

Mr. CASON. I offer the following amendment:

In line 1, after the word "beacon," insert the words "public piers."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CASON. My next amendment is to section 4736.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 4736. The Light-House Board, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall prescribe, and from time to time may alter or amend, such regulations as they deem proper for securing an efficient, uniform, and economical administration of the light-house establishment.

Mr. CASON. I offer the following amendment:

In line 3, after the word "amend," add the following words: "and cause to be distributed."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CASON. The next and last amendment I have to offer is to section 4752.

The section is as follows:

SEC. 4752. The President is authorized, in executing the provisions of this title, to use all maps, charts, books, instruments, and apparatus belonging to the United States, and to employ all persons in the land or naval service of the United States, and such astronomers and other persons as he shall deem proper.

Mr. CASON. I move to insert after the words "United States," in the third line, these words: "and to direct where the same shall be deposited."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I desire to offer an amendment to section 649.

The section is as follows:

SEC. 649. When a suit is removed for trial from a State court to a circuit court, as provided in paragraph 1 of section 642, and in such of the foregoing sections as relate to the removal of causes for the purpose of protecting all persons in the United States in their civil rights, and to furnish the means of their vindication, any attachment of the goods or estate of the defendant by the original process shall hold the same to answer the final judgment, in the same manner as by the laws of such State they would have been held to answer final judgment had it been rendered by the court in which the suit was commenced. In the other cases mentioned in the foregoing sections, besides the previous provisions of this section; and any injunction granted before the removal of the cause against the defendant applying for its removal shall continue in force until modified or dissolved by the United States court into which the cause is removed; and any bond of indemnity or other obligation, given by the plaintiff upon the issuing or granting of any attachment, writ of injunction, or other restraining process, against the defendant petitioning for the removal of the cause, shall also continue in full force, and may be prosecuted by the defendant and made available for his indemnity in case the attachment, injunction, or other restraining process, be set aside or dissolved, or judgment be rendered in his favor, in the same manner and with the same effect as if such attachment, injunction, or other restraining process had been granted, and such bond had been originally filed or given, in such State court.

Mr. POLAND. I move to strike out that section, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

SEC. —. When a suit is removed for trial from a State court to a circuit court, as provided in the foregoing sections, any attachment of goods or estate of the defendant by the original process shall hold the same to answer the final judgment, in the same manner as by the laws of such State they would have been held to answer final judgment had it been rendered by the court in which the suit was commenced; and any injunction granted before the removal of the cause against the defendant applying for its removal shall continue in force until modified or dissolved by the United States court into which the cause is removed; and any bond of indemnity or other obligation, given by the plaintiff upon the issuing or granting of any attachment, writ of injunction, or other restraining process, against the defendant petitioning for the removal of the cause, shall also continue in full force, and may be prosecuted by the defendant and made available for his indemnity in case the attachment, injunction, or other restraining process be set aside or dissolved, or judgment be rendered in his favor, in the same manner and with the same effect as if such attachment, injunction, or other restraining process had been granted, and such bond had been originally filed or given, in such State court.

The section that we propose to insert is the section as it was drawn by the commissioners. It has been changed to some extent by Mr. Durant, and the committee think that the section as drawn by Mr. Durant is liable to some misapprehensions. They prefer the original section as it was revised by the commissioners, and the section that we propose to insert is an exact draught of that prepared by the commissioners.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. The next section which I desire to amend is section 3039.

The section is as follows:

SEC. 3039. All duties upon imports shall be collected in ready money, without giving credit therefor.

Mr. POLAND. I move to strike out the words "without giving credit therefor," and to insert at the end of the section the words "and shall be paid in coin or in United States notes payable on demand, authorized to be issued prior to the 25th day of February, 1862, and by law receivable in payment of public dues."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I move to strike out section 3040, as follows:

SEC. 3040. The several collectors are authorized, under such regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury, whenever they shall deem it necessary to protect and secure the revenue of the United States against frauds or undervaluation, and whenever the same is practicable, to take payment of the amount of duties chargeable upon any article bearing an ad valorem rate of duty, in the article itself, according to the proportion or rate per cent. of the duty on such article. The collector shall cause merchandise, so taken, to be sold at public auction within twenty days from the time of taking the same, in the manner prescribed in this title, and place the proceeds arising from such sale in the Treasury of the United States. But the collector or appraiser shall not be allowed any fees or commissions for taking and disposing of such merchandise, and paying the proceeds thereof into the Treasury, other than are now allowed by law.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I move that section 3122, and all the remaining sections of that chapter, up to and including section 3128, be transferred to page 749, to come in after section 3038.

Those sections are all correct, but they all relate to transportation of merchandise in bond, and they have been placed in the chapter relating to drawbacks of duties, and improperly so placed, as the committee think. They propose, therefore, to transfer them to the end of the chapter in relation to bonded warehouses and transportation in bond.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. The next amendment I desire to offer is to section 2595.

The section is as follows:

SEC. 2595. There shall be in the collection districts of Wisconsin the following officers:

First. In the district of Superior, a collector, who shall reside at Marquette, a deputy collector who shall reside at Sault Sainte Marie, and a deputy collector who shall reside at Mackinaw.

Second. In the district of Milwaukee, a collector and an appraiser, who shall reside at Milwaukee, and a deputy collector at each of the ports of Southport, Racine, Sheboygan, Green Bay, and Depère.

Mr. POLAND. I move in line 8 to strike out "Southport" and insert "Kenosha."

The same word occurs twice on the same page. We have already changed it in one place, but in the other place we omitted to make the change. The name of the place has been changed from Southport to Kenosha.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. The next amendment is to section 2673. An amendment was made to that section on a former evening by adding to the section, and we desire now to withdraw that amendment. The provision that was inserted there is a provision of the statutes, but we find it in another place. At the beginning of our work we had no index, and hence we did not notice it. It is already in its appropriate place. I move to strike out the amendment formerly adopted.

The amendment formerly made and now proposed to be stricken out is as follows:

Add at end of section 2673:

Collectors and surveyors of the collection districts on the northern, northeastern, and northwestern frontiers are authorized to keep on sale, at their several offices, blank manifests and clearances required for the business of their districts, and to charge the sum of ten cents, and no more, for each blank which shall be prepared and executed by them.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. The next amendment is to section 2740.

The section is as follows:

SEC. 2740. Whenever the emoluments of any surveyor, other than those named in the preceding section, shall exceed $2,000 in any one year, after deducting therefrom the necessary expenses incident to his office in the same year, the excess shall be paid into the Treasury for the use of the United States. And no surveyor shall, on any pretense whatever, in the aggregate, receive, or retain for himself, more than $4,500 a year, including all commissions or fees or emoluments, or any other commissions or salaries which are now allowed and limited by law; but each surveyor shall be entitled to a maximum compensation of $4,500 a year, out of any and all fees and emoluments by him received.

Mr. POLAND. I move to amend that section by adding to it the following:

And when any surveyor shall perform the duties of collector, he shall be entitled to the same compensation as is allowed to a collector for like services, and shall be subject to the same limitations.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. The next amendment is to section 2859.

The section is as follows:

SEC. 2859. The collector at the port of entry shall permit no entry to be made of merchandise, where the duty on the same shall exceed the amount of the bond deposited with the surveyor, nor shall the surveyor receive the bond of any person not entitled to a credit at the custom-house, nor for a sum less than fifty dollars. When the bond has been completed, and the actual amount of duty ascertained and certified on the margin, the surveyor of the port where the bond is taken shall deposit the same for collection in such bank as may be directed by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. POLAND. I move to strike out all after the word "shall," in line 8, as follows: "deposit the same for collection in such bank as may be directed by the Secretary of the Treasury;" and insert in lieu thereof the words "collect said duties and pay the same into the Treasury of the United States;" and to strike out, after the word "person," in line 4, the words "not entitled to a credit at the custom-house, nor."

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. The next amendment is to section 3137.

The section is as follows:

SEC. 3137. If any collector, naval officer, surveyor, or other person especially appointed by either of them, or inspector, shall have cause to suspect a concealment of any merchandise in any particular dwelling-house, they, or either of them, upon proper application on oath to any justice of the peace, shall be entitled to a warrant to enter such house, in the day-time only, and there to search for such merchandise; and if any shall be found, to seize and secure the same for trial; and all such merchandise on which the duties shall not have been paid, or secured to be paid, shall be forfeited.

Mr. POLAND. I move to insert after the word "dwelling-house," in line 4, the words "store, building, or other place," and also to insert after the word "house," in line 6, the words "store or other place."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. The next amendment is to section 2989.

The section is as follows:

SEC. 2989. No leases shall be entered into by the United States for any warehouses for the storage of warehoused or unclaimed merchandise at any port where there may exist any private bonded warehouses.

Mr. POLAND. I move to amend that section by adding to it the following:

Provided, That such buildings may be leased as may be required for the use of appraisers for the examination and appraisal of imported merchandise at the ports where such officers are provided by law; and the collectors may lease for short periods at any of the smaller ports such stores as may be required for custom-house purposes, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I now move that sections 2964, 2965, and 2966 be transferred to page 779, to come in after section 3164.

I will state that these sections contain the provisions of the act passed three or four years ago, authorizing the seizures of books and papers by customs officers, under the order of a judge, which just now is making so much disturbance in the world. The sections were inserted correctly by the revisers, but they were put into the chapter in relation to appraisers, and we think they properly belong to the chapter containing provisions for the enforcement of the collection laws and the collection of duties. We therefore propose to make the transfer. The laws are properly transcribed, but they were placed in the wrong place.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I move to strike out section 3171.

The section is as follows:

SEC. 3171. Any deputy collector stationed in any district of the customs contigu ous to a foreign territory, to whom a manifest of merchandise, subject to duty, shall be delivered, is hereby authorized to require of the importer of such merchandise the payment of the duties thereon, or good and ample security, either by bond, with one or more sufficient sureties, for the payment thereof, or by the deposit of a portion of such merchandise, equal, at least, to double the amount of the duties on the whole importation; which bond shall be canceled, or the merchandise so deposited shall be delivered to the owner, on the producing to the deputy collector a certificate of the collector of the district that the duties have been duly paid.

Mr. POLAND. That section contains the provisions of an old law in relation to taking security for the payment of duties. All the recent provisions of law upon that subject require the duties to be paid immediately, and without giving any credit whatever. We think they repeal these earlier provisions, which provided for giving security.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. The next section to which I desire to offer an amendment is section 3176.

The section is as follows:

SEC. 3176. If the owner, master, or person in charge of any vessel, car, or other vehicle so sealed, shall not proceed to the port of destination thereof named in the manifest of its cargo, freight, or contents, and deliver such vessel, car, or vehicle to the proper officer of the customs, or shall dispose of the same by sale or otherwise, or shall unload the same, or any part thereof, at any other such port, or shall sell or dispose of the contents of such vessel, car, or other vehicle, or any part thereof, before such delivery, he shall be deemed guilty of felony, and on conviction thereof, before any court of competent jurisdiction, pay a fine not exceeding $1,000, or shall be imprisoned for a term not exceeding five years, or both, at the discretion of the court; and such vessel, car, or other vehicle, with its contents, shall be forfeited to the United States, and may be seized wherever found within the United States, and disposed of and sold as in other cases of forfeiture. Nothing in this section, however, shall be construed to prevent sales of cargo, in whole or in part, prior to arrival, to be delivered as per manifest, and after due inspection.

Mr. POLAND. I move to amend that section by inserting after the word "port," in line 2, the words "or place;" also, by inserting after the word "port," in line 6, the words "or place."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. The next amendment I have to offer is to section 3194.

The section is as follows:

SEC. 3194. The master of any vessel so enrolled or licensed, destined with cargo from a place in the United States, at which there may be no custom-house, to a port where there may be a custom-house, shall, within twenty-four hours after arrival at the port of destination, deliver to the proper officer of the customs a manifest, subscribed by him, setting forth the cargo laden at the place of departure, or laden or unladen at any intermediate port, to the truth of which manifest he shall make oath before such officer. If the vessel, however, have no cargo, the master shall not be required to deliver such manifest.

Mr. POLAND. In line 7, after the word "port," I move to insert the words "or place."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. The next amendment I have to offer is to section 5508.

The section is as follows:

SEC. 5508. If two or more persons conspire to defraud the United States in any manner or for any purpose, and one or more of such parties do any act to effect the object of the conspiracy, all the parties to such conspiracy shall be liable to a penalty of not less than $1,000 and not more than $10,000, and to imprisonment not more than two years.

Mr. POLAND. I move to amend that section by inserting after the word "conspire" the words "either to commit any offense against the United States or."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. The next amendment I have to offer is to section 5516.

The section is as follows:

SEC. 5516. Every person who falsely represents himself to be a revenue officer, and, in such assumed character, demands or receives any money or other article of value from any person for any duty or tax due to the United States, or for any violation or pretended violation of any revenue law of the United States, shall be fined $500, and imprisoned at hard labor not less than six months and not more than two years.

Mr. POLAND. I move to insert at the end of line 5 of that section, after the words "shall be," the words "deemed guilty of a felony, and shall be;" and in line 6 I move to strike out the words "at hard labor."

I will state, in reference to this amendment, that our criminal statutes have all sorts of provisions, without much regard to propriety. Some of them say that a person who does so and so shall be deemed guilty of a felony; others say that he shall be deemed guilty of a high crime and misdemeanor; others that he shall be deemed guilty of a high misdemeanor; others that he shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor; and they provide a certain punishment. I apprehend that the legal consequences are not changed by the use of either word, except that by possibility in some States, by the laws of the States, a man may be excluded from testifying or excluded from voting, if he has been found guilty of a felony. And, therefore, it may be of some consequence, because, wherever an offense is declared by law to be a felony, it would have a different legal consequence from what it would have if the offense were merely declared to be a misdemeanor, or were not declared to be a felony.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. The next section to which I wish to offer an amendment is section 5518.

The section is as follows:

SEC. 5518. Every person who promises, offers, gives, or causes or procures to be promised, offered, or given, any money or other thing of value, or makes or tenders any contract, undertaking, obligation, gratuity, or security for the payment of money, or for the delivery or conveyance of anything of value, to any member of either House of Congress, either before or after such member has been qualified or has taken his seat, with intent to influence his vote or decision on any question, matter, cause, or proceeding which may be at any time pending in either House of Congress, or before any committee thereof, shall be fined not more than three times the amount of money or value of the thing so offered, promised, given, made, or tendered, or caused or procured to be so offered, promised, given, made, or tendered, and shall be, moreover, imprisoned at hard labor not more than three years.

Mr. POLAND. I move to amend that section by striking out the words "at hard labor," in line 14.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. The next amendment I have to offer is in section 5565.

The section is as follows:

SEC. 5565. Every officer of the United States, or person holding any place of trust or profit, or discharging any official function under, or in connection with, any Executive Department of the Government of the United States, or under the Senate or House of Representatives of the United States, who acts as an agent or attorney for prosecuting any claim against the United States, or in any manner, or by any means, otherwise than in discharge of his proper official duties, aids or assists in the prosecution or support of any such claim, or receives any gratuity, or any share of or interest in any claim from any claimant against the United States, with intent to aid or assist, or in consideration of having aided or assisted, in the prosecution of such claim, shall pay a fine of not more than $5,000, or suffer imprisonment at hard labor not more than one year, or both.

Mr. POLAND. I move to amend by striking out the words "at hard labor," in line 13.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. The next section which I propose to amend is section 5567.

The section is as follows,

SEC. 5567. Any member of either House of Congress who asks, accepts, or receives any money, or any promise, contract, undertaking, obligation, gratuity, or security for the payment of money, or for the delivery or conveyance of anything of value, either before or after he has been qualified or has taken his seat as such member, with intent to have his vote or decision on any question, matter, cause, or proceeding which may be at any time pending in either House, or before any committee thereof, influenced thereby, shall be punished by a fine not more than three times the amount asked, accepted, or received, and by imprisonment at hard labor not more than three years.

Mr. POLAND. I move to amend that section also by striking out the words "at hard labor," in line 10.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I wish now to turn to section 5526.

The section reported from the committee was as follows:

SEC. 5526. Every person who falsely makes, forges, or counterfeits, or causes or procures to be falsely made, forged, or counterfeited, or willingly aids or assists in falsely making, forging, or counterfeiting, any coin in the resemblance or similitude of any of the minor coinage which has been, or hereafter may be, coined at the mints of the United States; or who passes, utters, publishes, or sells, or brings into the United States from any foreign place, or has in his possession, any such false, forged, or counterfeited coin, with intent to defraud any person whatsoever, shall be punished by a fine of not more than $1,000 and by imprisonment at hard labor not more than three years.

Mr. POLAND. Some evenings since there was an amendment adopted to this section, to strike out the words "of the minor coinage," and to insert in lieu "copper coin, or coin composed of copper and other base metal." I am instructed by the committee to now ask that that amendment may be withdrawn.

The reference made in the work of the commissioners to the statutes against counterfeiting coin referred to the earlier statutes, where these words "minor coinage" are not to be found. They were first introduced into an act passed at the last session of the last Congress. Congress seems then to have adopted a short and comprehensive term for all the base-metal coinage, that is, "minor coinage." And that term has been used by the revisers. We think it correct according to the act of the last Congress, which act had not come to the notice of the committee at the time this amendment was made. We therefore ask that the amendment may be withdrawn.

No objection was made.

Mr. POLAND. I move that sections 5613 and 5614 be transposed in order of arrangement.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. My next amendment is to section 522.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 522. The commissioner of public buildings shall furnish proper offices for the use of the Office of Education.

Mr. POLAND. This is a part of the work examined by my colleague from Massachusetts, [Mr. E. R. HOAR.] We had occasion in several places to make the same amendment in relation to public buildings which were formerly under the care of the commissioner of public buildings. We struck out those words in many places where they were found. But in looking over my copy I discovered that I had no note of such an amendment to this section. I move to strike out the words "commissioner of public buildings," and to insert in lieu the words "Chief of Engineers."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. The committee desire to ask an order from the House that they may have printed any of these long written amendments they may deem it advisable to print, for the purpose of making up our volumes. These long manuscript amendments take up much space, and it would be far more convenient to have them printed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Has not such an order already been made?

Mr. POLAND. Such an order has been made in reference to some proposed amendments relating to the District of Columbia, but not in the general terms I now propose. Some of the amendments we have already adopted are quite lengthy, covering several pages of manuscript. It would be much more convenient to have them printed, and we ask to have such an order made.

No objection was made, and it was so ordered.

Mr. POLAND. I believe that is as far as we are prepared to go to-night. We have not occupied a great deal of your time to-night, although it has taken a great deal of time to prepare the work we have presented.

I move that the House now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at eight o'clock and thirty minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, March 19, 1874.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM presented the memorial of Captain Albert G. Clary, United States Navy, asking to be raised from the degradation placed upon him by promotions which took place in July, 1866; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN presented the petition of James T. Barclay, proposing improvements in minting operations so as to prevent abrasion and falsification of coin; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont, presented three petitions of citizens of Illinois, praying the substitution of arbitration as a means of settlement of international differences instead of war; which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. FLANAGAN presented a resolution of the Legislature of Texas in favor of an appropriation to improve the navigation of Soda Lake and Cypress Bayous; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. MORTON presented the petition of John W. Trewitt, of Fort Wayne, Indiana, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented the petition of Andrew Clarke, late private Fifty-third Indiana Volunteers, praying to be reimbursed $950 paid for a substitute when drafted, and from which draft he was not released, but had to serve in person; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also presented the petition of James Calhoun, late second lieutenant Third Indiana Cavalry, praying to be allowed back pay for services as second lieutenant in 1863; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. MORTON. I present a petition of 925 farmers and mechanics of Owen County, Indiana; and as it is short I will read it:

To our Senators and Representatives of Indiana in Congress:

We, the undersigned petitioners, of Owen County, Indiana, believing that some measure should be adopted by Congress to relieve the financial embarrassment of the country, would respectfully petition you to use your influence and urge it upon Congress to pass without delay a bill increasing the volume of currency sufficient to meet the legitimate demands of trade and business.

The petition was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented the petition of Valentine Steiner, postmaster at Knightstown, Indiana, praying to be relieved from liability for postage-stamps destroyed by fire on the night of the 17th of September, 1873; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. SCHURZ presented the petition of Daniel Duffy, a pilot of the Mississippi fleet during the late war, praying additional pay for his services; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. PRATT, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1122) granting a pension to Mrs. Martha E. Northup, widow of First Lieutenant Edward B. Northup, late of the Seventeenth United States Infantry, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon, which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 816) granting a pension to Jane LaFont, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon, which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. PRATT. The same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2099) granting a pension to Mrs. Elizabeth Copeland, direct me to report adversely thereon and move its indefinite postponement. I wish to make a brief explanation as to this bill. This lady is now drawing a pension, and the object of this bill is to give her arrears of pension for several years past. The Senate, during the last four years, since my connection with the Committee on Pensions, has refused to pass bills of that character giving arrears of pensions. It is supposed that it would make a draft of several millions upon the Treasury were Congress at this time to pass a bill of that kind. Still, I understand that the House of Representatives has recently passed a bill—and probably it is on our desks now—granting these arrears. If they are to be granted it should be done by a general bill, and not in exceptional cases. Therefore the committee instruct me to recommend that this present bill be indefinitely postponed.

The bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. SPENCER, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2186) granting an American registry to the American-built Peruvian steamship Rayo, now rebuilt in the United States and converted into a sailing-vessel, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. SPENCER. I am directed by the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2451) to improve the mouth of the Mississippi River, to report the same favorably and ask its immediate consideration.

The bill was read.

Mr. SARGENT. Where does that come from?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Committee on Commerce.

Mr. SAULSBURY. It requires some explanation of the necessity of it.

Mr. SPENCER. This amount is recommended by the Secretary of War. The bill has already passed the House. The appropriation of last year has been exhausted, and this $30,000 is to come out of the appropriations for next year. The Secretary of War reports that the amount of money appropriated heretofore has been expended, and this amount of $30,000 is to be deducted from the amount appropriated in the river and harbor bill for next year.

Mr. SARGENT. Are we certain that there will be any river and harbor bill this year?

Mr. SPENCER. I suppose so.

Mr. SARGENT. There seems to be considerable doubt whether there will be any river and harbor appropriations this year or not. It seems to me it would be better this bill should go over until the river and harbor bill passes, and then make this amount available for the current fiscal year.

Mr. WEST. That is the purpose of this very bill.

Mr. SARGENT. But it is obviously impossible to pass special appropriations for local wants. The river and harbor appropriation bill goes on the theory that there is a general consideration of the wants of the country; and if it may be necessary on that bill to authorize an expenditure during the current fiscal year, it can be so stated in the bill, and certainly that bill, if it pass at all, will pass in time for use during the current fiscal year.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator object to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. SARGENT. I do not wish to make factious opposition, but I think it is a dangerous principle.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. SAULSBURY. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. OGLESBY, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1396) granting a pension to Thomas J. McIntire, of Rowan County, Kentucky, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 503) for the relief of Susan R. Moore, the relative and legatee of Phœbe Schofield, a pensioner, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Margaret A. Hoffner, praying for a pension, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 609) granting a pension to Margaret A. Hoffner. The bill was read and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. DENNIS, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 528) to protect the navigable waters of the United States from injury and obstruction, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1364) to amend the act entitled "An act to regulate the carriage of passengers in steamships and other vessels," approved March 3, 1855, reported it without amendment.

Mr. INGALLS, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 814) granting a pension to Olive S. Breed, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 52) granting a pension to Mary Swift, daughter of Thomas Truxton, deceased, late commodore in the United States Navy, reported adversely thereon, and moved its indefinite postponement; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Elizabeth Haines, a nurse in the United States hospital at Keokuk, Iowa, praying that a pension be granted her for disability contracted in the United States service and in the line of duty, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the committee was discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Texas, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1950) granting a pension to Isaac M. Grant, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Chloe Ann Ketcham, widow of Archer M. Ketcham, deceased, praying for a pension, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the committee was discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine, from the Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 489) authorizing the President of the United States to purchase a site for a coaling station, Navy depot, and other governmental uses, at Fort Point, Port Royal, Beaufort County, South Carolina, and making an appropriation for said purchase, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs; which was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. HAGER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 610) to authorize the correction of the boundaries of certain lands in California; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims, and ordered to be printed.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 611) for the relief of settlers on certain lands in the State of California; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HAGER. I introduce these bills by the request of certain parties who feel aggrieved in consequence of the surveys made under old Spanish grants. There has been a controversy existing for some time in California, growing out of disputed boundaries, the settlers claiming that the ranch boundaries have been extended beyond what the courts authorized by the surveys made under the authority of the United States; and in this way they have, as settlers, been deprived of their possessions by what they allege are illegal and fraudulent surveys made under Government authority. These bills I have introduced at the request of parties in interest, and I desire to state that I do not commit myself either for or against them, because I am not sufficiently informed as to the matter in controversy, but introduce them for the reason that I feel it my duty to introduce a bill that is respectful on its face, relating to a proper subject of legislation, when requested to do so by my constituents.

Mr. HAGER also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 612) for the relief of Jacob Vogt, James Malone, Joseph Schalter, John W. Martin, William H. Huff, Ephraim Chaquette, S. A. Densmore, and George F. L. Quelet; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

FUR-BEARING ANIMALS IN ALASKA.

Mr. DENNIS. I ask for the consideration of a bill I reported yesterday, in relation to the extermination of fur-bearing animals in Alaska.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 2225) to amend the act entitled "An act to prevent the extermination of fur-bearing animals in Alaska," approved July 1, 1870.

The bill proposes to amend the act of July 1, 1870, so as to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to designate the months in which fur-seals may be taken for their skins on the islands of Saint Paul and Saint George, in Alaska, and in the waters adjacent thereto, and the number to be taken on or about each island respectively.

Mr. DAVIS. I should like to know whether that bill comes from a committee. It relates to a very important question.

Mr. DENNIS. I reported the bill yesterday from the Committee on Commerce. I ask for its present consideration from the fact that it is urged by the Secretary of the Treasury, as ships are about to leave San Francisco on the 5th of next month, and it is necessary for them to have this information that they may act accordingly.

Mr. DAVIS. Is there a written report in the case?

Mr. SARGENT. I understand it is a House bill.

Mr. CHANDLER. If the Senator from West Virginia will permit me, I will say that it is believed to be very important that this bill should pass at once, as vessels sailing for Alaska leave on the 5th of next month, and there is very little time to make the arrangements.

Mr. DAVIS. I ask the Senator from Michigan, what is the necessity of the bill, and what change is wanted in the present law?

Mr. CHANDLER. The present law compels them to kill twenty-five thousand seals on the island of Saint George and seventy-five thousand on the island of Saint Paul. There are one-thirtieth as many seals on the island of Saint George as on the island of Saint Paul; and it is exterminating the seals on the smaller island while it is leaving a large excess on the larger. It was a mistake in the original bill, which is herein corrected.

Mr. DAVIS. Does it change the amount to be paid into the Treasury from that source?

Mr. CHANDLER. It does not at all. It leaves an option with the Secretary of the Treasury. He may if he sees fit, if in the experience of seal killing it should be found not to interfere at all with the present number of seals, increase the number from time to time on the larger island and diminish it on the smaller.

Mr. DAVIS. Is it the intention of the bill to leave a discretionary power with the Secretary of the Treasury to change the price paid?

Mr. CHANDLER. Not at all; there is no change whatever in that respect.

Mr. DAVIS. Then I have no objection.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ENGINEERS AND PILOTS.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move to take up for consideration the bill (S. No. 580) to authorize the employment of certain aliens as engineers and pilots.

Mr. SHERMAN. I give notice that after this bill is disposed of, I shall insist on the regular order.

Mr. CHANDLER. I hope this bill will be passed, as it is very important.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 580) to authorize the employment of certain aliens as engineers and pilots, was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that any alien who, in the manner provided for by law, has declared his intention to become a citizen of the United States, may be licensed, as if already naturalized, to serve as an engineer or pilot upon any steam-vessel subject to inspection under the provisions of the act entitled "An act to provide for the better security of life on board of vessels propelled in whole or in part by steam and for other purposes," approved February 28, 1871.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SUBMERGING THE COLORADO AND MOHAVE DESERTS.

Mr. JONES. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be, and they hereby are, instructed to inquire into the expediency of directing a survey to be made by Government engineers, with a view of determining the feasibility of submerging the Colorado and Mohave deserts and Death Valley, and of reporting the probable effect of such submersion upon the climate and the agricultural and commercial interests of the adjacent country in the States of California and Nevada, and the Territory of Arizona.

Mr. President, I desire to state that two or three gentlemen at their own expense caused quite an elaborate survey to be made of the desert of Colorado during the last season by several engineers of considerable experience, and regarded on the Pacific slope as being men of great attainments. Their reports are handed in with this resolution, and I ask, for the information of the Senate and for the instruction of the committee, that those reports, which I submit, be printed.

Mr. WEST. I have no objection to make to the reference that the Senator proposes on this subject, and yet it seems to me that the Committee on Commerce is scarcely the proper committee to refer such a question to. It is a question involving the irrigation of the public lands of the United States, and in my opinion it more properly belongs to the Committee on Public Lands. I merely throw out the suggestion, without any intention of making any change in the Senator's proposition, but I do not see that it pertains particularly to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. JONES. I am not particular to what committee it is referred. I desire the investigation.

Mr. WEST. Then I move to amend by striking out "the Committee on Commerce," and inserting "the Committee on Public Lands."

Mr. JONES. I accept the amendment.

The resolution as modified was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The accompanying papers will be printed if there be no objection. The Chair hears no objection, and that order is made.

CAPTURE AND KILLING OF INDIANS.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed to communicate to the Senate any information in his possession, or that may be obtainable through Indian inspectors, superintendents, and agents, as to the number of Indians, including women and children, who have been taken as captives or killed by United States troops during the year 1873, and particularly under what circumstances so captured or killed, and upon whose order, or for what cause, and whether or not upon their reservations, as well as the tribes to which at the time they severally belonged; also, the number and description of citizens and soldiers killed by Indians during the same period; also, that he make like inquiry for the six months ending June 30, 1874, and report to Congress in December next.

INDIAN AGENCIES IN NEVADA.

Mr. STEWART submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be requested to inform the Senate if any inspector has visited the several Indian agencies in Nevada; and, if so, furnish the Senate with a copy of the report upon each agency; also what Indian reservations have been made in Nevada, where, and by whom, and also at whose instance the reservation on the Muddy, in the southeastern part of the State, was made, the extent of the same, and how many settlers there were thereon at the time said reservation was made; and also who are the agents and sub-agents employed in said State, and what portion of the past year each has actually resided on the reservation in his charge.

AMENDMENT TO AN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SPENCER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. No. 1009) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

BISHOP & CO.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report the first bill on the Calendar.

The CHIEF CLERK. The first bill on the Calendar is the bill (S. No. 272) for the relief of Bishop & Co., bankers, of Honolulu, Hawaiian Islands.

Mr. SHERMAN. The answer to the communication of the Senator from Michigan has not been received, and I ask that that bill be passed over informally without displacing it. Let it stand at the head of the Calendar until the answer is received.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be laid aside.

CHEYENNE WATER-SUPPLY.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1756) to amend the act entitled "An act to withdraw from settlement and sale a certain section of land in Wyoming Territory," approved May 23, 1872; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to amend the first section of the act of May 23, 1870, so that it shall read as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the north half and the southeast quarter of section 30, in township 14 north, of range 66 west, of the public lands in Laramie County, Wyoming Territory, be, and the same are hereby, withdrawn from settlement and sale under existing laws, and reserved for the use of the city of Cheyenne, in said county, for the purpose of enabling the proper authorities of said city to construct and maintain on said land a reservoir of water for the supply of said city.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Where did that bill come from?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I would ask the Senator reporting it how much land is involved?

Mr. KELLY. Three-fourths of a section. It is simply to amend and perfect the law heretofore passed making the grant.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

METROPOLITAN POLICE.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 304) relative to the Metropolitan police of the District of Columbia.

Mr. DAVIS. Is there any report in that case?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is no written report with the bill.

Mr. DAVIS. I think it had better go over. The Senator who reported it is not here.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be laid aside.

PRAIRIE BAND OF POTTAWATOMIES.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 221) to fund the sum due the Prairie band of Pottawatomie Indians, under the provisions of the treaty of February 27, 1867, and to transfer and fund any sum which may be found due from the Citizens' band of Pottawatomies to the Prairie band, according to an agreement entered into between said bands July 18, 1873, and to use both principal and interest for the civilization of said Indians; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill requires the Secretary of the Interior to invest any sum found due the Prairie band of Pottawatomies in bonds of the United States, bearing 5 per cent. interest, which sum thus invested shall hereafter be used by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, both principal and interest, for the benefit of those Indians, for their civilization, in such way and at such times as may be authorized by the President of the United States. It further provides that any sum of money which may be found due from the Citizens' band of Pottawatomies to the Prairie band, according to an agreement entered into between those bands, at the office of the superintendent of Indian affairs in Kansas, July 18, 1873, may be transferred from the amount to the credit of the Citizens' band and placed to the credit of the Prairie band, and when so transferred the same shall be invested by the Secretary of the Interior in United States bonds, bearing interest at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum, and shall be regarded as a fund for the civilization of the Prairie band, to be used by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, both principal and interest, for their civilization, under the direction and by the authority of the President of the United States.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PLACER-MINING LANDS IN CALIFORNIA.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 405) relating to the placer-mining lands in the State of California; which was read at length.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. This seems to be a reversal of the whole system pursued since the foundation of the Government. I object to the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. SARGENT. I should like to say that it is not a reversal of any principle heretofore adopted.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I am willing to hear an explanation of it, but I suggest to the Senator from California that this is too important a bill to be passed in the morning hour.

Mr. SARGENT. I am willing to take it up at any time when we can consider it; but if it goes by now, we are hardly likely to reach it again. It is a bill which has been very carefully considered by the mining committees of both Houses and reported back favorably in both Houses. I have on my desk, which I have cut out and preserved, columns of articles in favor of this bill, from our local papers all through the mining regions, strongly indorsing the bill. I know of no higher guarantee. And back of that I have my own experience for twenty-five years in the mining regions, and my own practice as a lawyer dealing with these questions, and this bill is the best thing I can devise to relieve some of my people from difficulties that they are laboring under. It does not change the system, but simply smooths away some rugged points in the application of the law.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. My impression is that it will require more explanation than can be given in the remaining time of the morning hour. I insist on the objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be laid aside.

APPRAISEMENT OF MERCHANDISE.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 318) to provide for the appraisement of merchandise in certain cases; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill provides that whenever any goods, wares, or merchandise shall be imported by the manufacturer or producer thereof, or when the appraisers shall be of opinion that the invoice of any goods, wares, or merchandise does not correspond with the market value of such goods, wares, or merchandise at the place of shipment, although such invoice may state truly the cost of such goods, wares, or merchandise, it shall be the duty of the appraisers to fix the actual market value of such goods, wares, or merchandise at the place of shipment at the date of exportation, by ascertaining the cost of the same, or of goods of a similar character, to other parties.

The Committee on Finance proposed to amend the bill in line 12 by striking out the word "cost" and inserting the word "value," and in line 13 by striking out the words "to other parties," and inserting "manufactured or produced by other manufacturers or producers, or sold to other bona fide producers in open market;" so as to read:

It shall be the duty of the appraisers to fix the actual market value of such goods, wares, or merchandise at the place of shipment at the date of exportation, by ascertaining the value of the same, or of goods of a similar character, manufactured or produced by other manufacturers or producers, or sold to other bona fide purchasers in open market.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

AMERICAN FORK RAILWAY COMPANY.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 332) granting to the American Fork Railway Company a right of way through the public lands for the construction of a railroad and telegraph.

Mr. WINDOM. I should like to examine that bill before it is acted upon.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I hope the gentleman will allow me to say one word.

Mr. WINDOM. I have no objection to a statement.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Minnesota object to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. WINDOM. I object to the passage of the bill until there is an opportunity to examine it. I did not know it was here.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

JOSEPH COUNCIL.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 465) for the relief of Joseph Council, of Mobile, Alabama; which was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill provides for the payment to Joseph Council, of Mobile, Alabama, of $1,000, in full payment and satisfaction of his claim for raising, repairing, and delivering the rebel torpedo-boat Saint Patrick to the navy-yard at Pensacola, Florida.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Is there a report in that case? If there is, I should like to hear it.

The Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. CRAGIN on the 10th of February:

The Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the memorial of Joseph Council, having had the same under consideration, beg leave to report:

The claimant sets forth in his memorial that he is a resident of Mobile, Alabama, and claims $1,147, for compensation for services rendered the Government in raising, repairing, and delivering the rebel torpedo-boat Saint Patrick to the navy-yard at Pensacola, Florida.

When our forces captured Mobile, the enemy sunk two of their vessels in the vicinity of the ship-yard of Mr. Council, the boat in question being so near it that he was obliged to raise her in order to launch a vessel that he then had on the stocks for repair.

The Government claimed these sunken vessels as United States property, and some time in 1867 entered into an agreement with one Colburn to raise them, on the terms that one of the boats should become his property. This contract was not carried into effect, but became a nullity from inaction on Colburn's part, which fact is clearly set forth in a letter dated January 11, 1867, from Commodore Winslow (then commanding the Gulf squadron) to Mr. Council, extending to him the same terms, and stating that proposals for wrecking and raising the Bigbee will be received, and that the lowest offer would be accepted and contract made, &c.

Council was not able to raise both of these vessels, but was compelled to either lose the use of his ship-yard or remove the Saint Patrick out of the way. And he affirms that upon laying these facts before Commodore Winslow, directions were given him to raise and deliver the vessel to the Pensacola yard, and that a reasonable amount would be awarded as compensation.

The claim was filed for adjudication in the Department, and a board of appraisers ordered to ascertain the value of the boat; and it appears they reported the same as $1,000, although the claimant contends that, as a matter of fact, she was worth a much larger sum at the time of her delivery at Pensacola.

The Chief of the Bureau of Construction and Repair, after considering this case, reported to the honorable Secretary of the Navy, on the 11th of April, 1872, that the boat was raised and delivered by Council; and as the cost of raising, &c., was more than the appraised value, recommended the payment of $1,000, suggesting that the advantage to the claimant of having it removed was well worth to him the difference between amounts claimed for services and the value as above set forth.

Your committee is of the opinion that, having faithfully rendered the services to the Government as stipulated in agreement with Commodore Winslow, he should receive a reasonable compensation, and that the sum recommended by Constructor Hanscom is a reasonable amount for the services rendered.

If the Government, by one of its officers, enters into a contract with a citizen for any specific performance, and then receives the benefit from that contract, (although verbal,) we think it should also be held to its responsibilities.

The committee report the accompanying bill, and ask its passage.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BONDED WAREHOUSES FOR RICE.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 476) to establish bonded warehouses for the storing and cleansing of rice intended for exportation; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It provides that importers' bonded warehouses, to be used for the storage and cleansing of imported rice intended for exportation to foreign countries, may be established at any port of entry in the United States, under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe.

The Committee on Finance reported the bill with amendments, in line 5, to insert after the word "imported," the word "uncleaned," and after the word "rice," to insert "and paddy."

Mr. SCOTT. After that bill was reported, upon consultation with the Secretary of the Treasury it was discovered that the amendments which had been reported by the committee would really to a certain extent defeat the purpose of the bill. The words "uncleaned" "and paddy" were inserted on the supposition that the word "rice" would not cover it, because the words "uncleaned rice and paddy" are those used in the revenue laws. There is a certain character of rice imported that is classed as "uncleaned" under the revenue laws, and has again to be cleaned, although the customs duty is assessed on it as cleaned rice. Therefore, for the purpose of accomplishing the purpose of the bill, which has the entire approbation of the Treasury Department, I ask that the amendments reported by the Committee on Finance be non-concurred in, and the bill passed as it came from the House.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendments reported by the committee.

The amendments were rejected.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ESTIMATES AND APPROPRIATIONS.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 409) to revise, consolidate, and amend the statutes in relation to estimates, appropriations, and public accounts.

Mr. WEST. I see that that bill is reported by the chairman of the Committee on Finance; and I suggest to him, in view of its very great importance, that probably it will be inexpedient to push it at this late period of the morning hour, especially as the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, I observe, is not in his seat.

Mr. SHERMAN. This same bill was reported at the last session by the Committee on Appropriations, and the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations I know is desirous to have action upon it. I have no objection to its going over until to-morrow, but I do not want it to lose its place, because I have conferred with him, and he desires that it should be acted on.

Mr. WEST. Let us act upon it, as far as we can, to-day.

Mr. SARGENT. I think it had better lie over.

Mr. SHERMAN. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope it will not be displaced on the Calendar.

Mr. WEST. It ought not to lose its place.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the bill is to go over, I would prefer that it should be referred to the Committee on Appropriations. There are some things in it that I think they ought to consider.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio moves that the bill be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

The motion was agreed to.

C. E. ROGERS.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 207) for the relief of C. E. Rogers; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to direct the Postmaster-General, in settling the accounts of C. E. Rogers, late postmaster at Carver, Minnesota, to allow him a sum not exceeding $222.50, as indemnification for a like amount belonging to the post-office fund, and stolen from him on the 29th of October, 1869, if it shall satisfactorily appear to the Postmaster-General that Rogers was guilty of no negligence in the custody of the money and postage-stamps stolen.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had disagreed to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 1923) authorizing the payment of annuities into the treasury of the Seminole tribe of Indians, asked a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. JOHN T. AVERILL of Minnesota, Mr. JOHN P. C. SHANKS of Indiana, and Mr. ABRAM COMINGO of Missouri, managers of the conference on its part.

GEORGE M. RICHARD.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 215) to exempt George M. Richard, of Pittston, in the State of Pennsylvania, from the payment of $881.29, for postage-stamps stolen from his office while postmaster; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WILLARD HOWE.

Mr. STEWART. I desire to ask a favor of the Senate. I ask to take up a bill out of its order—the bill (S. No. 563) for the relief of John M. McPike.

Mr. ANTHONY. I will not object; but had we not better go on with the Calendar in order?

Mr. STEWART. I cannot be here all the time, and that is the reason I ask this now. I will not press it against the wish of the Senate, though I am anxious the bill shall pass. It has been delayed many years on account of my neglect.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is the motion withdrawn?

Mr. STEWART. I withdraw it.

Mr. ANTHONY. I beg to remark here that if we take out of the order of business those bills which Senators are particularly anxious to have passed, we neglect all the others. If we keep those that Senators are anxious to pass in their place, then they will help to push the Calendar along. Although I shall not object to anything my friend from Nevada wants done, I think the best way is to go on regularly in order.

The Chief Clerk read the next bill on the Calendar, being the bill (H. R. No. 1213) for the relief of Willard Howe, of Massachusetts; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to direct the Auditor for the Post-Office Department to credit the account of Willard Howe with the sum of $474.54, to reimburse him for the payments made by him.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REUEL B. FULLER.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1576) for the relief of Reuel B. Fuller, of Wilton, Maine; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to direct the Postmaster-General, in the settlement of the accounts of Reuel B. Fuller, postmaster at Wilton, Franklin County, Maine, to credit him with $169, being the amount of postage-stamps and postal funds stolen from the post-office of Wilton, without fault or negligence on his part.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JAMES R. YOUNG.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 470) for the relief of James R. Young; which was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It authorizes the proper accounting officers of the Treasury to allow and credit to James R. Young, late postmaster at Lisbon, New Hampshire, $309.84, postage-stamps stolen from his safe and office by burglars on the night of May 15, 1869, without any fault or neglect on his part.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

COWAN & DICKINSON.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 63) for the relief of Perez Dickinson, the surviving partner of James Cowan, deceased, heretofore trading and doing business under the firm name and style of Cowan & Dickinson, of Knoxville, East Tennessee.

Mr. WRIGHT. That is of a class of cases that I know will provoke a great deal of discussion here. There is a very lengthy report. I therefore object to the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. SCOTT. Before the Senator interposes an objection, let me state to him that I am in receipt of a letter from the Senator from Tennessee, not now in his place, who sits on the right, [Mr. BROWNLOW,] stating that he is very much interested in the disposition of this bill; but the state of his health is such that he fears he will have to leave the city and return to his home in a few days, and he makes an appeal to me to endeavor to bring it up and have it passed. I do not know whether it is likely to elicit discussion or not, but I wish to make that statement before the Senator objects.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired, the Senate resumes the consideration of the unfinished business, which is the finance bill, and the bill just read will remain at the head of the Calendar for to-morrow morning.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WEST. If the Senator from Ohio will not object, as I understand the Senate is not now prepared to continue the further consideration of the question of finance, I shall move to lay aside the financial question informally to continue action upon the Army appropriation bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Louisiana asks unanimous consent to lay aside informally the pending order, and proceed with the Army appropriation bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will ask the Senator from Indiana if he desires to speak to-day on the finance question?

Mr. MORTON. I do not.

Mr. ANTHONY. If there is a difference of opinion between the Appropriation and Finance Committees, as we are going on so well with the Calendar, would it not be as well to give it another hour?

Mr. WEST. There is not any difference.

Mr. SHERMAN. I simply rose to say that I would make no objection now to the postponement of the financial question until after the Army bill is disposed of; and I say this with a view to promote the public business. I believe the early disposition of the financial question itself will be promoted by a day or two's delay now. The Committee on Finance will probably be able to report at an early day; and perhaps it may promote the final disposition of the question to postpone the pending bill for a day or two.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the motion of the Senator from Louisiana? The Chair hears none, and the Army appropriation bill is before the Senate.

DISTRICT GOVERNMENT INVESTIGATION.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask the Senator from Louisiana to consent to lay aside this bill informally for a moment, that we may take up the bill appropriating $10,000 to pay the expenses of the joint select committee for the investigation of the affairs of the District of Columbia.

Mr. WEST. I will yield to that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the bill referred to by the Senator from Iowa will be taken up. The Chair hears no objection.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 583) making an appropriation to defray the expenses of the joint select committee to inquire into the affairs of the District of Columbia.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WEST. Now I insist on the regular order.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1009) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes, the pending question being on the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations, in line 171, to reduce from $10,000 to $5,000 the appropriation "for the Army Medical Museum and medical and other necessary works for the library of the Surgeon-General's office."

Mr. WEST. I ask that the amendment be non-concurred in.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the committee.

Mr. MERRIMON. I find that I did not place a proper construction in this clause of the bill, owing to the omission of a comma at the close of the word "museum." It reads, "for the Army Medical Museum," and there should be a comma there, but there is none, and then it proceeds, "and medical and other necessary works for the library of the Surgeon-General's office, $5,000." If it is for all the purposes named, I think the appropriation ought to be $10,000.

Mr. WEST. Let the Clerk make that correction of punctuation by inserting a comma after the word "museum."

Mr. SARGENT. The better way would be to put the word "for" after the word "and."

Mr. WEST. That is true. Let that be done.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection that change will be made. The question now is on the amendment of the committee reducing the appropriation from $10,000 to $5,000.

The amendment was rejected.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was in line 196, after the word "construction" in the proviso to the clause making appropriations for the ordnance service to defray current expenses at the arsenals, to strike out the words "or repair," so as to make the proviso read:

And provided further, That none of the money hereby appropriated shall be expended for the construction of buildings.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line 3, of section 2, after the words "Quartermaster-General," to insert the words "and of the Commissary-General of Subsistence, prior to July 1, 1872," so as to read:

That all balances of appropriations, for whatever account, made for the service of the Departments of the Quartermaster-General and of the Commissary-General of Subsistence, prior to July 1, 1872, which at the passage of this act shall remain undrawn upon the books of the Treasury.

Mr. SHERMAN. I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Louisiana to the phraseology of this section, which will involve us in the same difficulty that we were involved in years ago by the passage of a similar law. I think, if the construction of the Treasury Department is right, the language here used is entirely nugatory. I refer to the construction put upon the act of July 12, 1870, providing that all balances of appropriation contained in the annual appropriation bills, and made specifically for the service of any fiscal year and remaining unexpended, shall be covered into the Treasury; and which further provides "that all balances of appropriations which shall have remained on the books of the Treasury, without being drawn against in the settlement of accounts for two years from the date of the last appropriation made by law, shall be reported by the Secretary of the Treasury to the Auditor of the Treasury whose duty it is to settle accounts thereunder," &c. Under that section of the law they hold that where an appropriation of $1,000,000 is still unexpended at the end of the fiscal year, yet if at any time within two years after that it is drawn against to the amount of $1,000, that it not only keeps in the Treasury or subject to draft the $1,000 so drawn against, but the whole balance of the appropriation. That is the construction under which the Treasury officers are now acting.

Mr. WEST. Is that construction objectionable to the Senator?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly it is.

Mr. WEST. This is intended to obviate that.

Mr. SHERMAN. It falls into the same language, except instead of the word "against" the word "upon" is used: "All balances of appropriations, for whatever account, made for the service of the Department of the Quartermaster-General, which at the passage of this act shall remain undrawn upon the books of the Treasury," instead of "undrawn against." You will have the same difficulty, unless you make this language so clear as to exclude the conclusion to which they have arrived. I suggest to make it read: "All balances of appropriations, for whatever account, made for the service of the Department," &c., "remaining on the books of the Treasury."

Mr. WEST. I will accept that. Having the very same object with the Senator, I think it would be well to perfect the language.

Mr. SHERMAN. In the case of salaries, for instance, instead of the money being covered into the Treasury at the end of the fiscal year, it was held that, as long as any draft was made on the fund within two years, the whole fund was available and at the disposition of the Department. When there seems to be an indisposition to carry such a law as this into effect, it is difficult to frame language to insure it.

I would make it read, "remaining on the books of the Treasury," and use the express words, "shall be carried to the surplus fund." I would strike out the words "which at the passage of this act shall," and just say "remaining undrawn," striking out the word "upon."

Mr. WEST. One moment. We cannot do that, because we propose to change the phraseology there and strike out the words "at the passage of this act," and insert "on the 30th day of June, 1874." If the Senator will allow me, I will interpose that, and ask for action on that first, and then his proposition can come up next.

Mr. SHERMAN. Very well; that is right.

Mr. WEST. I am instructed by the committee to recommend that the words, in line 5, "at the passage of this act," be stricken out, and the words "on the 30th day of June, 1874" inserted, giving a margin, as the Senate and Congress undoubtedly intended to do when they originally passed the limitation on these appropriations, of two years exactly. Instead of making it take effect on the passage of this act, it takes effect at the end of the fiscal year. It allows a margin.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) The question is on the amendment moved by the Senator from Louisiana, in line 5, after the word "which," to strike out "at the passage of this act" and insert "on the 30th day of June, 1874."

Mr. SHERMAN. The words "undrawn upon" are the words that create the difficulty, and they ought to be stricken out. They are construed to limit the effect of the restriction, so that if there is a single draft outstanding against the fund it keeps open the whole fund appropriated for two years thereafter.

Mr. WEST. The Senator's proposition then is simply to make it read, "remaining on the books of the Treasury." That is acceptable, I have no doubt, to the other members of the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment suggested by the Senator from Ohio will be regarded as agreed to if there be no objection. It is agreed to; and the question is on the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations as amended.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was in section 2, after the word "office," in line 10, to strike out:

And except the balances remaining from such appropriations for the fiscal years ending June 30, 1873, and June 30, 1874, respectively.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. I suggest that, to make this clearer and avoid all ambiguity, the words "and be carried to the surplus fund," in line 14, should be transposed to line 6, so that the operative words will come in before the exception.

Mr. WEST. The exception is stricken out.

Mr. SHERMAN. No; the exception I refer to is from line 6 to line 10; and the operative words ought to be inserted above, or these other words should be in parentheses.

Mr. WEST. Then on line 6, in order to meet the views of the Senator, with which I am entirely in accord, before the word "except," I move to insert the words "shall be carried to the surplus fund," and to strike those words out of line 14.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The section will be read as it would stand if thus amended.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That all balances of appropriations, for whatever account, made for the service of the Departments of the Quartermaster-General and of the Commissary-General of Subsistence, prior to July 1, 1872, which on the 30th day of June, 1874, shall remain on the books of the Treasury, shall be carried to the surplus fund, except such as the Auditor of the Treasury, whose duty it is to settle accounts ag.. ast such appropriations, shall certify to the Secretary of the Treasury to be necessary in the settlement of such accounts pending in his office.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was to add to section 2 the following words:

And the Quartermaster-General, Commissary-General, and Third Auditor of the Treasury shall continue to receive, examine, and consider the justice and validity of such claims as shall be brought before them under the act of July 4, 1864, and the acts amendatory thereof; and the Secretary of the Treasury shall make report of each claim allowed by them, at the commencement of each session of Congress, to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, who shall lay the same before Congress for consideration.

Mr. SCOTT. The insertion of that amendment, together with the proposition to strike out the fourth section of the House bill, brings before us a question upon which I desire to say a very few words.

The fourth section, proposed to be stricken out, it will be observed, would have the effect of transferring from the Quartermaster and Commissary Departments to the southern claims commission, as it is termed, the consideration of cases now pending before those two departments; and this presents a question which, I think, is assuming so much importance in its general aspects that the attention of Congress should be directed to it. It is the general subject of how claims against the Government are to be disposed of.

There are four tribunals at present existing for the adjudication of claims: first, the regular committees of Congress, treating them as one tribunal; secondly, the southern claims commission; thirdly, the Quartermaster and Commissary Departments; and fourthly, the Court of Claims; and each one of these has a separate class of claims to pass upon. The magnitude of them will be apparent when I state that the docket of the Senate Claims Committee at this time has upon it one hundred cases more than at the corresponding period of the last Congress. A statement of the number before the Quartermaster and Commissary Departments I had, but by some accident I have mislaid it.

Mr. WEST. Eleven thousand and upward.

Mr. SCOTT. I am told the number there is eleven thousand and upward unacted upon. In the southern claims commission the number, according to the last report which they made, is as follows:

The whole number of claims presented to the commissioners is 22,298.

This is the aggregate of all that have been presented since the organization of the board in 1871, about three years.

The gross amount of all the claims filed is $60,258,150.44. The aggregate of the claims disposed of by the three reports which have been made to Congress is 5,254.

So that there are over seventeen thousand claims yet pending before the southern claims commission; and the section which is proposed to be stricken out, if I remember it properly, removes the limitation of the time for the presentation of petitions, which expired on the 3d of March last, until the 3d of March, 1875.

Mr. President, it is apparent that with this vast number of claims some better mode of disposing of them must be provided than now exists. In no one instance, except in the Court of Claims, is the Government represented by counsel, for the purpose of carefully and laboriously preparing the defense which the Government has against these claims. It is true that in the committees of Congress, in the Quartermaster and Commissary Departments, and in the southern claims commission, the persons who have to decide these claims find themselves in the anomalous position of considering the ex parte testimony which is produced by claimants for the purpose of making out their claims against the Government, of examining it with all the scrutiny which that circumstance is likely to compel them to exercise, and then, after they have thus examined the testimony of the claimant taken ex parte to support his case, they find themselves, from the necessity of the case, in the anomalous position of turning around and becoming the counsel of the Government for the purpose of defending the Government against the demand of the claimant. Any one can see how very defective this mode of proceeding is; that it is impossible to know, after a case has been thus examined and adjudicated, whether justice has been done either to the claimant or to the Government.

I approve of this amendment which we now have immediately under consideration, and of the proposition to strike out the fourth section of the bill, for this reason: This amendment relates to a class of cases which have been for a long time under consideration in these departments, and a large number of them have been partially examined, and they are merely suspended, awaiting the official examination of the officers upon further testimony to be produced. Those officers have a knowledge of these claims which could not be obtained in a new tribunal for many months, for perhaps a year; and the tribunal to which it is proposed to send them in the fourth section is simply composed by the addition of two more commissioners to the southern claims commission, making those two a side commission, in reality, for the purpose of exclusively examining the claims transferred from the Quartermaster and Commissary Departments; so that there would be the anomaly of this one tribunal divided into two departments for the purpose of examining different classes of claims, and in both the anomaly which I have already presented of there being no counsel really for the purpose of protecting the interests of the Government. The only provision that is made which can be considered as defending the interests of the Government is, that under the regulations provided by the commissioners, they may cross-examine in certain cases when the testimony is being examined; but the commissioners themselves are not familiar with the merits of each case, so that the privilege of cross-examining must be a very limited one, and not so effective as it would be in the hands of counsel who have examined each case and prepared themselves to know its merits.

I am entirely satisfied that before the commissioners of claims, before the Quartermaster and Commissary Departments, and before any other tribunal that may be authorized for the purpose of hearing this vast multitude of claims, the Government could well afford to employ and pay the best counsel in the land, and would save large amounts of money by doing it; and in view of the statement of business which I have made as already suspended before the committees of Congress, the claims commission, and the Quartermaster and Commissary Departments, I wish to call attention to the subject now, for I think that either at this session of Congress, or very soon, it becomes absolutely necessary, both for the purpose of doing justice to the honest and deserving claims and of defeating undeserving and dishonest ones, and of doing justice to the Government, some more expeditious tribunal should be erected for the purpose of having these claims adjudicated. Why, sir, take the southern claims commission. It has already been in existence three years. It has disposed of five thousand cases. There are seventeen thousand cases yet to be disposed of; and any one can see that at that rate, disposing of five thousand cases in three years, it will take them ten years to dispose of the cases now before them, if the time even be not extended for another year to permit a single additional claim to be filed.

The necessity, therefore, of considering the question of limitation upon the time for filing claims, of the kind of tribunals and the number of them that ought to be organized, and of the provision to be made for protecting the interests of the Government, is apparent; and some effective action ought to be taken upon it, and taken soon.

I only rose at this time to call attention to this general necessity, saying that, for reasons which I have given, I favor the amendment already before us for the purpose of continuing these cases before the Quartermaster-General and Commissary-General, believing that they will be more effectively disposed of there, with the knowledge those departments have of them, with the trained clerks they have for the purpose of examining these cases, than they would be by transferring them to the southern claims commission. I wish to say nothing whatever in disparagement of any of these tribunals. They are doing the best they can under their organization, and with the means given to them by the Government; but except in the Court of Claims, the machinery for securing justice to the worthy claimant, and at the same time protecting the Government against unfounded claims, is totally inadequate.

Mr. WEST. You except the Court of Claims?

Mr. SCOTT. Yes; I say with the exception of the Court of Claims.

Mr. BOREMAN. Mr. President, I agree with the Senator from Pennsylvania that the amendment of the committee should be concurred in by the Senate. I have looked into this matter a little, and I am satisfied that the Quartermaster's Department and the Commissary's Department are in a better condition to do justice to the claimants and at the same time to the Government than the tribunal which is proposed to be substituted by the section proposed to be stricken out.

How this section in the House bill came to be suggested I cannot imagine. It is not recommended by any Department, so far as I know. It is not asked for by the claimants. It is not in the interest of expedition nor in the interest of economy. The Quartermaster's Department has had presented to it upward of thirty-one thousand claims. Of these over twenty thousand have been disposed of, leaving eleven thousand yet undetermined The Commissary Department has had from three to four thousand claims presented to it for consideration and action, and of these but two hundred and forty-seven remain, I believe, undisposed of; so that it will be seen that the Quatermaster's Department has proceeded to dispose of the claims in that department at the rate of about two thousand a year, and has given satisfaction, so far as I know, to the claimants and to the country. So also with the Commissary Department. The section under consideration proposes to throw open the door to a different class of claimants than has ever before gone before this southern claims commission.

Mr. WEST. Pardon me. Will the Senator allow me to ask him whether the third section proposes to do it?

Mr. BOREMAN. The section proposed to be stricken out—the fourth section.

Mr. WEST. Ah! the section proposed to be stricken out.

Mr. BOREMAN. Yes, sir; I say it is proposed to put before the southern claims commission a class of claims that they have never heretofore had jurisdiction of, and a large proportion of which are now pending in the Quartermaster and Commissary Departments.

Mr. WEST. Then I am to understand the Senator as supporting the report of the committee?

Mr. BOREMAN. I favor the report of the committee. The claims intended to be transferred to the southern claims commission by the section which came from the House are those belonging to citizens of loyal States. Heretofore they have had jurisdiction of claims from the insurrectionary States only.

In addition to that, there is proposed an addition of two members to the southern commission, and they are to sit as an independent body, making a separate and distinct commission, in addition to the one which we already have, which will entail upon the Government an extraordinary expense. In addition to that, it will be necessary to have additional clerks, messengers, agents, and all these.

Now, if you will look at the history of this southern claims commission, you will find that since its creation it has been authorized to employ additional agents, additional clerks, additional short-hand reporters, additional commissioners for taking testimony, all of whom are to be paid out of the Treasury except the fees for taking depositions. The annual expense of this southern claims commission, as reported, exceeds $50,000 to-day, and this is a proposition to add to that expense very materially, and so far as I have been able to ascertain from those who are interested, and from the officers of the Government, the action upon the claims sought to be transferred will be retarded, the expense will be increased, and nobody profited.

I trust the suggestion of the committee will be adopted, and that the recommendation to strike out the section will be concurred in.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY.) The question is upon the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations as an addition to the second section of the bill.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WEST. The next amendment is to strike out sections 3 and 4, or the rest of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER The question is now upon the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations, to strike out sections 3 and 4, being the residue of the bill.

Mr. WEST. The Senators who have spoken on the preceding amendment have given undoubtedly satisfactory reasons for striking out the fourth section, and I will not burden the Senate with any remarks on these sections at the present time. Section 3 can be dispensed with, simply for the reason that we have, by the amendment beginning on line 3 of the preceding section, embraced the whole body of it, the whole spirit of it, and the whole letter of it, in fact, so that it is now irrelevant in the bill. The motion is now to strike out all of the remainder of the bill, being sections 3 and 4.

Mr. DAVIS. I did not hear the proposition of the Senator from Louisiana. It is just as it came from the committee that he proposes to have the bill stand, as I understand.

Mr. WEST. Precisely.

Mr. MERRIMON. What is the question before the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on striking out the remainder of the bill.

The amendment was agreed to; being to strike out the third and fourth sections, as follows:

SEC. 3. That all balances of appropriations, for whatever account, made for the service of the Department of the Commissary-General of Subsistence, which at the passage of this act shall remain undrawn upon the books of the Treasury, except such as the Auditor of the Treasury whose duty it is to settle accounts against such appropriations shall certify to the Secretary of the Treasury to be necessary in the settlement of such accounts pending in his office, and except the balances remaining from such appropriations for the fiscal years ending June 30, 1872, to June 30, 1873, and June 30, 1874, respectively, shall be carried to the surplus fund.

SEC. 4. That all claims of citizens who remained loyal adherents to the cause and Government of the United States during the war for stores or supplies taken or furnished during the rebellion for the use of the Army of the United States, and for the use or loss of vessels or boats while employed in the military service of the United States, including any such claims now pending and undetermined in any department of the Government, shall be presented, before the 1st day of November, 1875, to the commissioners of claims created by act of March 3, 1871, who shall have exclusive jurisdiction to hear and determine the same: Provided, That all such claims now pending and undetermined in the Department of the Quartermaster-General and the Department of the Commissary-General of Subsistence shall, on the passage of this act, be transferred to the said commissioners of claims; and such transfer shall be regarded as presentation within the meaning of this act. And all evidence taken in reference to said claims, and now on file in the office of the Quartermaster-General or Commissary-General, and admissible under the rules and regulations of their Departments, shall be transferred with the claims, and be considered as if taken under the rules and regulations of said commission. And there shall be appointed by the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, two additional commissioners of claims, with the powers, duties, and compensation of the commissioners created under the act of March 3, 1871, and who shall devote their time exclusively to the claims transferred to the commission by the provisions of this act; and the decision of the said two additional commissioners thereon shall be taken and held to be the decision of the commission, unless in case of disagreement of the two, when the decision of the presiding commissioners shall be given, and shall be decisive. And all such claims which shall not be presented to said commissioners on or before said day shall be barred, and shall not be entertained without further authority of Congress: Provided, That nothing herein shall be deemed to affect or impair the limitation for the time for the presentation of petitions prescribed by section 2 of the act of March 3, 1873. Such commissioners shall, under the provisions of the act of March 3, 1871, and the acts in amendment thereof, receive, examine, and consider the justice and validity of such claims as shall be brought before them, and shall make report of their proceedings, and of each claim considered by them, at the commencement of each session of Congress, to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, who shall lay the same before Congress for consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, and still open to amendment.

Mr. LOGAN. I ask to go back to line 223, on page 10.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is reminded that there is one amendment of the Committee on Appropriations which was passed over. It will be now stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 2, line 34, it was proposed to strike out the following proviso:

Provided further, That nothing herein shall be construed to allow more than ten cents a mile for such transportation.

Mr. WEST. As that amendment was reserved at the request of the Senator from Ohio who is not now in his seat, I suggest that it be passed over, and other amendments entertained, to give that Senator an opportunity to be heard when he returns.

Mr. LOGAN. I desire to offer an amendment now, as I was not noticing at the time the Senate took action on that part of the bill to which I wish to move it. At the end of the first section, after line 223, I move to insert:

Provided further, That $20,000 be appropriated to continue experiments on the Moffatt breech-loading system of ordnance.

This appropriation is recommended by the Ordnance Department and by the Secretary of War. My attention was called to it by the Secretary of War. He wrote me a letter, which I have in my hand, suggesting the propriety of this amendment to this bill. It is an experiment that is going on by the Ordnance Department, and they ask this appropriation for the purpose of completing the experiment in reference to this gun. I think it is a very proper thing to do.

Mr. WEST. Neither the Secretary of War nor the Ordnance Department made any such recommendation to the Committee on Appropriations, and I think I shall be compelled to raise a point of order, that the Senator has not offered the amendment in time and in accordance with the usage of the Senate; that is, that it should be submitted, and notice should be given, and it should be reported by his committee. We had no notice of it. I do not say that I am prepared to consent, nor will I dissent to the proposition, but I shall be compelled, under the usages of the Senate, to raise the point of order on its reception.

Mr. LOGAN. If the Senator raises the point of order, and it is out of order to offer the amendment, of course that is the end of it. I know nothing about what recommendations were made to the Committee on Appropriations by the Secretary of War.

Mr. WEST. I ask for a ruling on my point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is compelled to rule the amendment out of order, although it would be in order if notice had been given, as the estimate comes from the War Department. An amendment proposing an increase of appropriation must come from a committee of the Senate or the head of a Department, and also the Committee on Appropriations must have had one day's notice of it.

Mr. LOGAN. I, of course, have no objection to the decision of the Chair; I presume it is correct. I will only say in reference to matters of this kind that it is very hard for one committee to know what another committee has before it; and when the Committee on Appropriations reports appropriations in reference to matters connected with the Army, the Committee on Military Affairs are not consulted at all. I find no fault with that. This suggestion was sent to me as chairman of the Military Committee. I suppose the Secretary of War presumed that our committee would probably have something to do with suggestions in reference to such matters, and for that reason he sent it to me. I had the papers in my desk yesterday, and intended to give the notice yesterday that the amendment would be offered, but I forgot it; it passed out of my mind, and I did not do it. I said to the Senator having charge of this bill that I intended to offer the amendment, and I thought he consented to it; but of course I must have been mistaken in that from his remarks now. I suggested to him that I should offer the amendment, and yet I did not offer it. Of course it comes under the rule stated by the Chair.

Mr. WEST. There are a good many things occurring in the press of business hurriedly, and if I made such an admission as that, it was merely to the Senator, and it did not refer to the action of the Senate.

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly. I can find no fault with the Senator at all.

Mr. WEST. I think the Senator might appeal to the Senate, and make such representations as he sees proper as to the expediency of the expenditure, and let them say whether they will consent to make the appropriation or not.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the Senator from Louisiana withdraws his point of order, the amendment can be entertained by unanimous consent.

Mr. WEST. I withdraw my point of order, and then we can discuss the merits of the proposition.

Mr. SARGENT. I should like to hear the letter of the Secretary of War read. It may be that covers the case so that discussion will be unnecessary.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to entertaining the amendment of the Senator from Illinois? The Chair hears none, and it is before the Senate.

Mr. LOGAN. I will read the following communication from the Ordnance Department in reference to the matter:

A 3.09" Moffatt breech-loading field-gun, authorized to be fabricated and tested under the act of Congress approved June 6, 1872, was manufactured at the South Boston Foundery during the last year, under orders from this office, and under the immediate supervision of the inventor.

It is made of the best forged crucible-cast steel, (Firth's,) complete in one ingot, (except the steel breech-mechanism)—

That part it is not necessary to read. Further:

A résumé will show a well-built, strong gun, and a breech-mechanism working freely and well as far as tested, and a satisfactory record of experiments and tests as far as they have gone, and good projectiles, and a powder giving satisfactory pressures. The experiments are evidently too few to establish that the gun is so far perfected that it can be pronounced as ready for competitive tests with more matured systems, even as far as the free working of the breech-mechanism is concerned in the ordinary vicissitudes of experimental firing, and hence it is intended to subject the gun to further tests, with the view of ascertaining if it has any defects not yet apparent, and of perfecting it with a view of competitive trial with other systems, and which latter trials, it is presumed, will be exhaustive, and the breech-loading question for field-service solved.

From the above it will be seen that the gun promises well as a practical working system. A full report will be furnished when the experiments are completed.

S. CRISPIN,
Brevet Lieutenant-Colonel U. S. A., Major of Ordnance.

This letter was referred to myself by the Chief of Ordnance, and I referred it to the Secretary of War, and the Secretary of War, on March 9, sent me the following letter:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington City, March 9, 1874.

SIR: I have the honor to return the letter which you referred to me from Mr. R. R. Moffatt, suggesting that an amendment be inserted in the Army appropriation bill, appropriating $20,000 to continue experiments with the Moffatt breech-loading system of ordnance, and beg to invite your attention to the indorsement thereon of the acting Chief of Ordnance, dated the 7th instant. I concur with the Chief of Ordnance in recommending that an appropriation be made for this purpose.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

WILLIAM W. BELKNAP,
Secretary of War.

Hon. JOHN A. LOGAN,
United States Senator.

This is all that I know about it. The papers came to me in that way, and on the suggestion of the Secretary of War I am ready to offer an amendment. That is all I have to say about it.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Has this been passed upon by the Committee on Military Affairs?

Mr. LOGAN. It has not. I stated that I had the papers in my desk here and overlooked them, and forgot to have action by the committee; but intended to suggest the amendment, and offer it to this appropriation bill. A question of order was raised and decided against the amendment, and I have nothing further to say about it.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Allow me to inquire of the Senator whether he has formed any judgment of his own as to the fitness and propriety of this thing?

Mr. LOGAN. I have not; for I know nothing about it, except from these letters.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Then is my honorable friend in a condition to move it?

Mr. LOGAN. I presume I may move it on the suggestion and recommendation of the Secretary of War and the Chief of Ordnance, who say the experiments are not completed, and they desire to complete them; and the Secretary of War recommends an appropriation for that purpose.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Still, the committee have not considered it.

Mr. LOGAN. If the Senator desires to make his suggestion, supposing that I am offering this amendment for the purpose of trifling with the committee, I will say that I have not examined Moffatt's breech-loading gun or any other breech-loading gun, nor do I propose to do so, for it is not in my line; but this communication was sent to me, and I deemed it my duty, as chairman of the Military Committee, to offer the proposition. I have done so. If there is objection to it on the part of the Senate, I care nothing about it.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. It is most obvious that my honorable friend has performed his duty to a certain extent, and to a certain extent not; and he will allow me to speak with the utmost candor about that. He is the last man whose motives I would undertake to impugn in an official way, so that my friend will allow me to say that, if I intended anything of that sort, certainly he knows me well enough to know that any such remark is gratuitous; but in this branch of the service, as in almost all other branches of the service, there is an extreme solicitude to test things. That is all right; and the gentlemen connected with the service have their pet schemes. So far as they reflect the public interest, so far we ought to adopt them; but it is our judgment and not theirs, after all, as to the amount of appropriations we can afford to make, which is to govern; and that is particularly so this year when the service is being cut down to the very verge, and in some instances absolutely crippled.

I would not raise an objection here if the Senator from Illinois, the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, being the organ of this branch of the service, had applied his discrimination to this subject, so that he could say, "It is my judgment this is a good thing to do." I would take his judgment; but he has not said so.

Mr. LOGAN. How could I have any judgment about the propriety of the appropriation, or the gun either, unless I had examined it?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Precisely.

Mr. LOGAN. Well, I am not the examiner of guns.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. No; and I ask my honorable friend whether he is in a condition, not having examined the gun, and not having given the Committee on Appropriations an opportunity to examine it by referring it to them, to ask this appropriation? I throw that responsibility on him as chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs. Having that branch of the service under consideration, does he say that it is a good thing, in his judgment, to do to appropriate $20,000 for that particular service? If he does, and takes the responsibility, I withdraw all objection. If he does not, then I insist that this should go to the committee.

Mr. LOGAN. This seems to me to be a very strange way of throwing responsibility on individuals. Every man who offers a proposition is responsible for it as a Senator, so far as that is concerned.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. He is responsible for offering it, but he is not responsible for its adoption unless he advises it.

Mr. LOGAN. I will reply to the Senator in this way: I am not in the habit of suggesting appropriations to this committee for their adoption very frequently. I will, however, call the attention of the Senate to appropriations which have been made by Congress heretofore. I believe at the last session you appropriated $80,000 for experiments and tests for the Ordnance Department. During the preceding session of Congress I think $150,000 were appropriated for the same purpose. Now, I ask the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, on what authority were these appropriations made? Were they reported by the Committee on Appropriations after examining these guns? Did the committee or either of them go to Fortress Monroe and examine the gun that $80,000 was appropriated at the last session of Congress for experimental tests of? Did any one do it? Does the Senator get up in the Senate to ask me if I have made examinations of these things? I have not. Of course I have not. I merely said to the Senate that I presented this amendment according to the suggestion of Mr. Crispin, lieutenant-colonel in the Ordnance Department, and the recommendation of the Secretary of War; and that is all I have to base my opinion upon. I presume the acting Chief of Ordnance is a man of integrity. I presume he is a man of ability. He has made this recommendation, and that is all I know about it.

Now, if the Senator, as chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, will go to the Ordnance Department and examine all the cartridges, and all the guns, and everything connected with the ordnance of the United States, and give his opinion to the Senate before appropriations are made, then I will concede the point that it is the duty of the Senate to make these examinations. I have not made them, and did not offer this proposition with any view of pressing it if the Committee on Appropriations meant to oppose it. For that reason I will now say, for the satisfaction of the Senator who appears to be so particular about my examination of this question, that I will withdraw the amendment, and give notice to the Senate that I will, if the committee agree with me, offer it to another appropriation bill hereafter.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. One word of explanation seems to be necessary. By the way in which the honorable Senator thinks it worth while to address me as to the particularity which I propose to exact, the honorable Senator will see that the Committee on Appropriations, is not acting on personal considerations in any way whatever.

Mr. LOGAN. I will ask the Senator, inasmuch as he was so particular while putting questions to me as to my examinations, upon whose recommendation he, as chairman of the committee, reported to increase the appropriation for the library of the Medical Department of the Army from $5,000 to $10,000, whether it was on the recommendation of the Surgeon-General or merely on his own authority?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I will answer the gentleman with great frankness and candor. It was on a careful consideration of the entire subject, as well by the Surgeon-General as by several other persons having definite information and knowledge on that subject. And now, for the satisfaction of the Senate, I will answer the direct question he put to me, how we got at the estimate of $80,000 for experiments?

In all these cases, where we are not advised by the regular organ of the committee, (as we always are happy to be where a thing has been examined by him and is found to be right and he advises us to do it,) we never do such a thing without calling the parties before us, and inquiring of them precisely as to the necessity of the measure, the character of it, and passing our own judgment as a committee upon the propriety and fitness of it as connected with the public service. I do not believe there is an instance of this kind that has escaped that committee at any time while I have been upon it. In this instance, if this recommendation had come to us, we should not have reported the appropriation until we had sent for the ordnance officer to tell us in particular and in detail the whole thing. If my honorable friend had done that, or if he had done anything else which would enable him to form a judgment, I would have withdrawn all objection so far as I was concerned; but as it rests, it is simply putting $20,000 on an appropriation bill upon the recommendation of a Bureau, which we never do.

Mr. LOGAN. Is the Secretary of War a Bureau?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The Secretary of War simply indorses the Bureau officer. He does not undertake to exercise any judgment himself.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not care to continue this discussion. I will relieve the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations of a part of the difficulty which seems to have been fallen into.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I would thank my honorable friend not to allude to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations in that way. The chairman of the Committee on Appropriations is in no difficulty on this subject. The Senator presents himself here without having complied with the rules of the body at all——

Mr. LOGAN. I did not say the Senator was in difficulty. I referred to the difficulty we had fallen into in reference to this matter.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The Senator referred to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, distinctly, as falling into a difficulty.

Mr. LOGAN. No, sir.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. When I stand here and speak of the rules of the Senate, and address myself to a proposition in respectful terms, I need not be referred to as having fallen under difficulties. I think it is a little extraordinary, and the Senator will allow me to say I see no occasion for it.

Mr. LOGAN. If the Senator will subdue his excitement for a moment, I will state to the Senate what I did say, and then he will see whether his interpretation is correct or not. I said I would relieve the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations from the difficulty that we seem to have fallen into in reference to this question, not alluding to the difficulty he had fallen into. I made no such remark, used no such language. I do not see any necessity for any excitement about this matter. I was going to say that I notice in this appropriation bill large amounts of money appropriated to prevent the moth from eating up the clothing. I presume the committee have had the gentlemen before them with the moth poison, and examined it. I find a great many hundred thousand dollars appropriated here for different purposes; a million and upward for horses, forage, commissary stores, &c. I should like to know upon what authority these things are done. They are done properly; I do not question it; but they are done upon the recommendation of the heads of the Bureaus that require these appropriations, and in no other way, as the Senate well knows. Why is it that I should be criticised for presenting a recommendation from the head of the War Department with this amendment? When the Senator objected and the Chair ruled it out of order, I withdrew it. I thought that was sufficient; but now, as I said, to relieve the difficulty—not the difficulty that the Senator is in, as he thought I alluded to him, though I did not—I will present these papers and ask that they be referred to the Committee on Appropriations, that that committee may examine the question, and in their next appropriation bill, if they think it proper, report it; and if not, they need not. That will relieve the difficulty I mentioned.

Mr. WEST. I believe this discussion is informal; but as some remarks have dropped from the Senator from Illinois with reference to the influences that control the Committee on Appropriations in making recommendations for specified sums, I do not think he has exactly candidly stated the motives by which we are governed.

Mr. LOGAN. I said nothing about your motives. I said the influence that governs a committee is the recommendations from the heads of the Departments who have the disbursing of these moneys. It seems to me there is no offensive language in that, because we know the influences we are governed by in reference to our opinions as to what amount should be appropriated for particular items.

Mr. WEST. I have taken no offense; but I wish to make this suggestion to the Senator, in which I think he will see eminent fitness: Were there to be a proposition in an appropriation bill to change, for instance, the armament of the troops of the United States by a mere appropriation of dollars and cents, would he consider such a measure properly within the jurisdiction of the Committee on Appropriations, or ought it to be deliberated upon by the Committee on Military Affairs? If there was a proposition here in this bill that so many thousand dollars be appropriated to arm the troops of the United States with the Chassepot musket, would that be a matter for the Committee on Appropriations to consider? No, sir. We have other instances. Another instance has been presented to me within a few days, and I have declined to consider it until it could be acted upon by the Committee on Military Affairs. There is a proposition coming in with reference to the Gatling gun. Would it be within the province of the Committee on Appropriations to report an appropriation for the adoption of a particular arm until that particular arm had been recommended by the proper committee, which is the Committee on Military Affairs? So it is in reference to this. The Senator has been called upon here to say whether he, as chairman of the Military Committee, recommends this peculiar breech-loader. So far as I have seen it, it commends itself very much to me; I favor it; but until the Committee on Military Affairs actually recommend it to the Senate and tell us that such an armament will conduce to the interest of the United States, most assuredly the Committee on Appropriations ought not to be called upon to appropriate a dollar for it; and we do not do it without such recommendation.

Mr. LOGAN. I cannot see the necessity for all this stir that has been made by the moving of this amendment. The Senator from Louisiana very well knows that the question about the experimental test of this gun has been before the committee before. It was before the committee at the last Congress. Appropriations were made; and it was being tested; and this was merely asking for an amount to continue the experimental test. It has been already before the committee. I have had nothing to do with it. The Senator was on the Committee on Military Affairs last year, and also on the Committee on Appropriations, and we referred all matters of this kind to him because he was on the Appropriation Committee. It was covered by the general appropriation made last year after having been examined here in one of the rooms by different committees and by all who desired to examine it. It was a matter of public notoriety here. I do not see any necessity for all this stir, and therefore I have withdrawn the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. This discussion goes on by unanimous consent, there being no amendment pending.

Mr. WEST. I rise to move an amendment which, without unanimous consent, I cannot offer; and I will submit very briefly to the Senate my reasons for asking that consent. This is an amendment that was submitted by myself on the 27th of February, 1874, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, who, up to this time, have not reported in regard to it. Unless some action is taken of this kind at the present moment, and a bill that is offered by the Committee on Military Affairs should fail to become a law, there would continue to exist much complaint of inefficiency in one branch of the military service—the Pay Department. The Paymaster-General, in his report, calls our attention to it.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. What is the amendment?

Mr. WEST. My amendment is to this effect:

Provided further, That so much of the act of July 5, 1838, as forbids the detail of officers of the Army as acting paymasters be, and the same is hereby, repealed; and hereafter the Secretary of War shall be authorized to make such details and to prescribe the bonds which he may consider necessary to be given by the officers so detailed.

The particular clause of section 31 of the act of July 5, 1838, which I desire to repeal is in these words:

And no officer of the line of the Army shall be hereafter employed as acting paymaster.

The Paymaster-General says:

The most important matter which it is my duty to bring before you is the imperative necessity of more paymasters. The sixth section of the act of 3d March, 1869, forbids any appointments and promotions in the staff of the Army until further legislation. The thirty-first section of the act of 5th July, 1838, forbids the detail of officers of the Army as acting paymasters. Thus the Pay Department has not the resources of the Quartermaster or the Subsistence Department for details for temporary duty.

For instance, whenever the peculiar duties of the Quartermaster's Department or the Subsistence Department become very burdensome, or are to be exercised in localities where no particular officer of that department is stationed, it is within the power of the Secretary of War to detail an officer of the line to act as acting quartermaster or acting commissary.

There are two propositions—this one that I make and the one that was made by the Senator from Illinois and recommended by the Military Committee. Mine is to take officers from the line and detail them temporarily on duty as acting paymasters. His is to increase the staff of the Army by the appointment of six majors. In other words, when we have a prospect of an increase of officers not particularly assigned to duty, because we are diminishing the rank and file of the Army, I want the Pay Department to avail itself of their services; and the Senator's proposition is, with a reduced Army, to increase the number of officers. There is the distinction. I propose by this amendment to take those officers who will be relieved from duty in the line, and to avail of their services in the Pay Department, which has been depleted by death and by resignation down to that limit where it is scarcely adequate to do justice to its particular branch of the service.

There is one more objection I should like to present to the Senate in connection with the proposition to make more majors in the Army. I am enough of a soldier to believe that a man should find promotion by gradual and meritorious service. There is no department in the Army but that of the pay where a man, when he first goes into the service, is made a full-fledged major. Why should that be? Why should there be a major of the Pay Department to handle the funds, when the quartermaster, who handles just as much and has the responsibility of property besides, is only a lieutenant? We can take captains out of the Army and make them give bonds under this provision; we can take lieutenants out of the Army and appoint them to duty as acting paymasters; and undoubtedly they can discharge that duty as faithfully and efficiently as if we took civilians from the street and made full-fledged majors of them at once. It is not economical, and it is scarcely just to the men who have earned their positions in the Army to put full-fledged majors over them merely to handle the money that pays the troops. There are other services. I do not wish to disparage in this connection the service of the officers of the Pay Department, but I do say they ought not to be given that preference invidiously over other branches of the service. I ask the Senate to consider this amendment now, because it will only have this opportunity to do it on the Army bill, and then, if this amendment should be defeated and the Senator's bill should be defeated, the Pay Department will continue in its present inefficiency owing to its depleted number.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the consideration of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. BOREMAN. Let it be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read for information, subject to objection.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Provided further, That so much of the act of July 5, 1838, as forbids the detail of officers of the Army as acting paymasters be, and the same is hereby, repealed; and hereafter the Secretary of War shall have authority to make such details, and to prescribe the bonds which he may consider necessary to be given by the officers so detailed.

Mr. SARGENT. I do not think the amendment ought to be received or put on this bill.

Mr. LOGAN. Before the objection is made I should like to say a word.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I rose for the purpose of calling the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs to the effect of this, and whether it has been examined by that committee.

Mr. LOGAN. I am not going to object to this amendment because it has not been considered by the Military Committee. There has nothing been considered by the Military Committee that has been considered by the Appropriation Committee in connection with this bill. They have referred nothing to us for our consideration. I do not object to it on that account. If the Military Committee is to be ignored, be it so; I do not care one cent. It will save us a great deal of work. If the Appropriation Committee propose to regulate the Army of the United States in detail I have no objection, and I hope they will do it.

Mr. SARGENT. This does not come from the Appropriation Committee.

Mr. LOGAN. Very well; wherever it comes from, I hope that committee will make the Army more efficient than it is; and it is certainly tolerably efficient now. But this proposition to allow forty-six paymasters to stand as majors, and then add to them by detail; to have a parcel of them paymasters in fact and a portion of them detailed officers, is simply absurd, in my judgment, as a military proposition. If the Senator will propose right here on this bill, without reference to the Military Committee—for I care nothing about that, I am not near so sensitive as some of the gentlemen on the Appropriation Committee—to abolish the Pay Department entirely and let quartermasters disburse the funds, I will agree to it and advocate it. But to undertake to regulate the staff of the Army so as to have forty-six paymasters with the rank of major and then give authority to the Secretary of War to detail a parcel of captains who will be outranked by every man in the Pay Department, I do not consider a very good military proposition. I do not care anything about the bill that the Military Committee reported for the six paymasters.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Will the Senator, as chairman of the Military Committee, allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. LOGAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I ask what his judgment is as to the requisite number of paymasters to perform the service required of the Pay Department?

Mr. LOGAN. I shall have to answer that as I did a similar question awhile ago, that I have no judgment about it, except that which I have formed from the reports of the Secretary of War and the Paymaster-General; and they are not considered good authority, it seems. The Secretary of War recommends the additional paymasters. The Paymaster-General says it is impossible for him to get along without six additional paymasters. He asked for more; but that number, he says in his report, is absolutely indispensable. I have reported a bill according to their recommendation. I have no other testimony, no other evidence. I presumed that they were honest men, and that in their reports they stated the truth. I took that for granted, and reported a bill in accordance therewith. That is all the information I have, and it is all any of us have in reference to matters of this kind. As I said, I care nothing in the world about the bill which I reported. I shall not object to this proposition; but I do not think it is the way to legislate in reference to the Army of the United States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair misunderstood the Senator from Louisiana, and supposed from his remarks there was an appropriation contained in this amendment. The amendment is not out of order if it contains no appropriation. It does not require unanimous consent to receive it. It is before the Senate.

Mr. DAVIS. I rise to ask the Senator from Illinois whether the estimates of the Secretary of War and the Paymaster-General are made on the basis of the Army being thirty thousand or twenty-five thousand men? I understand that in the other House there is provision made this year for an army of but twenty-five thousand strong, while last year it was thirty thousand.

Mr. LOGAN. I did not refer to that; but that bill has not passed the Senate yet. Yesterday, when the paymasters' bill was called up, as reported by the committee, I asked the President of the Senate to let it lie aside, because the question was in the House; and if their bill should become a law the Army would not require these paymasters; if not, they would be required. Hence the bill that I reported was laid aside yesterday to await the action of Congress on the House bill referred to by the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. DAVIS. The bill now before us has been reported on the basis of an army of twenty-five thousand, not thirty thousand.

Mr. WEST. The Senator is on the committee, and knows that we have reduced the item for pay just to bring it down actually to what is necessary for an army of twenty-five thousand men.

Mr. DAVIS. That is just what I was stating. I said the present bill reported from the Committee on Appropriations was on the basis of an army of twenty-five thousand men, and not thirty thousand.

Mr. WEST. I urge this matter upon the attention of the Senate, being convinced that it will be the only effectual mode of remedying that very inefficiency in the Pay Department which is so earnestly pressed upon our notice by the chief of that department. It is not at all probable, I think I can state here, that any bill for the reduction of the Army will pass, nor do I believe the Senate will ever consent to the increase of the staff of the Army when you are at the same time decreasing the rank and file of it. Therefore I ask for this action now.

In reply to the criticisms of the Senator from Illinois upon military legislation, wherein he says it will be very bad policy to have forty-six majors and six captains in this corps, I call his attention to the fact that at the present time, by the report of the Quartermaster-General, there are over three hundred officers of the line of the Army doing duty now by detail in the Quartermaster's Department.

Mr. LOGAN. That is very true.

Mr. WEST. Then why not have the same rule in the Pay Department? The only reason we do not have the same rule in the Pay Department is because the officers of the Pay Department are bonded officers, and the Secretary of War has no power under the restrictions of the act of 1838 to detail an officer to a duty where he is responsible for money, unless he gives a bond. Now, here we propose to repeal that restriction. We propose to give him the opportunity to take these officers who are going to be cut loose by the reduction of your men to twenty-five thousand, and give the Pay Department the benefit of their services, instead of having them walking around Washington, or loafing around somewhere else.

Mr. BOREMAN. Will the Senator allow me to ask a question?

Mr. WEST. Certainly.

Mr. BOREMAN. Does the Senator propose to detail these officers without requiring them to give bond and security?

Mr. WEST. No, sir; the Secretary of War is obliged to require bonds from them by the amendment. There will be plenty of captains about, plenty of them that are invalided at the present moment, who will be very glad to have their services availed of. It will give you the efficiency the Pay Department requires; it will do it in the most economical way; and it will relieve us from the great inconsistency of increasing the staff of your Army when you are decreasing your rank and file. The reason for it is this: although we reduce the rank and file, we do not reduce the area of service, and it will require these additional men. I think it is the most economical and the most direct way of getting at it.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Allow me to suggest to my colleague upon the Committee on Appropriations that if the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs is right, if there is, either by bill or otherwise, practically a reduction of the Army to twenty-five thousand men, there is no necessity for an increase of the pay staff. He will see that this action is not necessary in order to give additional force in that direction. Therefore I suggest whether there is any necessity for putting it upon this bill. As we have reduced the Army, do we need any more force in the Pay Department?

Mr. WEST. We do.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I understood the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs to say that in the event of the reduction of the Army to twenty-five thousand he did not think the Pay Department need be increased.

Mr. WEST. There is no use in predicating any action of the Senate upon a probable reduction of the Army, because we have not got to that; but, as I stated before, the reduction of the rank and file of the Army to twenty-five thousand men will not involve any reduction in the necessary force of the Pay Department, because the posts will be the same. I have made this suggestion in view of relieving the necessities of the Pay Department in the most economical and judicious and the fairest way that presents itself to my mind, and I hope the Senate will act upon it.

Mr. LOGAN. I thought at one time that we had about gotten through with the practice of putting general legislation on every appropriation bill. I thought the Senator from Louisiana was very much opposed to that when he was on the Military Committee, but perhaps I was mistaken in that. If the determination of the Senate is to do this character of legislation I have nothing to say; but I should like to know from the Senator from Louisiana why it would not have satisfied him as well to move this as a substitute for the bill that I reported from the Committee on Military Affairs? Why is it that everything which is reported has to be overslaughed in an appropriation bill? I should like to know what the reason is for this kind of legislation, and this opposition to everything that comes from the Military Committee.

Mr. WEST. If the Senator will allow me to interfere, he will remember that I did his committee the due courtesy of submitting this amendment to them. They have had the opportunity to consider it; and I can only say that it has been pretty effectually strangled there. One more question the Senator asked me. What was it?

Mr. LOGAN. I do not remember.

Mr. WEST. Yes; you asked me another.

Mr. LOGAN. I have nothing to say about bills being strangled. I am not in favor of a bill that I do not agree to, that is very certain; and I presume the Military Committee will not be very likely to report one that they do not agree to.

Mr. WEST. They may report it adversely.

Mr. LOGAN. We may report adversely; but we did report in favor of six additional paymasters, as recommended by the Pay Department. Now, this is only a different mode of striking out certain numbers of paymasters in the Army, or of preventing their being appointed, which is the same thing.

Now, if it is proper to detail six men from the line as paymasters, it is proper to detail all that the Pay Department has; and I say now that if this amendment be considered—and I shall not object to its being considered—I will put the Senate to the test right here. If the detail is proper for six paymasters, it is proper for forty-six. Can the Senate think it is proper to let the forty-six paymasters remain who are already in commission, and then make details to fill up the corps from officers of the line, when there are no more officers of the line than are necessary? If it is proper to detail six, it is proper to detail the whole number needed. If the Senate adopts this proposition of the Senator from Louisiana, I shall then move to amend it so as to repeal the law authorizing paymasters in the Army and requiring details to be made for the whole; and thereby we shall get rid of forty-six paymasters in the Army. If the object is economy, let us be economical. If the Senate proposes to make this distinction, be it so; but I say if it is right that far, it is right as far as all are concerned, and I will move an amendment to strike out the whole corps and detail the whole force from the line.

Mr. SARGENT. I think the Senate should understand distinctly that this amendment, now pending, is not offered by the Committee on Appropriations, and not suggested by them. It comes from our friend from Louisiana, [Mr. WEST,] and on his own responsibility. For one I should have liked to examine this proposition in the leisure of the committee-room, and if I was not able to do that, I should like to have the advice of the Military Committee. I should like to ask what the General of the Army thinks of this innovation, and what the Secretary of War thinks of it. It affects the efficiency of the Army in the highest degree, and I should like to know what the valuable opinion of the Paymaster-General is on a proposition of this sort. I desire to divest this proposition of the idea that it is supported by the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. WEST. Nobody has said that.

Mr. SARGENT. Very well. The Senator will allow me to suggest kindly to him that he appears here, for the purposes of this bill, as the organ of the Committee on Appropriations. We placed the bill in his hands, and he was directed to report it in a certain form.

Mr. WEST. The Senator will pardon me. He must not place me in a false light.

Mr. SARGENT. I certainly do not wish to do so.

Mr. WEST. In introducing this amendment, I took occasion explicitly to say that I did it on my individual responsibility entirely.

Mr. SARGENT. Very well. I will assist the Senator in his good purpose of informing the Senate, by emphasizing that, by calling particular attention to it, and giving that as one reason why the amendment ought not to be adopted. There has certainly been no proper testimony of the necessity of any such change as this, or as to whether it would be safe for the Army to make this change. I can see the difficulty which is insisted upon by the chairman of the Military Committee that here we have discharging the same duties, on the same apparent level, with the same responsibility, officers of different grades. Those who are now to be detailed would be outranked, and you might say overslaughed—for the term is a military one, and, perhaps, used in that connection it is a proper one—by their associates. I can see that that is liable to lead to confusion; or, if it is not liable to lead to confusion, let us understand so from the Secretary of War, the General of the Army, or the Paymaster-General.

I trust that this amendment will be offered by and by in connection with the bill which has been reported from the Military Committee; and let us hear the arguments then on the respective sides of this question, when we can act certainly more at leisure than we can on this appropriation bill. I understand it has been considered and rejected by the Committee on Military Affairs, showing that that committee——

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator will pardon me; I did not say that. I did not allude to its consideration by the Military Committee. The Senator from Louisiana said the Military Committee had had an opportunity to consider it. I merely said that the Military Committee had reported a bill for six paymasters, which is different from this, leaving the inference to be drawn which the Senator has drawn.

Mr. SARGENT. I drew that inference. It seems to me better for us not to adopt this proposition now, but to let it come up in regular order as an amendment to the bill to which it will be germane, because there is nothing more dangerous in legislation—and I say so after having observed the operation of it for years—than general legislation upon an appropriation bill. It never ought to be done except on the very highest motives. Sometimes, where there is a public exigency which requires it, or where we cannot follow the ordinary forms of legislation, it may be that then, with some hesitation, with great care, we may incorporate legislation upon an appropriation bill. But generally an appropriation bill ought to discharge the single object which it properly has, and that is the making of appropriations required by existing laws, not changing existing laws. It is as dangerous as it is in organizing a commission to codify your statutes, to authorize them to change the statutes, and make them such as the commissioners or codifiers think is right or would be an improvement. Obviously such a system would lead to confusion and disorder; and it is so with appropriation bills, which have a single purpose, to divert them from that purpose and change the laws of the land.

Mr. WEST. In reply to the comments just made by the Senator from California as to the danger of incorporating general legislation in appropriation bills, I can only refer him to the fact that he did not see much danger when he reported a very important provision in this bill legislating as to the Army.

Mr. SARGENT. We had the opportunity of considering it carefully in committee, and it was considered with all the light and knowledge that could be given us in the leisure of the committee-room.

Mr. WEST. I admit that, but still that danger was obviated there. But I will accept the suggestion of the chairman of the Military Committee. I will withdraw the amendment now, and give notice that when the bill comes up for the increase of the staff of the Army by the appointment of six majors, I will contest it on the ground that when we decrease the rank and file, we do not want any more officers; and I shall propose this as a substitute for the bill reported by the Committee on Military Affairs at the proper time; and in the meanwhile these questions can weigh with the Senate for their consideration and action.

Mr. SARGENT. Before the Senator takes his seat, I will thank him if he will call my attention to the amendment to the Army bill which he says we considered in committee.

Mr. WEST. I will call the Senator's attention to it. It is the legislation in the bill which makes the Army consist of twenty-five thousand instead of thirty thousand men.

Mr. SARGENT. But that provision came from the House, and was referred to us by the Senate.

Mr. WEST. I only say we legislated.

Mr. SARGENT. Would the Senator have us report the bill back without considering the matter referred to us?

Mr. WRIGHT. I understand the Senator from Louisiana to withdraw the amendment?

Mr. WEST. Yes, sir.

Mr. WRIGHT. So that there is no question before the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is no question before the Senate except the bill itself.

Mr. WRIGHT. I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Louisiana having the bill in charge, and also of the chairman of the committee, to a portion of the bill that was passed over yesterday, but very little being said on the subject. Commencing at line 116, on page 6, it will be found that it is provided—

That no part of the money appropriated by this act shall be paid to any railroad company for the transportation of any property or troops of the United States over any railroad which, in whole or in part, was constructed by the aid of a grant of public land, on the condition that such railroad should be "a public highway for the use of the Government of the United States, free from toll or other charge" for such transportation.

As I remember, the Senator from Louisiana yesterday stated to us that there were three classes of roads that fell within what was contemplated by this part of the bill; and that I may not misstate what he then said, I refer to the words employed by him in the discussion. He said yesterday:

The first land-grant railroad, I think, was the Illinois Central, and there Congress stipulated that "the said railroad and branches shall be and remain a public highway for the use of the Government of the United States, free from toll or other charge upon the transportation of any property or troops of the United States." That appears to be language that was copied from some old turnpike charters in the different States, that where a franchise to a turnpike was laid down, the property of the State should be conducted over it free from toll or charge, the parties, however, the State or the authorities, whichever they might be, providing the means of locomotion on those roads. The same language is used in a variety of land grants to railroads. Among others I will cite the Grand Rapids and Indiana road. Then there was other verbiage in acts, and other intentions evidently expressed by Congress in its legislation. I will cite now the Cairo and Fulton road, and the great Missouri, Kansas and Texas road, a road running from Saint Louis down to the center of Texas. In the case of the Cairo and Fulton road, by the act of July 20, 1866, it was provided that—

"All property and troops of the United States shall at all times be transported over said railroad and branches at the cost, charge, and expense of the company or corporation owning or operating said road or branches, respectively, when so required by the Government of the United States."

So that whatever doubt there might have been as to the intention of the Government in making the grant to the Illinois Central Railroad with reference to the charge for transportation, there can be no doubt in reference to this, because it distinctly states that the property shall be transported by the railroad free from all charge. In the other case it was only provided that there should be no toll charged to the Government for the use of the road-bed.

Again, we have the great railroads to the Pacific, as to which it is stipulated that the whole amount due to them for transportation—that is the act of July 1, 1862—shall be reserved from payment by the Treasury of the United States and placed to the credit of these roads upon their bonds. In a subsequent act of July 2, 1864, that provision was amended so that "one-half of the compensation for services rendered to the Government by said company shall be required to be applied to the payment of the bonds."

As I understood the Senator from Louisiana yesterday, the object of the committee was to provide, as to all these three classes of roads, that no compensation should be paid to any of them for the transportation of troops, munitions, or officers, and that they should all be required to go to the Court of Claims for the purpose of having the question decided. I think I am not mistaken in saying that was the view he presented; indeed, there can be no question of it in view of what appears in the RECORD. If that be so, I suggest to the Senator that the bill as it now stands does not reach what he contemplates; for the bill, it will be remembered, provides—

That no part of the money appropriated by this act shall be paid to any railroad company for the transportation of any property or troops of the United States over any railroad which, in whole or in part, was constructed by the aid of a grant of public land on the condition—that such railroad should be "a public highway for the use of the Government of the United States, free from toll or other charge" for such transportation.

I submit that that language confines it alone to the first class of roads that the Senator spoke of yesterday, and that the consequence would be that those roads, and those alone, would be required to go to the courts; whereas the second and third classes of roads that were referred to would have the right to charge as they have charged heretofore, and we be compelled to pay them. I submit to the Senator that if his purpose is to confine it to the first class of roads, he is wrong; if his purpose is to include all three, then he wants different language. In this I may be mistaken; but I call his attention to it, and I suggest to him, and also to the chairman of the committee, whether it would not be better to amend the bill in this respect.

That no part of the money appropriated by this act shall be paid to any railroad company for the transportation of any property or troops of the United States over any railroad which, in whole or in part, was constructed by the aid of a grant of public land.

Stopping there, and striking out all from that until you come to line 127, the close of that period, and then inserting "officers" immediately after "property," so as to read:

For the transportation of any property, officers, or troops of the United States over any railroad which in whole or in part, &c.

In this I may be mistaken; but it appears to me that either the clause does not go far enough, or, if the committee contemplate what they stated yesterday, it does not cover the ground.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Allow me to call the attention of the Senator on that point to the difficulty that obviously arises with his amendment. Suppose the clause stops at the words "constructed by the aid of a grant of public land." There are certain roads who have had grants of public land, who are entitled to compensation by the very terms of their charters. Take the Union Pacific, the Kansas Pacific, and all that class of roads; they are largely subsidized, and under the circumstances of that subsidy the Government only retained a portion of the price of transportation. So he will see that his amendment would include that class of roads that have been subsidized and that have a right to charge. The difficulty, I think, which the Senator apprehended in this case in its application to a particular class is obviated by the fact, as I understand it to be, that in the other classes of roads, not included, as I think they are not by this language, their charters particularly prescribe that they are subjected to free transportation; and therefore they need not be included in this clause of the bill which proposes to turn the other roads over to the courts.

Mr. WRIGHT. It seems to me that the suggestion made by the Senator from Maine, however much of force there may be in it, is not entirely in harmony with what was said yesterday by the Senator from Louisiana having the bill in charge; for he said yesterday that questions were arising before the proper Departments as to all these classes of roads, as to what should be the measure of compensation; and that the object of the clause of the bill as it stands was to provide that none of them should have compensation, but that they should all be required to go to the Court of Claims, and that they made no objection to it.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. There are different classes of roads. Of one class of roads that was spoken of yesterday, I will mention the Illinois Central as characteristic of that class where the acts provided that the roads should be public ways, and that the Government should have the free use of those ways. That is the class that is intended to be reached by this provision.

There is another class which have been subsidized by public lands or otherwise, and the right of free transportation has been reserved to the Government. There is no question about that class; and, as the Senator will perceive, no question of compensation can arise, because there the charter is explicit.

There is still another class that have been subsidized by the Government of the United States, but yet are permitted to charge; provided, however, they shall not charge the Government more than their ordinary rates; and provided further, that one-half of the compensation may be retained by the Government of the United States to be applied to their liabilities to the Government.

These are the three classes, as I understand. The Senator will perceive that no provision could be applied to all three alike without doing injustice to one or other of these classes; but as to the second class I named, the provision is not necessary, because there the charter provides for free transportation; and as to the third class, it would be absolutely unjust, and the probability is that we have not the power to subject them to the rule that is sought to be applied in this bill. I suggest, therefore, that the amendment perhaps would work an injustice.

Mr. WRIGHT. I have no question in the world that injustice might be done; but it occurred to me from the beginning that injustice would be done under the bill as it stands. I will read from what was said by the Senator from Louisiana, who has the bill in charge, [Mr. WEST,] yesterday, and I cannot see how what he said yesterday can be reconciled with what the chairman says now:

As this question is now managed by the Quartermaster's Department, there are controversies continually arising between it and the railroads as to the amount of compensation, first, that should be reserved; next, how much should be reserved in the case of the Union Pacific and others; and next as to how much should be reserved on those railroads where we merely have the right of way without paying toll; and next whether we should pay on other railroads, that agreed, according to their charters, to do the entire transportation free of charge. The practice is this: With the railroads running to the Pacific, 50 per cent. on the amount earned is retained. On the Illinois Central and other great railroads chartered on that same principle, the Quartermaster's Department reserves 33½ per cent. for the use of the road. And upon such roads as the Cairo and Fulton, and the Missouri, Kansas and Texas, they reserve it all. This provision of the bill is intended to submit all these varied questions of contest, as between the railroads and the Government, to the courts for adjudication. It cannot seem to be a matter of very great doubt to any mind that will examine the particular wording of the statutes how the courts will decide; but until you get such a decision—

Upon what? Upon all these roads—

Until you get such a decision, these controversies continually arise between the Quartermaster's Department and the railroad interest.

What "railroad interest?" All the railroad interests referred to by the Senator from Louisiana.

Passing this bill as it is, it makes an issue to be decided by the Court of Claims in the first place. It is an issue that the railroad companies are quite willing to meet.

What railroad companies? All the railroad companies that are referred to.

They have made no objection to it—

No one of these railroad companies has made any objection—or at least the committee has heard none; or at any rate I, as the member in charge of the bill, have heard none. It is an issue that they want decided, and I do not think there can be much doubt as to the way it will be decided, equitably to all parties concerned. This is all that is proposed by the clause.

That is what was said yesterday in the discussion of this bill. I submit that, according to that argument, all the railroad companies that have land grants are included and contemplated by the bill as it now stands; and that is the intention.

Mr. WEST. Yes, sir.

Mr. WRIGHT. That being so, I submit that there can be no escape from the proposition that the bill as it now stands only includes the first class of roads that are referred to by the Senator, for the reason that you will remember that the Illinois Central Railroad was the one first referred to whose charter was copied from an old turnpike charter, and there are one or two others falling within the same class, where it has been decided by the courts, as I understand, and claimed by the railroad company and admitted by the Government, that the Government must pay, as it is said here, 33⅓ per cent. for the use of the rolling-stock and for the use of the rails. The language that is found here, I say, covers that class of roads and none others; and if you leave the bill as it now stands, it will inevitably follow that the roads which fall within the second and third classes are entirely excepted from the operation of the bill.

In this I may be entirely wrong; but if so I should like to be corrected. I should like to see how it is possible, under the language of the bill as it now stands, to include roads that have no such conditions in their charters as are recited in this part of the bill; for it will be remembered that it quotes the words: "a public highway for the use of the Government of the United States, free from toll or other charge." That is a quotation from the charter of the Illinois Central road and that class of roads, and is not to be found in the charters of the second and third classes that were referred to by the Senator yesterday.

Mr. WEST. There is precisely where the Senator is mistaken, although, perhaps, it will be desirable to amend the peculiar phraseology of this clause. I will call his attention to the fact that the language used in the bill is also in some of the charters of the roads, with a further continuance of the phrase. In the case of the Cairo and Fulton road the language of the grant was:

And the said railroad and branches shall be and remain a public highway for the use of the Government of the United States—and that all property and troops of the United States shall at all times be transported over said railroad and branches at the cost, charge, and expense of the company.

We could not have made the bill any more particular without putting in almost the whole of these charters. Perhaps it will be better to adopt, to a certain extent, the suggestion of the Senator from Iowa, but not to its full extent. I will show him the difficulty. He would bring into court the roads that have been aided by a grant of public lands, but are not bound to render a consideration in the way of free transportation. For instance, take the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad; it was aided by a grant of land; and under the Senator's amendment it would be compelled to come into court for an adjudication of its settlement; and yet the act incorporating it says "that the said Atlantic and Pacific Railroad, or any part thereof, shall be a post-route and military road, subject to the use of the United States, for postal, military, naval, and all other Government service, and also subject to such regulations as Congress may impose restricting the charges for such Government transportation," merely making it amenable to such determination of the proper compensation of that road as the officers charged with the disbursement of the money should determine. Under the proposition of the Senator from Iowa you would bring into court all these roads, whether they have been granted land subject to no conditions, or whether they have been granted land subject to conditions. I submit to him, if he wishes to perfect the clause, he certainly does not wish to bring in the railroads that have no conditions imposed on them; but, perhaps, on some consideration, we shall be able to make an alteration in what he proposes.

Mr. WRIGHT. If I have been led into error in this respect, it is on account of what the Senator said yesterday; for I understood him distinctly that all the roads which had land grants fell under one or the other of three heads.

Mr. WEST. If I did not say so, I meant to say that where there were conditions there were three classes of roads; but there are unconditional roads which this clause does not affect, but which the Senator's amendment would affect. I propose to comprise all those lines that were incorporated with conditions of service.

Mr. WRIGHT. My object was only to call the attention of the Senator from Louisiana to what it seemed to me was a defect in this clause of the bill. He seems to concede himself now that the bill as it stands does not reach exactly what he designed, and that I may not misstate him I will read from what he said yesterday:

The grants have been conferred by the United States upon a variety of conditions, and the three prominent conditions will be demonstrated by what I shall quote from the respective acts making the grants.

He then proceeded to quote from the respective acts making the grants; and I certainly was led to believe that he arranged all the roads under one or the other of the three heads. He says now he did not intend to go so far.

Mr. WEST. I did not include the roads that had received grants unconditionally.

Mr. WRIGHT. If there be roads that have unconditional grants, I can see very well that my amendment is too broad; but I submit to the Senator that the bill, as it stands now, does not do what he designs. It is very certain, as it seems to me it must appear to any legal mind, that the bill as it stands only includes one class of roads and leaves the other two entirely out.

I have suggested this amendment. I have called the attention of the Senator from Louisiana having the bill in charge to the fact. I have no disposition to retard the passage of the bill; I certainly do not want to throw anything in the way to prevent the passage of the bill to-day. Having called his attention to this matter, I shall for the present withdraw my amendment, for the reason that I have no time to put it in such form as I think would be necessary, in view of the suggestion that there are some roads which have unconditional grants. I concede that the amendment as proposed by me would include those also. I do not wish to include them. Having suggested to the Senator the difficulty, I leave the bill with him and withdraw the amendment for the present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. MERRIMON. I move to amend in line 154, page 7, by striking out "30" and inserting "5," so as to make the appropriation $5,000; and adding at the end of the line the words:

And the Secretary of War is hereby required to sell such Army clothing and other Army supplies as are not required for the use of the Army, and the gross proceeds of such sales shall be paid into the Treasury.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment which the Senator proposes to strike out has been adopted and is not amendable now; but his object can be attained after the bill has been reported to the Senate by reserving the amendment in this line.

Mr. MERRIMON. I thought the bill had been reported to the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It has not; it is still in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. MERRIMON. Then I do not insist on the amendment at present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands there was an amendment passed over on page 2.

Mr. DAVIS. I think that was at the instance of the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. WEST. We have waited for him once.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. He only wants to raise the question in the Senate.

Mr. DAVIS. Let it be reserved for the Senate on behalf of the Senator from Ohio, and let the bill be reported.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment is to strike out the proviso at the end of the clause as to mileage. It will be regarded as agreed to.

Mr. STEVENSON. I wish to offer an amendment to the bill, to come in at the close of the second section, on page 10.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the amendment, as follows:

That hereafter the Court of Claims shall have jurisdiction to hear and determine all claims of any citizens of the United States who remained loyal adherents to the cause and Government of the United States during the rebellion, or who severally took the oath prescribed by the President's proclamation of December 8, 1863, and authorized by the thirteenth section of the act approved July 17, 1862, and who severally kept and maintained said oath inviolate, and arising as follows: first, for stores or supplies taken, furnished, or used by competent civil, military, or naval authority in any State of the Union; secondly, also for the use and loss of vessels or boats while employed in the service of the United States during the rebellion; thirdly, also for the use and occupation of real estate by the Army of the United States, other than for the passage of the armies and the temporary encampments, not exceeding five days; and such court shall only have jurisdiction of such claims when such real estate was taken, used, or occupied under competent military or civil authority, for the use and in the service of the United States; fourthly, also for damage to or destruction of the real or personal property of any citizen during said rebellion, whenever the same was damaged or destroyed by competent military authority as a military necessity, to weaken and harass the enemy, or to protect, assist, and strengthen the United States forces; that for the purposes of this act the rebellion shall be deemed to have commenced on the 15th day of April, 1861, and to have ended on the 2d day of April, 1866, except as to that part of Louisiana lying west of the Mississippi River, and as to the States of Arkansas and Texas, where the same shall be deemed and taken to have ended on the 20th day of August, 1866.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I have heard enough of this to satisfy me that it is new legislation, and therefore out of order on this bill. I make the question of order.

Mr. STEVENSON. I do not see why it is out of order. We are on that very point.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thinks it is not objectionable on the ground of being new legislation. The rule which prohibited new legislation on appropriation bills was a special one which expired with the session at which it was passed. There is no such general rule. In the apprehension of the Chair, the amendment is in order so far as it has been read. If, however, it makes an appropriation, it may be out of order.

Mr. STEVENSON. It makes none.

The Chief Clerk continued the reading of the amendment, as follows:

SEC. —. That all claims now pending, or that shall be pending, before the southern commission of claims, and all claims of the kinds and classes designated in the first section of this act, which may or shall be pending before the Quartermaster-General, the Commissary-General, the Third Auditor, the Secretary of the Treasury, or before any other executive officer or department, shall immediately, after the passage of this act, be transferred and transmitted, with all papers, records, and evidences relating to the same to the said Court of Claims, and the same may then be proceeded with in said court to final hearing and judgment, in the mode prescribed by the several acts relating to said court and the rules of practice adopted therein, except so far as the same may be changed by the provisions of this act or by any subsequent enactment of Congress.

SEC. —. That the said Court of Claims shall appoint as many commissioners as it may deem necessary and convenient for the speedy determination of the pending cases, not less than one for each judicial district of the United States, for the States recently in rebellion, as well as for the States of Kentucky, Missouri, Maryland, and West Virginia; and the said court shall transmit to the said commissioners lists of the respective cases of claimants residing within their several districts. And the said commissioners shall, at the instance of the several claimants, designate a time and place for the hearing of each case, and give not less than ten days' notice of the time and place of said hearing to the district attorney of the United States of the proper district. And the said commissioners shall severally have power to issue subpœnas to the witnesses whose attendance may be required by either party to testify in the case. Any witness refusing to obey such subpœna may be proceeded against, as is provided in the first and second sections of the act approved January 24, 1827, (fourth volume of Statutes at Large, page 497.) And the said commissioners, at the time and place of hearing, or at such time and place to which they may adjourn the same, shall proceed to hear the witnesses both for the claimants respectively and the United States, and shall cause the same to be reduced to writing as nearly verbatim as given by the witnesses as can be done; and when the testimony on both sides shall be closed, the said commissioners shall make a condensed statement or synopsis of the facts proved, which, together with the testimony, shall be transmitted to the Court of Claims. And the clerk of the Court of Claims shall cause the report of the commissioners to be printed and placed upon a list for trial; and either party, under such rules and limitations as the court shall prescribe, may file exceptions thereto, and the same shall be proceeded in to final judgment, as in cases of reports of commissioners or masters in chancery.

SEC. —. That the Attorney-General, whenever he may deem it expedient, shall designate a competent person, in each of said judicial districts, to assist the several district attorneys in the performance of the duties enjoined by this act, whose compensation shall be —— dollars per day for each day actually engaged in said work, which shall be paid to such person by the Department of Justice, upon the joint certificate of the commissioners and the district attorney. The said commissioners shall be paid such per diem and fees as shall be prescribed by the said Court of Claims, the said per diem and fees to be paid by the parties respectively; and in each case the amount of per diem and fees charged to each party shall be stated upon the report in the case by the commissioner. And in case of overcharge or extortion, the said court shall cause the excess to be refunded to the party paying the same, and may, in its discretion, dismiss such commissioner. The said court shall also have authority to appoint an additional assistant clerk, at $1,500 per annum; and an additional messenger, at $900 per annum. And the salaries of the Chief Justice and judges of said court shall be $6,000, respectively, from and after the 30th day of June, 1874; and the terms of said court shall hereafter commence on the third Monday of September in each year, and shall continue so long as shall be necessary for the speedy trial of all cases pending in said court.

SEC. —. That on the first Monday of December in each year, and on the first Monday in each succeeding month while Congress is in session, the said court shall transmit to each House of Congress a report containing the names of the parties in whose favor the said court has rendered judgments under the provisions of this act, the date and amount of such judgment, and a synopsis of the subject-matter of the claim for which judgment was so rendered. And the same shall be payable to the claimant, his agent, or attorney, when an appropriation for that purpose shall have been made by Congress: Provided, That in all judgments rendered by said court under this act, where the amount in controversy shall exceed $3,000, either party may appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States in the manner now provided by law.

SEC. —. That each of the commissioners appointed under this act shall procure a book or docket, upon which he shall enter each case transmitted to him by the Court of Claims, and shall from time to time enter all proceedings had before him upon said docket, with the respective dates thereof. After any case shall have been upon the docket of a commissioner for any period over six months, either party may take a rule upon the other to have the proofs closed within sixty days; and at the end of said time, unless for cause shown the same shall be extended, the same shall be marked closed, and the report made up, and, together with the proofs and papers in the case, be sent by said commissioner to the clerk of the Court of Claims in such manner as the said court shall, by its order, direct.

SEC. —. That the time for commencement of actions under the provisions of the act entitled "An act to provide for the collection of abandoned property, and for the prevention of frauds in insurrectionary districts," approved March 12, 1863, and the various amendments and supplements thereto, be, and the same is, revived and extended for one year from and after the passage of this act. The foregoing provision shall embrace all such cases for proceeds of cotton as were directed to be paid by the Secretary of the Treasury by the fifth section of the act approved May 18, 1872; and all acts and parts of acts hereby altered or supplied, or that are inconsistent with the foregoing provisions, be, and the same are hereby, repealed; and the board of southern claims commissions be, and the same is hereby, abolished.

Mr. STEVENSON. If there is any reform in this Government more earnestly required than another, it seems to me it is in the mode in which war claims against the Government are now adjudicated and passed upon. Such a reform is required by the interest of the Government not less than that of the claimants. It was said by some Senator in the Chamber this morning that there were now eleven thousand claims before the Quartermaster and Commissary Departments. I do not know how many there are before the southern claims commission.

Mr. DAVIS. Seventeen thousand.

Mr. STEVENSON. Now, Mr. President, it seems to be an utter denial of justice to a claimant, whose property has been taken, to allow the present condition of affairs to remain in statu quo. The amounts so justly due our people, many very poor and dependent, will never be disposed of, and they never can be disposed of under the present system without great change and large increase of the clerical force in the two departments to whose charge the settlement of them is now committed. I object, too, to the manner in which they are at present disposed of. I utterly deny the right of the Quartermaster-General, for whom I have great respect, and I earnestly protest against his standard, however honest and sincere, of passing himself, or allowing his subordinates to pass, upon the loyalty of claimants. Loyalty or disloyalty should be proved by acts of friendship or hostility to the Government during the war, and not by a man's sympathies or the opinions of others, who may be his enemies, unless accompanied by proof of acts of disloyalty by the claimant. Suppose a claimant did sympathize with the South, but gave no open expression to that sympathy in acts or otherwise, but remained loyal to the Government; where a desire to see the unity of the Government upheld was as strong or stronger than the sympathy which he felt for the people of the South, and induced him to remain in the Union, why should he not receive the value of his property taken by the Government and applied to its own use?

Mr. President, men who were entirely loyal, true to the Union during the entire war, might have sympathized with the South, if such sympathy was accompanied by no act of open or secret hostility, and yet are fully, by every standard of justice, entitled to compensation for property taken or furnished the Government. Yet by the standard, as established by the Quartermaster-General now, if a man said since the war that he had sympathized with the South, unaccompanied by any act of open or secret hostility at any time against the Government, no matter what amount of property was taken from him, he is entitled to no compensation. I do not think the Quartermaster-General or the Commissary-General desire to be unjust. The principle on which they act is erroneous. Sympathy, unaccompanied by acts of hostility, is not disloyalty. I insist that claimants who may have sympathized with the South and yet who proved true to the Government, who were guilty of no act of secret or open hostility during the war, are as much entitled to compensation for property taken by the Government and applied to its use as those who did not sympathize with the South and who furnished nothing. Every citizen who gave no aid and comfort to the enemy, but adhered to the Government, who was taxed to carry it on, who perhaps gave hundreds of dollars to raise bounties for the enlistment of volunteers, does not lose his legal right to compensation for property taken because he may have sympathized, or said he sympathized, with the South. Acts speak louder than words. I think the Quartermaster-General is in error in supposing a mere sympathizer with the South, whose sympathy found no expression in acts, whose property has been taken by the Government, is not entitled to compensation.

But I object to the present mode of adjudication of these claims by the departments, upon another ground. They are intrusted to subordinates at distant points, who have neither the time nor the ability properly to investigate into the merits of each claim, who act on hearsay testimony, and who, therefore, have not the proof properly to pass upon the rights of the Government or the rights of the claimant. The allowance of compensation for property is a judicial question; it should be investigated upon evidence. Legal testimony should be weighed and compared, and then the claim should be decided upon calmly and deliberately. This can never be done so long as these claims remain to be adjudicated upon in the Commissary Department or the Quartermaster Department. They have not the force, the time, or proper facilities for certain or correct results. The duties of the office require too much of their time to allow proper investigation and deliberation on war claims. I speak from experience. I know claims in Kentucky, the justice of which is not denied, to the amount of hundreds of thousands of dollars, which have, after a delay of years, been passed upon and rejected because the Quartermaster-General has, conscientiously no doubt, acted on reports from subordinates, who, without proper examination and without legal testimony, have reported against the claim; or, if the claim was proved, has, upon hearsay testimony of the claimant's personal enemies, reported that he sympathized with the South. Was he guilty of any act of insubordination? No. Was he guilty of any act of disloyalty? No. Had he done anything illegal? Nothing. But persons inimical to him, or perhaps his own frank admissions that he sympathized with the South, but had been always loyal, made to some subordinate, sent out ten years after the war to investigate his claim—upon such an ex parte report you deny him the justice of paying him a quid pro quo for property taken by the Government and applied to its own use. Is that just? Is that the mode in which the Government will, or can, cultivate, through every part of this Republic, a love for its administration of justice? I say, no sir; and I repeat that the whole system upon which such adjudication rests is wrong in theory and unjust in practice. It should be changed, and changed promptly. Every hour's delay works wrong and injustice to the Government and claimant alike.

The amendment I propose relieves the Quartermaster's Department and the Commissary Department from all these war claims, and commits their adjudication and examination upon legal testimony to the Court of Claims. They have time, and they possess ability, which enable them to decide every claim upon a legal and equitable basis. Their judgment will rest upon a full examination of the testimony and evidence offered by the Government and by the claimant alike.

We have in the Court of Claims a proper judicial tribunal for accurate adjudication. The amendment proposes that the Court of Claims shall appoint commissioners, one for each Federal judicial district throughout the United States. It is to be the duty of these commissioners to investigate the claims of the claimants, and take testimony in support of or against the validity of the claim, and the loyalty or disloyalty of the claimant, and to report the evidence to the Court of Claims, where each case can be heard and judicially decided. If the amount exceed $3,000, either party may have an appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States.

I am unable to see what possible objection can exist to the general plan of this amendment. I am sure that claims are now often paid by the United States which ought not to be paid. I am equally well satisfied that there are just claimants who are entitled to compensation, but who have been denied compensation upon illegal testimony, and upon erroneous and inaccurate reports. This amendment will overcome existing obstacles to correct results. It seeks in the main to do justice both to the Government and to the claimant. It gives time for a thorough investigation, not only of the testimony offered by the claimant, but by all rebutting testimony which the Government can or chooses to offer. All claims will be judicially decided, and when disposed of the judgment of the court will be final and conclusive, unless where the amount authorizes an appeal to the Supreme Court.

The Commissary-General and the Quartermaster-General both desire to get rid of these claims. These officers are well satisfied that they have not the time, in justice to the duties of the office, and that the testimony upon which they are compelled to act is often incomplete, the result of which must be unsatisfactory, if not unsafe, conclusions.

But another argument in favor of this. In this way we shall hasten the adjudication of these claims; Congress will get rid of applications which now crowd our committees; and in every aspect in which I have been able to look at it, I think the Court of Claims is the proper tribunal. They will have ample time to investigate and to decide, and correct results will be reached both upon the side of the Government and upon the side of the claimants.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, it seems to me that this is the most extraordinary proposition of legislation that I have ever heard since I have been in the Senate. It is that on an appropriation bill we should undertake to change the whole judicature of the nation in reference to these claims; to appoint commissioners for every judicial district in the rebel States and in some of the other States, who are to take testimony in order to make out these claims against the United States. Further than that, we are by a statute to recognize what I do not understand to be the law at all, that the United States is bound to pay for the occupation of real estate by the Army of the United States, even within the enemy's lines. There is no such law of nations; there are no such claims against the United States; and yet we are now asked by a statute to recognize that as a binding law upon this country.

Further, their Court of Claims is to entertain all claims "for damage to, or destruction of, the real or personal property of any citizen during said rebellion, whenever the same was damaged or destroyed by competent military authority as a military necessity, to weaken and harass the enemy, or to protect, assist, and strengthen the United States forces." That is, we are by statute now to recognize that the Treasury of the United States is to be drawn upon, by every one who can bring evidence of his loyalty, for all the damage that was done by Sherman's march to the sea. Well, sir, if the Treasury of the United States could be drawn upon to pay the loyal people of the North for all that they suffered, for all their loss of property, there might be some justice and some propriety in this measure; but that is not the proposition. The proposition is that they shall go unpaid, and that you shall draw upon their property to pay for these alleged losses at the South.

Then this amendment goes on and directs that the Court of Claims "shall appoint as many commissioners as it may deem necessary and convenient for the speedy determination of the pending cases, not less than one for each judicial district of the United States for the States recently in rebellion, as well as for the States of Kentucky, Missouri, Maryland, and West Virginia;" and it further authorizes the Attorney-General to appoint a corps of officers, that is, to appoint in each one of the judicial districts a competent person, with a salary, to act in behalf of the United States. Then another thing the amendment contains is a repeal of the limitation which is about expiring under the act for the collection of abandoned property, opening the Treasury of the United States now, at this period, to every possible claim that can be conceived of in all the States that were in rebellion, and in the four other States named; and that is to be done with the Senate but half filled, by an amendment to an appropriation bill. Mr. President, I move to lay the amendment on the table.

Mr. STEVENSON. I hope the Senator will withdraw that motion until I can reply to his argument.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I will withdraw the motion for that purpose; but the Senator made his argument some time ago.

Mr. STEVENSON. O, no; I have not replied to my friend's argument.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Very well; I will withdraw the motion for the present.

Mr. STEVENSON. The gentleman states, as it seems to me, a most extraordinary proposition of law. I am certainly much more astounded by his showy and confident denial that a government is responsible to its loyal people for property taken from them for its own use than he can possibly be by any proposition stated by me.

There are two sorts of damages. A nation which makes war has a right to pass through its territory; and if war takes place, and in that conflict the subject's property is destroyed, the nation is not liable; but if the government seizes property, fearing that it will fall into the hands of the enemy; or if the government destroys a house for fear the enemy may get an advantageous lodgment, or that such house may be in the way of defense, then I submit that upon principle and authority the government is liable; and if my honorable friend, whose legal reputation far exceeds mine, has never heard of that doctrine, I promise to establish it to his satisfaction by text-books of acknowledged merit as well as by reports of adjudicated cases in State and Federal courts.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Will my friend permit me just there?

Mr. STEVENSON. Certainly.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I would inform my friend that I have heard of what the law on this subject is pretty thoroughly; for as long ago as 1868 I had the honor for several days in this Senate to argue this very question; and I think I know all that the books state on the subject. I will say further that the books do not state, and my friend cannot find the authority, that a government is liable for damages done in war inside of the lines of the enemy.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. President, I do not understand any distinction about enemy's lines when the Government takes the property of its citizens and applies it to its own use. The only distinction I suppose to be recognized is, that if the loss of property results from or is destroyed in battle, the Government is not liable and does not pay, whether inside or outside the enemy's lines, or whether such battle occurs in a loyal or in a disloyal State. But if the Government takes private property, or causes the property of its citizens to be destroyed, either to prevent such property from falling into the hands of the enemy or to prevent the occupation of such property by the enemy in the event of battle, then I insist the Government is liable for property of its citizens thus taken or destroyed.

Let me illustrate the principle, as I claim it, so that there can be no misunderstanding between the Senator from New Jersey and myself. I undertake to say that if the Union and the confederate armies had joined battle, as they frequently did during the war, in Kentucky, and a citizen's house was directed, before the conflict began, to be seized and burned by the order of the United States general in command, either to prevent the enemy from taking shelter in it or because it might impede the assault of the United States troops during the fight, then the Government is liable. Does the Senator from New Jersey admit or deny that proposition? Further: I insist if there were salt-works or powder-works, or flour-mills, in any State where the United States troops and the confederate army were, and the Government threatening battle, and it was feared by the commander of the United States forces that the works named, or the salt, powder, or flour stored therein might fall into the enemy's hands, and in order to prevent such a catastrophe the officer commanding directed these works, belonging to loyal citizens, to be destroyed, is not the Government of the United States liable? I say it is; and I defy contradiction by any authority, either in the text-books or in the reports of recognized authority.

Now I will cite some authority, notwithstanding the statement of the honorable Senator that he is thoroughly posted in the law, which goes, as I think, to refute his position, if I understand him correctly. He states the law to be that the Government is not liable for property of a loyal citizen seized and appropriated in Kentucky if in enemies' lines. Vattel discusses this question. He says:

> Such damages are of two kinds: those done by the state itself or the sovereign, and those done by the enemy. Of the first kind some are done deliberately and by way of precaution, as when a field, a house, a garden, belonging to a private person, is taken for the purpose of erecting on the spot a town rampart, or any other piece of fortification, or when his standing corn or his store-houses are destroyed to prevent their being of use to the enemy. Such damages are to be made good to the individual, who should bear only his quota of the loss.

Claims for property taken by the Government in the instances put by Vattel are precisely the character of claims provided for in my amendment. Vattel is high authority, but if his doctrine be denied others are at hand. Grotius asserts the same doctrine. He says:

> The king may in two ways deprive his subjects of their right, either by way of punishment or by virtue of his eminent power. But if he do so in the last way, it must be for some public advantage, and then the subject ought to receive, if possible, a just satisfaction for the losses he suffers out of the common stock.

Again he says:

> The state has an eminent right of property over the goods of the subjects, so that the state, or those that represent it, may make use of them, and even destroy and alienate them, not only in extreme necessity, but for the public benefit, to which we must add that the state is obliged to repair the damages suffered by any subject on that account out of the public stock.

Here, again, Grotius enumerates the cases covered by my proposed amendment. In the county of Kenton, and within a mile or two of the city where I have lived for more than thirty years, the Federal and confederate armies met face to face, in full survey of the city of Cincinnati. But after great preparation the confederate army retreated, without a battle, and without a pursuit by the Union forces. The private property of many citizens was appropriated by the Government for its own use. Wood was cut and taken, valuable land was seized and appropriated by the United States for fortifications, and a great deal of the land rendered unfit for use for years. Does the honorable Senator from New Jersey insist that, in instances like that cited, loyal citizens whose property was seized and appropriated by the Government are not entitled to reparation by the United States? Mr. William Whiting, whose authority the Senator will not, I am sure, question, as a cautious and able writer on this subject, says:

> If the private property of loyal citizens, inhabitants of loyal States, is appropriated by our military forces for the purpose of supplying our armies and to aid in prosecuting hostilities against a public enemy, the Government is bound to give a reasonable compensation therefor to the owner.

Again he says:

> When individuals are called upon to give up what is their own for the advantage of the community, justice requires that they should be fully compensated for it. Otherwise public burdens would be shared unequally.

Again he says;

> Public use does not require that the property taken shall be actually used. It may be disused, removed, or destroyed, and destruction of private property may be the best public use it can be put to. Suppose a bridge owned by a private corporation to be so located as to endanger our forts upon the banks of a river. To demolish that bridge for military purposes would be to appropriate it to public use.

Private property may be destroyed by the order of the commanding general, and the destruction of it may be the best public use it can be put to. Suppose a bridge owned by a private corporation is located so as to endanger the forts upon the banks of a river, suppose a house to be interposed between our guns and the enemy's, and the commanding general commands that they shall be destroyed—no compensation! The Senator's argument boldly leads to that result.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. If my friend wants an answer, I can answer him. I understand the law to be very clear, that if a house is destroyed within the lines of the Government, within the Union lines, it is to be paid for; and I understand it to be just exactly as clear that if it is destroyed within the enemy's lines, it is not to be paid for. If a loyal person is within the enemy's lines with his person or his property, it takes the complexion of the enemy's country, and for all purposes of law becomes enemy's property; and that is the law.

Mr. STEVENSON. If my friend had uttered that sentiment during the war in some parts of the country he might at periods of great excitement have been taken up and hung as a disloyal man.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I think it is very likely I would have been hung in Kentucky during the war if I had been there. [Laughter.]

Mr. STEVENSON. He would. I say as a disloyal man. Why? Because by "enemy's country" many might have deduced an implication he thought the States had a right to secede and the United States had no right by coercion to force them into the Union. The United States claimed the whole Union, and that as the acts of secession were held null and void, then there was legally no enemy's country. Had the confederates with their armies reached New Jersey, as they did Ohio and Pennsylvania, and that government had, for its own use, seized property of loyal citizens of New Jersey, would the Government be released because the confederates had penetrated New Jersey and the property was taken in the enemy's lines?

If the Government had burned a house at Gettysburgh, Pennsylvania, to prevent the rebels from occupying it, or appropriated other property of loyal citizens, is the Government, not liable to make reparation? Were there not enemy's lines at Gettysburgh? and were not the lines of the Union troops and the confederates continually changing during the war? And how could the great principle of law, rendering the Government liable to its loyal citizens for a seizure of property taken and appropriated to its own use, be demonstrated a whit by the continually varying lines of the enemy?

I can well understand how property belonging to citizens and destroyed in battle by either army, Union or confederate, does render the Government liable for such loss. But I do not understand what the Senator means when he so broadly states that if the Government appropriates property of its loyal citizens to its own use, and not in battle, but within the enemy's lines, the Government is not liable.

Mr. CARPENTER. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. STEVENSON. Certainly.

Mr. CARPENTER. Will not the same logic by which the Senator proves that there was no enemy's country, prove that there was no enemy?

Mr. STEVENSON. By no sort of means. I have not said there were no enemies' lines, and still less that there were no enemies—that is, many brave and gallant men whom the Government regarded and treated as enemies. The Supreme Court of the United States will give my friend the answer, that this rebellion was to be carried on by the same rules of war as though it were England instead of a part of the United States.

Mr. CARPENTER. Exactly. Suppose our armies had destroyed a house in Canada, would the Government have paid for it?

Mr. STEVENSON. Probably not. That would depend on circumstances.

Mr. CARPENTER. Well, in Liverpool.

Mr. STEVENSON. Just the same.

Mr. CARPENTER. Then, if the same principle applies to the war between the North and South as would apply to a war between us and England, if we destroyed a house outside our lines we would not pay for it.

Mr. STEVENSON. I have not said there were no enemies—or no enemies' lines; but I claim that property taken by the United States from its own loyal citizens, and applied to its own use, renders the Government liable, whether taken within or without the enemy's lines; and that, whether the confederate army had gone to Wisconsin and stretched its line of battle in that beautiful and growing State, the Government would still have been liable for private property taken and applied to its own use, whether taken within or without the confederate lines. I put this question to the Senator from Wisconsin:

If the confederate army had penetrated to Wisconsin, as it might have done, and there the Union Army, in the same State, had seized private property in the city of Milwaukee, for the purpose of fortifying the city before the confederate army had reached there, does he assert that the loyal owner of that property thus seized had had no claim against the United States and entitled to no reparation? I await the reply of the honorable Senator. It is a fair thing, when a Senator begins during a debate to ask questions, that he should in turn answer some; and I shall be glad to have mine answered.

Mr. CARPENTER. Certainly; and the answer to the question is a very plain one. The Senator starts out with a question, and instead of adhering to it he changes and asks a totally different one. He says, suppose the rebel army had got into Wisconsin; and then he terminates his question by saying, suppose the Government had taken property before they got into Wisconsin.

Mr. STEVENSON. My friend, I hope, does not desire to quibble.

Mr. CARPENTER. Your friend does not want to quibble. We want to be understood on this question.

Mr. STEVENSON. I shall be most happy to make my question clear and intelligible. I do not desire an answer until the Senator understands my question. I put a question involving one phase of the legal proposition of law which we are discussing so pleasantly as friends and lawyers.

Mr. CARPENTER. Certainly.

Mr. STEVENSON. Now, the question I propound is, had the confederate army reached Wisconsin, and were already approaching Milwaukee, where the Union army was intrenched awaiting its arrival, and the Federal Government had burned a dozen houses which the commanding general of the United States forces deemed advisable, as they impeded a clear view of the approach of the enemy, and the houses thus seized were the property of loyal citizens of Wisconsin, would, or not, the Government be liable for reparation, although within enemies' lines?

Mr. CARPENTER. Mr. President, I understand the principle of law to be well settled. The taking of property by the Government in a loyal country, in our own country, is always to be compensated. The taking of property for the purpose of destruction—if he chooses to style that the taking of property—is not to be compensated if it be taken in enemy's country and destroyed for the purpose of weakening the enemy. Now, then, to answer the particular case which the Senator puts about Wisconsin; while Wisconsin was held by the Government and no army was upon its soil, if the Government had taken this property for any purpose, that would be one thing. But suppose the rebel army had reached Wisconsin, had taken possession of Milwaukee, and was using it as its base of operations, and from the public buildings of Milwaukee they were sending forth missiles upon the Union works around the city, does any man suppose that if, in the progress of an actual battle in Milwaukee, the Union army had destroyed a portion of that town and driven the rebels out of it, the Government would be liable to compensate for that property? When it was once taken and held in permanent occupation by the rebel troops, then it became the enemy's country. I am very happy to say there was never any danger of that being the case in Milwaukee; and if the Senator's friends—I do not mean his friends, but his constituents—had not drawn the nice distinction which he does between their affections and their conduct; if they had been as loyal in their hearts as he says they were in their conduct, there might have been less of this property now to be compensated for.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. President, I shall not undertake to go into a discussion of the war. You cannot discuss a legal question in the Senate that the war is not discussed, and a fling at Kentucky. Whenever Wisconsin shall be shown to have furnished abler or braver men in defense of the flag, or made greater sacrifices for the Union, than Kentucky did, it will then be time enough to consider who excelled in that conflict. We are now discussing the legal liability of the Government for property of its loyal citizens seized and applied to its own use. I am not to be driven from the point at issue by an irrelevant reference to Kentucky's action in the war.

I call the Senate to witness, when the Senator from Wisconsin interrupted me he asked if property was taken in the enemy's lines by the Government for its own use, and not in battle, whether I thought the Government was liable. He denied it. I put the question flatly to him if the confederate army had penetrated Wisconsin, the Government of the United States had seized private property of loyal people and applied it to its own use, in order to prepare for the approach of the confederate army, was the Government not liable? And how does the Senator answer? Why he says it is well settled the Government would be liable for private property destroyed in a loyal country, but not for property destroyed in battle. But when the confederate army reached Wisconsin, what about the enemy's lines that the Senator first spoke of? Were the line of confederate bayonets, when in Wisconsin, less an enemy's line than when in Kentucky?

If the Government is not liable for property of its citizens seized and applied to its own use in Kentucky, because within the enemy's lines, why does not the same doctrine apply to enemy's lines at Gettysburgh or at Milwaukee? My question has been evaded rather than answered. The Senator asked me, if property were taken by the United States and applied to its own use in Canada or Liverpool in the event of a war with England, whether the Government would be liable. I said that would depend upon whether the property seized was the property of a loyal American citizen; if so the Government would be liable, even in an enemy's country. Let us see what Judge Taney says on the subject. I read from 13 Howard, page 115——

Mr. CARPENTER. My friend had better read the Prize cases, where the court passed on this very question.

Mr. STEVENSON. One decision at a time. I will come to the Prize cases presently. I am now upon the special point whether there cannot be a claim against the Government of the United States for personal property taken for public use even in an enemy's country, if the property be the property of a loyal citizen. Judge Taney says:

> There are, without doubt, occasions in which private property may occasionally be taken possession of or destroyed to prevent it from falling into the hands of the public enemy.

He does not say within any line; he does not say within any particular domain.

Mr. CARPENTER. Will the Senator state whether that is the case where the man whose property was taken was traveling with the Army, and under its protection?

Mr. STEVENSON. No; the case cited was during Doniphan's expedition, where Colonel Mitchell, of Saint Louis, at the head of a part of the Army, seized property belonging to an American citizen lest it should fall into the hands of the enemy.

Mr. CARPENTER. But was not that citizen traveling with the Army and under its protection?

Mr. STEVENSON. I do not remember, nor does that fact make the least difference.

Mr. CARPENTER. I want to know the fact.

Mr. STEVENSON. I want to read law, and show that the principles of law as laid down cannot be affected by the fact whether the citizen whose property was taken was traveling or stationary. Now listen:

> There are, without doubt, occasions in which private property may occasionally be taken possession of or destroyed to prevent it from falling into the hands of the public enemy, and also where a military officer charged with a particular duty may impress private property into the public service or take it for public use. Unquestionably, in such cases, the Government is bound to make full compensation to the owner.

When the confederate army came into the State of Kentucky and met the Federal troops under General Nelson, at Big Hill, in Madison County, property of loyal citizens was taken and appropriated by the Government. These honest men have not yet been paid. If the astounding doctrines of law this day announced by the Senators of Wisconsin and New Jersey be true, they are in great danger of never being compensated. I confess I cannot perceive how the enemy's lines, in the late rebellion, can destroy or diminish the liability of the Government for the appropriation of private property of loyal men to its own use because it is in a locality where the confederate army was intrenched.

I must say, with profound respect to the Senator from New Jersey and the Senator from Wisconsin, that I have never heard the doctrine for which they contend in text-books or reports; it is at war with the whole action of Congress for the past fifty years. I had not supposed that the liability of the Government would be doubted; and I can but hope it will find no substantial support in or out of Congress.

The Prize cases, according to my reading, do not sustain the doctrine that the property of loyal citizens can be seized and appropriated by the Government with impunity in enemy's lines. Does the honorable Senator from Wisconsin seriously believe that if we were to invade Canada, and were to find the vacant house of a loyal American citizen in Montreal and were to seize and appropriate the house as a public necessity to Government use, or from military necessity were to burn it, that the Government would not be liable? If we were to seize any property, not in war, that belonged to him, as a matter of military necessity, does the gentleman insist that the Government would not be liable?

Mr. CARPENTER. I totally disagree.

Mr. STEVENSON. Then the gentleman thinks that the right of eminent domain, which is the right of a sovereign to appropriate to public use the property of the individual, and which right the Constitution of the United States denies shall ever be exercised by the Government, without first making just compensation—he thinks that that right is to be regulated by the fact of the actual position of the Army when the property is taken, or by the latitude or longitude in which the contending forces happen to be at the time of the seizure of such property.

Mr. CARPENTER. If the Senator will allow me a moment, I should like to get at a distinct understanding between us.

Mr. STEVENSON. Certainly.

Mr. CARPENTER. If we were at war with England, for instance, and sent our Army to invade Canada, the moment we crossed the Canadian line we should be in enemy's country. Any person domiciled there, doing business there, is, for the purposes of war, enemy's person and enemy's property; and we could no more distinguish between the property of an American citizen residing there and the property of a British subject residing there than we could draw any other distinction that has no existence. It is an impossibility.

We invade a country; that whole country is enemy's country. Just as soon as the principle came to be applied in the late war that it was a territorial war; as soon as the exchange of prisoners was agreed upon, then the Supreme Court, in the Prize cases, held that it became a geographical war, and that everything outside the lines of the Union was enemy's property. That is the distinction.

The case in which the Senator has read from the opinion in 13 Howard, was the case of a man traveling into Mexico under the protection of the Army with goods, a merchant, encouraged to go and under the protection of our Army. His property was taken; and there it was held that the Government should pay for it, just as the court would hold if the Government had destroyed private property of the general commanding the forces. It was a mere matter of justice between us and men in our Army, whether as merchants, or generals, or officers; but the Supreme Court never would have held such a doctrine in regard to American citizens who had been permanently residing in Mexico.

Mr. STEVENSON. The gentleman is mistaken in the facts of Harmony's case entirely. The court decided that the public peril did not authorize Colonel Mitchell to destroy the property of the citizen which he did destroy lest it might fall into the enemy's hands. The court decided, if the peril had been imminent, the Government would have been responsible, but that the officer seizing and destroying private property did so at his peril. The court held Colonel Mitchell personally liable to the claimant for the property destroyed, and subsequently Congress passed a bill paying this judgment against Mitchell. That precedent is against the Senator.

I understand, I think, the principle in the Prize cases. I have not looked at them lately. The Senator is greatly in error in supposing that the principle there settled antagonizes with the principle of liability by the Government to loyal citizens for property seized and appropriated to its own use in the enemy's country. The Senator is greatly in error in supposing that if I had been a loyal citizen in Savannah, and on declaration of war I had left there and come North, and joined the Union Army, and on reaching Savannah General Sherman, as a military necessity, burned my house, not in battle, but expecting an attack, I say the Government is bound to make reparation to the loyal owner of that house. The Senator denies it. I say so by the authority of the Prize cases. The reasoning of the decision in those cases overrules that principle.

The ruling in the Prize cases only held that in a seizure of a vessel belonging to the public enemy they could not distinguish between the goods on that vessel belonging to a Union citizen and a rebel citizen of Virginia.

The secession of the Commonwealth of Virginia from the Union and joining the rebellion had decided the status of all her people. The State was a public enemy, and so no discrimination could be drawn between the rebels and the Union people, so far as the seizure of the vessel went. The character of public enemy of Virginia was technically impressed on her people, and the vessel and her contents were a prize.

Now, I cite the case of General George H. Thomas, of the Union Army. He was a native of Southampton County, Virginia. He left property in Virginia, and joined his destinies with the United States and led the Union armies. Had General Grant burned his house in Southampton as a military necessity, the Senator would deny the liability of the Government to pay General Thomas, because, he says, it was in the enemy's country. Is the Senator in earnest?

But, Mr. President, I have tired the Senate too long. This debate has been sprung upon me and was wholly unexpected. I had no conception that the amendment would awaken so much ire, and precipitate a debate which I had no dream of. Lawyers often differ on important questions both of the Constitution and the law.

The honorable Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] and myself differ toto cœlo on the true construction of several clauses in the Constitution of the United States. He thinks, by way of illustration, that the clause to "pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare" is a distinct, substantive grant of power, and under it he proposes to make an appropriation of $15,000,000 for the centennial celebration at Philadelphia.

There are able and eminent men who have agreed with him in this construction, and that the clause empowering Congress "to lay and collect taxes, excises, duties, and imposts, to provide for the common defense and general welfare," contains not one, but two substantive grants of power.

There are other jurists and statesmen who, with Judge Story, insist that the power to lay taxes, duties, excises, and imposts was limited by the subsequent clause relative to the public defense and general welfare; and, as I argued the other day, unless the centennial exposition can be shown to be for the common defense or the general welfare, the power to make any appropriation, at least under that clause, does not exist.

I hope the amendment I offered will be adopted. It is an act of tardy justice to those whose property the Government has used. Millions of dollars are due to poor and honest men for property used and appropriated by the Government of the United States. They shrink from no investigation, they are ready to go into the Court of Claims, and by judicial investigation establish the amounts due them by the Government—so long due them and unjustly withheld.

Mr. CARPENTER. Mr. President, turning to the case of Mitchell vs. Harmony, in 13 Howard, and reading from the opinion of the court the statement of the facts, I find the following:

The trading expedition in which the plaintiff and the other traders were engaged was, at the time they set out, authorized by the laws of the United States. And when General Kearney arrived they were permitted to follow in the rear and to trade freely in all such places as might be subdued and occupied by the American arms. The plaintiff and other traders availed themselves of this permission and followed the Army to Santa Fé.

These were the circumstances in which this man's property was situated. He was under the protection of this Government. He was trading in obedience to our laws, and under the protection of our arms; and, under these circumstances, the court held that an officer of the Army had no right to destroy his property. I am not going into any general debate on this subject. It is one which has been debated in this Chamber for weeks. I intend, when I conclude, to move to lay this amendment on the table. I shall, therefore, not pretend to go at large into the discussion, or into a full reply to the Senator from Kentucky, but wish to call his attention to one paragraph in the decision in the Prize cases, which is the law pronounced by the highest judicial tribunal in the land upon the precise question under discussion.

The court say:

Under the very peculiar Constitution of this Government, although the citizens owe supreme allegiance to the Federal Government, they owe also a qualified allegiance to the State in which they are domiciled. Their persons and property are subject to its laws.

Hence, in organizing this rebellion, they have acted as States claiming to be sovereign over all persons and property within their respective limits, and asserting a right to absolve their citizens from their allegiance to the Federal Government. Several of these States have combined to form a new confederacy, claiming to be acknowledged by the world as a sovereign state. Their right to do so is now being decided by wager of battle. The ports and territory of each of these States are held in hostility to the General Government. It is no loose, unorganized insurrection, having no defined boundary or possession. It has a boundary marked by lines of bayonets, and which can be crossed only by force. South of this line is enemies' territory, because it is claimed and held in possession by an organized, hostile, and belligerent power.

A power at war at that time with the Government of the United States.

All persons residing within this territory whose property may be used to increase the revenues of the hostile power are, in this contest, liable to be treated as enemies, though not foreigners. They have cast off their allegiance and made war on their Government, and are none the less enemies because they are traitors.

The doctrine of the Supreme Court of the United States, clearly enunciated over and over again, is that the war which has just closed was a territorial war, and that all within the lines of actual military possession by the rebels was enemy's country, and every man living there was an enemy in the eye of the law, and must be so treated, and his property was enemy's property. If destroyed in the course of military operations, it was like any other destruction of enemy's property; and its destruction does not constitute a claim against the Government.

Mr. HOWE. Will my colleague allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CARPENTER. Certainly.

Mr. HOWE. Independently of the language (which I think not very fully guarded) which he has just quoted from the decision of the court, does he not himself think there is a great difference between calling a man living on one side of this line an enemy and calling his property enemy property?

Mr. CARPENTER. I do not. I do not understand that a rebel, for instance Jeff. Davis, after he was fairly embarked in the rebellion, could, to save his property, leave it in the South, and by simply coming across our lines save his property. It was still enemy's property, because property in an enemy's country, which might be made to contribute to carry on the war against the Union.

Mr. HOWE. I concede that the property is by the law considered enemy's property, all property on one side of that line; but I do not think that public law or municipal law ever undertook to designate an individual as an enemy simply because his property was in one place rather than in another.

Mr. CARPENTER. If that is what my colleague means, I am with him decidedly. I do not understand, for instance, that my colleague, sitting in the Senate from 1862 to 1870, and standing faithfully by the cause of the Union, could have been denounced as a public enemy if it could have been shown that he owned forty acres of land in South Carolina. That I never claimed, of course. Yet his land, if it was capable of producing anything that would aid the army, was enemy's property; that is to say, being in an enemy's country, it was subject to all the burdens which the government could lay upon any other property found in that country. That is all I mean.

Mr. HOWE. But the language of the court goes further than that, does it not?

Mr. CARPENTER. I do not understand that it does. I understand the object of the court in this language was to say that this war was to stand on the footing of a geographical war; and that within the lines held permanently by the enemy everything was enemy's, whether men or things; and the court was not drawing the distinction between men residing or not residing there. The court said:

All persons residing within this territory—

That is, enemy's territory—are enemies.

They never said, and never meant to say, that a man residing within the Union lines was to be regarded as an enemy because he owned enemy property, that is, property within the enemy's lines.

Mr. STEVENSON. I ask the Senator from Wisconsin where is that boundary? I want to come to an application of principles to facts. Where does he understand the Supreme Court of the United States to place the line?

Mr. CARPENTER. Let the court answer that question. I read from the decision:

It has a boundary marked by lines of bayonets, and which can be crossed only by force.

That is the line of the enemy's country. It was not State lines; it was the line of force; it was the line of the bayonet; it was the point beyond which you could not go, except by the exercise of force. That was the line which separated the Union from the enemy's country.

Mr. STEVENSON. Then the Senator thinks that Kentucky and Missouri were both within what the Supreme Court intended to establish as enemy country in that opinion?

Mr. CARPENTER. That depends upon a question of fact, which I am not able to answer at this moment. If those States were held out of this Union by bayonets, by the distinctly drawn line of military occupation, and we could not pass into either of those States except by force, they were enemy's country; otherwise not.

But let me call attention to one provision of this amendment——

Mr. WEST. If the Senator will permit me, I should like to call his attention to the fact that the destruction of property by the United States forces for which these claimants seek recompense here, occurred in territory that was afterward and at the time of the destruction occupied by the United States forces; and I ask him, was that enemy's country after that line of bayonets had been stricken down and the Union armies had taken possession of that territory? Was it then enemy's country under that decision of the Supreme Court?

Mr. CARPENTER. I want to call attention for a moment to a precise provision of one part of this amendment. The fourth class of cases in which the Court of Claims is to have jurisdiction reads as follows:

Also for damages to, or destruction of, the real or personal property of any citizen during said rebellion, whenever the same was damaged or destroyed by competent military authority as a military necessity, to weaken and harass the enemy, or to protect, assist, and strengthen the United States forces.

As I understand that provision, every man's horse who was killed in battle is the subject of a claim in the court. If General Lee had been riding a horse owned by my colleague—to return to the case which he put to me—at Gettysburgh, and that horse had been shot, my colleague could under this bill go into the Court of Claims and present a claim for that horse. There is no exception in this amendment that I can find, which would save property destroyed in actual conflict of arms from being compensated for.

Mr. SARGENT. The Senator from Wisconsin will allow me further to suggest that there is no limit on the question of loyalty or disloyalty there.

Mr. CARPENTER. So I understand. This is all I propose to say on this amendment now.

Mr. STEVENSON. Let me call the Senator's attention to what is evidently a mistake in his reference to the opinion in the Prize cases. He did not read the first part of it, or I am sure he would have seen his error.

Mr. CARPENTER. I said nothing about the Prize cases except to read from the opinion.

Mr. STEVENSON. But you did not read enough. I asked you where the line was, and you said just where the bayonets were.

Mr. CARPENTER. I did not say that. I read what the court said.

Mr. STEVENSON. You did not read enough.

Mr. CARPENTER. I read all that was material, I think.

Mr. STEVENSON. I propose to read a little more. I thought certainly this opinion confined that line to the seceded States. I see on looking at it that it does, and I will read:

Hence, in organizing this rebellion, they have acted as States claiming to be sovereign over all persons and property within their respective limits, and asserting a right to absolve their citizens from their allegiance to the Federal Government. Several of these States have combined to form a new confederacy, claiming to be acknowledged by the world as a sovereign state—

A sovereign government.

Their right to do so is now being decided by wager of battle. The ports and territory of each of these States are held in hostility to the General Government. It is no loose, unorganized insurrection, having no defined boundary or possession. It has a boundary marked——

What has a marked boundary? This confederate government; these seceded States, territorially known, both their ports and everything else.

It has a boundary marked by lines of bayonets, and which can be crossed only by force. South of this line is enemy's territory.

Mr. CARPENTER. There is no possible way to escape the plain meaning of the opinion. Of course my friend does not mean to escape.

Mr. STEVENSON. No, indeed.

Mr. CARPENTER. And there is no way to render it ambiguous.

Mr. STEVENSON. I think not.

Mr. CARPENTER. The court say in deciding the proposition that all the country which was held in actual and continuous military possession against the United States was enemy's country, and as a part of the argument leading to that conclusion, that these States were organized communities, and made war in their corporate capacity.

Mr. STEVENSON. To show my friend that he is entirely misapprehending the opinion, and that there can be no doubt about it, I propose to read him a decision which shows that the Government is responsible for property where both sides were in conflict and outside of the confederate lines. They have decided in the Court of Claims this identical question.

Mr. CARPENTER. I should want to see at least two decisions of the Court of Claims before I should admit it to be law, or before I should vote an appropriation to pay a judgment rendered upon that principle. I say the Supreme Court of the United States in this opinion—and the doctrine has been steadily adhered to and always enforced in the subsequent decisions of the court—held the proposition that in this war the country held by the enemy in military possession, continuous actual occupation, was enemy's country. The court, in reasoning on the subject, alluded to the fact that the Union is composed of States, and that these States had made war as States, and assumed to take all their people out of the Union; and they speak of their territory and property as being enemy's territory and property; but when we come to the precise line marking enemy's country, they say:

It is not a loose, unorganized insurrection, having no defined boundary or possession. It has a boundary—

What has a boundary? This enemy's country has a boundary—marked by lines of bayonets, and which can be crossed only by force. South of this line—

That is, south of this line of bayonets—is enemy's territory, because it is claimed and held in possession by an organized, hostile, and belligerent power.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. And the Senator will allow me to say that long before there had been a line marked by authority of Congress and by proclamation of the President, well defined; and yet the court going upon the principle for which the Senator contends, enlarged that well-defined line as stated in that proclamation, by saying that notwithstanding that the line was marked by bayonets——

Mr. CARPENTER. We are not discussing now the question of fact as to where that line was. We are on the proposition contained in this amendment, of submitting all the questions in regard to the destruction of property within the enemy's line, wherever it was, whether it was on the north line of Kentucky or on the south line of Kentucky; whether it ran on the north line of the Gulf States or midway through them—submitting all the questions in regard to property south of that line to the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims, and it is for the present purpose quite immaterial where that line really was.

Mr. MERRIMON. I beg to ask the Senator a question, not to engage in the discussion. I desire to understand exactly the ground he occupies. I am not sure that I do.

Mr. CARPENTER. I am north of the enemy's line. [Laughter.]

Mr. MERRIMON. I do not think anybody can mistake that. [Laughter.] I wish to understand what position the Senator really occupies; and I will put a case to test it. An American citizen, in all respects in accord with his Government, happened to reside, in the year 1863, in the State of South Carolina, and he had lands and personal property there. The Union Army passed through that State and took his corn for the use of the Army, took his lumber for the use of the Army. Technically that citizen was in the enemy's country. That is a technical rule, and a purely technical rule. After the war is over, at this time, that same citizen, who had preserved his proper lawful relations with the Government, comes and asks the Government to pay him for his corn and for his lumber. Do I understand the Senator to say that in that case the Government is not bound to pay?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN rose.

Mr. CARPENTER. My friend from New Jersey wants to answer that question, and I yield to him.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I want to say a word or two on this subject in answer to the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. STEVENSON.] I understand the Senator from Kentucky to claim that it was wellnigh advancing a treasonable doctrine to assert that there was such a thing as an enemy's line in the recent rebellion; for we were all under the Union, all under the flag, and that if I had had the audacity or the courage——

Mr. STEVENSON. I did not use the word "audacity."

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. My friend did not use the word, but it amounts to that. He said that if I had had the courage to assert such a sentiment in Kentucky, I should have been hung as a rebel.

Mr. STEVENSON. No; my friend wholly misunderstands me. I did not confine it to Kentucky. It would have been worse in Philadelphia. I wish my friend to understand me. I understood him to say that there was enemy's country there. Well, if there was enemy's country there, the United States had a right to wage war to reclaim that country. If he had said that the men residing there were really enemies as a matter of right and had a territory which the United States could not legally reclaim, he would, in the estimation not of Kentuckians alone, but more particularly of Pennsylvanians, perhaps in Philadelphia during the excitement of the war, have been regarded as disloyal. Why? For the reason that secession had no sort of right, and that the Government had a right to reclaim the whole territory.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Well, Mr. President, whether disloyal or loyal, I shall submit to the Senate in a very few words that there is no question that there were well-defined lines between the Union and the confederate forces; that a different rule of law existed in reference to loyal people, whether they were on the one side or on the other side of that line; and it will not do after the war is over to come here and tell us that we were all one grand brotherhood, living under the star-spangled banner, and that it was treason to say that this nation was severed. Why, Mr. President, that very principle of recognizing this as a war, instead of as a rebellion, was the most humane principle that was ever adopted, and was commended by the courts on account of its humanity.

Mr. STEVENSON. Let the Senator understand me. I did not claim that so far as the seceded States went there was not a line. In reply to the Senator from Wisconsin, I said that the only enemy's line was the boundary of the seceded States; and the bill which I have offered as an amendment does not touch them.

Mr. CARPENTER. It does apply to everything south of that line, does it not?

Mr. STEVENSON. No; except Kentucky and Missouri.

Mr. SARGENT. I understand it applies to every State in the Union.

Mr. STEVENSON. Suppose it does?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. This proposition applies to every State of the Union, and applies especially to Kentucky, Missouri, Maryland, and West Virginia.

Mr. STEVENSON. Let it apply to them all.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I was saying, when last interrupted, that the principle of treating the rebellion as a war was on the side of humanity, and was commended by the courts. If it had been a mere rebellion, what would have been the obligation of the Government? It would have been to treat those captured as rebels and to execute them; and what would the consequence have been? Retaliation; our prisoners would have been executed; and it would have been a war of blood and carnage that would have more disgraced humanity than it did.

I do not intend to make any speech on this subject; but my friend seemed to think that there was no law to sustain those of us who oppose his proposition. Let me read him some. He has referred us to Vattel. Let me refer to that authority on this very subject, on page 293 of his great work:

> Civil war breaks the bands of society and government, or at least suspends their force and effect; it produces in the nation two independent parties, who can consider each other as enemies and acknowledge no common judge. These two parties, therefore, must necessarily be considered as constituting, at least for a time, two separate bodies, two distinct societies. Having no common superior to judge between them, they stand in precisely the same predicament as two nations who engage in a contest and have recourse to arms.

That is Vattel. Then, again, in the Prize cases, (2 Black, 674,) the Supreme Court say:

> All persons residing within this territory, whose property may be used to increase the resources of the hostile power, are in this contest liable to be treated as enemies, though they are not foreigners.

Again:

> The products of the soil of the hostile territory, as the source of its wealth and strength, are always regarded as legitimate prizes, without regard to the domicil of the owner, and much more so if he reside within their territory.

And that, perhaps, would answer the question put by the Senator from North Carolina. If the property was within the enemy's lines, "without regard to the domicil of the owner," it may be taken.

But still further, in the Alexander cotton case, found in 2 Wallace, page 419, the Chief Justice says:

> It is said that, though remaining in rebel territory, Mrs. Alexander had no personal sympathy with the rebel cause, and that her property, therefore, cannot be regarded as rebel property; but this court cannot inquire into the personal character and disposition of individual inhabitants of enemy territory; we must be governed by the principles of public law so often announced from this bench as applicable alike to civil and international wars, that all the people of each State or district in insurrection against the United States must be regarded as enemies until by the action of the Legislature and the executive, or otherwise, that relation is thoroughly and permanently changed.

I think that the authority of Vattel, that the authority of the Supreme Court of the United States, show clearly that this rebellion was to be treated as a war, and that we are not liable, as this amendment proposes, for all the ravages done by Sherman's army in his march to the sea.

This subject has been fully discussed heretofore, and it does seem to me that this amendment is, in its provisions, the most extravagant and the most unreasonable that I have ever known presented in this House. I move that it be laid on the table.

Mr. STEVENSON. I want to say to the Senator from New Jersey——

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. FERRY, of Michigan, in the chair.) The motion is not debatable.

Mr. STEVENSON. I am not going to debate it. I ask the Senator from New Jersey to withdraw it, that I may read him an authority.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I withdraw the motion; but I fear the discussion may continue for a day or two.

Mr. STEVENSON. I have the authority of the President of the United States on my side of this question. I think he saw about as much of the war as any one, and was as loyal a man as could be found. In 1870 Congress passed an act to pay Otis N. Cutler $50,000 for cotton taken by military authorities to pack the machinery of the steamer Tigress, to enable her more securely to run the rebel batteries at Vicksburgh. That was in the heart of the South, and the military authorities took his cotton. The boat and cotton were sunk on the trip, destroyed by the rebels. If the Government must pay for cotton taken by its Army, and then destroyed by the enemy, it would seem just as proper to pay for property taken by its Army, and then destroyed by itself. That act was passed by Congress, and approved by the President. The papers in the case show that the present President examined its merits while acting as Secretary of War, and although he refused to pay the claim, for want of authority, he pronounced it meritorious, and referred it to Congress. Subsequently Congress passed it, and he signed the bill. That was in the enemy's country; that was near Vicksburgh; and I suppose this was a loyal man; I do not know. I can cite cases not only in the late war with Great Britain, where reparation was made in the Eastern States; and this is the first time, so far as I have heard, that the liability of the Government has been questioned in such cases.

The President, I know, vetoed one bill; but in an argument of great power, which is unanswerable, by the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin, the colleague of my friend with whom I have had this discussion, he presented the whole question, and showed not only by the text-books, but by the theory and the practice of our Government, that it has always paid men whose property was taken for the use of the Army. Suppose war does dissolve partnerships; suppose it does separate communities; are not they restored when the war ceases? Will my honorable friend from New Jersey say that the whole history of this country is not bristling with precedents where upright, honest, poor men have been paid—not paid during the war but when the war ceased—for property which the United States appropriated? I do not care what line you use, when the war is over, and the Government took it not during battle but for its own use, it cannot make a cover of the fact of war, if the man was loyal, to keep it from paying him a quid pro quo; and I trust in God this Government never will do it. I do not care what latitude or what longitude such a claim comes from. Whenever any citizen of Wisconsin in any sort of war shall show that the Government of the United States, pendente bello, took his property for its use, my tongue I hope will be palsied if it does not say "ay" to a bill returning him the value of what the Government took. I shall not want to live under this Government when it shall undertake to avoid its responsibilities for property which it took from its people by saying, "Though we took it pendente bello, though we did take your honest house or your forage or your other property, and it was a public necessity that required it, yet you were on the other side of the loyal lines and therefore we will not pay you."

Mr. MERRIMON. Mr. President, in the course of the remarks of the honorable Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. CARPENTER,] by his leave, I propounded to him a respectful question. He declined to answer the question, but yielded to the Senator from New Jersey, who, he said, would answer. The Senator from New Jersey did not answer it or advert to it. I simply desire to say that he declined to answer the question which I propounded.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I beg the pardon of my friend. I read him an authority stating that all property within the enemy's lines, no matter what was the character of the individual in sentiment, whether loyal or disloyal, was subject to the rules applicable to enemy property; and I referred him, and called his attention at the time, to the Alexander cotton case as the announcement of that opinion by the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. MERRIMON. The gentleman has not answered my question to my satisfaction.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. That may be.

Mr. MERRIMON. I was anxious to understand both himself and the Senator from Wisconsin. The case I put was this: An American citizen having adhered in all respects to the Government of the Union, happened, in the year 1863, to reside in the State of South Carolina. The Army of the United States passed by his house, and took from him a thousand bushels of corn for the use of the Army, and a quantity of lumber for the use of the Army. This property was appropriated and used. The question is, can the Government decline to pay that debt to that citizen after the war has ceased?

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, I do not propose to debate the question before the Senate at all, but to make one or two remarks to justify the vote which I shall give upon a motion which I understand is to be submitted very soon, to lay the pending amendment upon the table. I shall be obliged to vote for that motion when it is made. I should be reluctant, however, to have it understood, either by the Senate or by the country, that in voting for that motion I was approving to the reasoning which I have heard advanced here against the pending amendment.

Some of the questions involved in the pending amendment have been heretofore discussed very largely in the Senate. Some of the questions involved in that amendment are novel, and have not received full consideration, if any consideration, in the Senate. I understand the whole measure contained in the pending amendment is now before the Committee on Claims. All the doctrines involved in that amendment are quite familiar to several very distinguished lawyers who are on that committee. I suppose in due time they will report to the Senate what they conceive to be the law of the case. I have, from what I know of the constitution of that committee, an abiding faith that whatever they say to the Senate about the law of the land, will be very safe for the Senate to follow.

I think it objectionable to move such propositions on appropriation bills; and unless there is some overruling necessity which seems to demand it, that of itself would be sufficient reason for my voting to lay this amendment on the table. That is one of the reasons why I shall vote to lay it on the table. The other is that I think this subject will be laid before us in a better shape for our consideration at no very distant day by the Committee on Claims; and then I shall be ready to consider the whole subject, and I deem it proper to say that when that time comes I shall be ready to reaffirm, by my vote at least, every proposition which I have heretofore maintained in the Senate. There is nothing about this doctrine which is new to me, and I do not believe I ever advanced an opinion in the Senate upon the subject in which I am very likely to be shaken during this state of existence. What may happen to me hereafter I do not know.

Mr. SCOTT. The Senator from Wisconsin who has just taken his seat has expressed for me the reasons why, when the motion is made, I will vote to lay the amendment on the table. It is a very important amendment, and it is now, as he has stated, before one of the standing committees of the Senate for consideration as a separate bill, and I shall not vote to put it upon any bill until it has been fully considered. But as it is before that committee, and the questions which are involved in it have to some extent been raised, I do desire for the guidance of that committee to elicit the views of some of the Senators who have spoken upon this question, on the very point made in the authority, Mrs. Alexander's cotton case, read by the Senator from New Jersey. I will read the concluding sentence which he read, for the purpose of putting the question so that this information may be elicited, if we can get it, for our guidance:

> We must be governed by the principles of public law so often announced from this bench as applicable alike to civil and international wars, that all the people of each State or district in insurrection against the United States must be regarded as enemies until by the action of the legislature and the executive, or otherwise, that relation is thoroughly and permanently changed.

Now, in view of the fact that there were executive proclamations recognizing the period when the war closed, and that since that time each of the States that were then in rebellion has been from time to time admitted to representation in Congress until all the people in those States are represented as citizens of the United States, I ask, have not the relations which existed during the war, and which the court felt compelled to recognize for the purposes of the war, been "thoroughly and permanently changed;" and, if so, then what are the rights of those citizens of the United States who maintained their loyalty during the period of the war?

Mr. HOWE. Will my friend allow me to call his attention to a case which he does not seem at this moment to have in his mind, but with which he is familiar—the case, I think, of the Venice, in which this very court qualified this very language, and held that fifteen days after the line of bayonets which they said marked the distinction between enemy and friendly territory in the Prize cases—fifteen days after that line had been driven back and had uncovered this vessel, the vessel was outside of enemy's territory and was within the protection of the laws of the United States?

Mr. SCOTT. I remember the case to which the Senator from Wisconsin refers; but I did not rise for the purpose of entering into this argument, but for the purpose, if possible, of eliciting for the guidance of the committee that has this measure under consideration, the views of those Senators who take the opposite opinion, as to whether these relations have or have not been permanently changed; and if so, what are the rights of citizens since these relations have been permanently changed?

Mr. SARGENT. Mr. President, it seems to me that several propositions are involved in this amendment, some even more serious than those which have been discussed.

This amendment is one of that class of measures which come before us occasionally, which are pressed through here by powerful lobbies, the objective point being the Treasury of the United States. I suppose every Senator has had called to his attention the demands of the South for cotton claims. He has been called upon to consider the question whether the cotton tax shall be refunded. He must have observed that gentlemen who desire positions in Washington from the Southern States, aspiring to this body or elsewhere, occasionally raise the question that the United States Treasury should be burdened to pay for the slaves which were confiscated or taken as a military necessity, in the language of the proclamation of Mr. Lincoln.

This is of the same class of measures. The fourth provision or specification is of exactly the same nature as the one which was urged recently in Virginia, that the United States should be required to pay for all slaves which were liberated in order that the war for the suppression of the rebellion might have a better chance of success. If these measures succeed one by one, is there any Senator here who can tell what the limit of the debt of the United States will be, and how much greater must be our burdens of taxation? If they are not to succeed as a whole, if there is to be a resisting power against these measures, must we not stop at the first one? Must we not fully understand its aim and its scope?

The fourth provision here is that the United States Treasury shall be called upon to pay "for damage to or destruction of the real or personal property of any citizen during said rebellion," not of loyal citizens or disloyal citizens, but of any citizen whatever, "whenever the same was damaged or destroyed by competent military authority as a military necessity, to weaken and harass the enemy, or to protect, assist, and strengthen the United States forces." Is there any distinction in principle between that and the case of liberating $4,000,000,000 worth of slaves to harass and weaken the enemy and strengthen the cause of the Union?

Mr. CARPENTER. Will my friend allow me to make him a suggestion at that point?

Mr. SARGENT. Certainly.

Mr. CARPENTER. Would not that very fourth clause as it stands apply to the slaves who were emancipated in the early portion of the war?

Mr. SARGENT. That occurred to me; and it would seem to me the fair construction.

Mr. CARPENTER. That was the destruction of a man's property in his slaves.

Mr. SARGENT. Certainly; a destruction of the right to the slave's labor.

I call attention to another provision of this amendment. We are not merely referring these claims to the Court of Claims as a more convenient tribunal to dispose of these matters, where, as gentlemen say, there may be counsel on both sides, and a better sifting of the evidence; but we are enlarging enormously the classes of claims on which they may pass. We are giving our sanction to claims of an entirely novel character, which never have been contemplated by any legislation of Congress. Here it is provided in the third clause that we shall pay "for the use and occupation"—in fact as if there were the relation of landlord and tenant—"for the use and occupation of real estate by the Army of the United States, other than for the passage of the armies, and their temporary encampments not exceeding five days." If an army encamped in a field for ten days, we are required to pay rent for the use and occupation of that field. Here were our armies for years in the rebellious States, occupying sometimes the roads, sometimes the adjacent fields, not doing any particular damage, but simply occupying them; and yet here is a special provision that the use of real estate in that way shall be paid for. It is proposed that we shall pay for the use and occupation of real estate throughout the Southern States. Who can tell what this will amount to? Was this contemplated in any former legislation? In the statute of 1871, when we provided the southern claims commission to pass upon the claims of loyal citizens in the Southern States, we simply provided for two classes of cases: first, where there were supplies furnished, and for which I believe quartermasters' certificates were given; and, secondly, claims for the use or loss of vessels or boats which were in the military service of the United States. Both of these are here retained, but for some reason—is it a mere accident?—the word "military" is dropped out, so that a steamer or a vessel may have been in the postal service of the United States, or may have been remote in the European waters, and if, during the period between the 15th of April, 1861, and the 2d of April, 1866, such a vessel was used or lost in any service of the United States, the owner may go before the Court of Claims, and go, not under the rules governing cases ordinarily submitted to it, but under the special provisions of this amendment.

If Senators will look at the details of it, they will find that right here is the point where resistance must begin, unless we are disposed to double the national debt, unless we are ready to embark upon measures which may require an indefinite increase of national taxation.

Now, sir, I am and always have been since the rebellion closed, since there was no longer a necessity for striking strong blows upon the front of the rebellion, against slavery or by any apt means by which its power might be overthrown, disposed to be most lenient toward our brethren of the South. I have been in favor of measures of amnesty, and of measures of kindness; but I desire to be just to the people of the whole Union; and if the affections of the southern people can only be called back by disowning the principles upon which we fought for the unity of this country, or by gross injustice to the rest of the people of the country, then I say for awhile longer we must be stern with them until they arrive at a sense of that justice which is due to the whole country. For that reason I am opposed to this measure being fastened on this appropriation bill, and for the reasons which I have named I think it would be most inexpedient to enlarge the scope of these claims; and I say that it is due to the republican party from the Senators whom it has elected to this floor, and who are responsible for the drafts which are made on the Treasury, that they watch measures like this and defeat them.

Mr. CARPENTER. I wish to call attention to the paragraph read from Mrs. Alexander's cotton case in 2 Wallace by the Senator from Pennsylvania. I do this with some embarrassment after the very modest request which he made that somebody would say something about this to aid his committee. I have no idea that anything I can say will have that effect; but I wish to call his attention to this language for the purpose of suggesting to him what I think is its true construction.

The court say:

> We must be governed by the principles of public law so often announced from this bench as applicable alike to civil and international wars, that all the people of each State or district in insurrection against the United States must be regarded as enemies until, by the action of the legislature and the executive, or otherwise, that relation is thoroughly and permanently changed.

I understand this to mean the same as the language which I will now repeat wo mean if t he court had been speaking of a war between the United States and England; the court would then have said, "We must be governed by the principles of public law so often announced from this bench as applicable alike to civil and international wars, that all the people of Great Britain and her colonies on this continent must be regarded as enemies until a treaty of peace shall be concluded between the two countries." I think this expression would mean exactly the same thing as applied to such a case that the language read from this opinion means in the case where it is found. The court meant simply to say that until peace should come to exist, all persons in enemy's country must be considered as public enemies. But the court, I think, did not intend to say that what was rightfully done during the war could be considered as a wrong after the war should cease. If we were at war, for instance, with Great Britain, and the question was whether we had properly destroyed property in Canada, that question would have to be determined with reference to the facts and circumstances which attended the destruction of the property. If it was destroyed during the pendency of war, and under circumstances which authorized its destruction as the property of an enemy, then the destruction was legal, and its destruction would be considered as legal through all time, after peace as well as during the war.

Mr. STEVENSON. My friend from Wisconsin will allow me to call his attention, as a distinction between the cases, to the fact that the President was authorized to issue his proclamation, and upon compliance with that proclamation certain results followed. That distinguishes it from the ordinary case of a public war.

Mr. CARPENTER. That would only distinguish it in this respect, that that might be another means by which the relation of enemy might be terminated. That is all. But the point now under consideration is whether an act which was properly done while the relation of enemy existed, perfectly justifiable on the part of the Government at the time, can be considered as a wrong after peace is established. I am not speaking here, of course, of what the Government may do as an act of generosity toward southern men. That is another thing. But this is put on the ground of right. The Senator from Kentucky relies on authorities to show that the Government is under a duty to make compensation. Now, I say that the court here did not intend, and in the nature of the case could not intend, to declare that after peace should be concluded an act which had been done would be viewed differently after the peace than it would have been viewed if it had come before the court during the war, because the character of any act, its rightfulness or wrongfulness, must depend on the circumstances in existence when the act was done. Property is destroyed. The owner makes a claim on the Government. The question is, what were the circumstances under which the Government destroyed the property? Was war raging. Was it necessary, to protect the Union and to secure the success of our armies, that this property should be destroyed? If so, then its destruction was proper. If it was proper when done, then it is proper always, and nothing that may take place afterward can change the character of that transaction.

Mr. PRATT. Will my friend allow me to put a question?

Mr. CARPENTER. Certainly.

Mr. PRATT. I put to him the case of a citizen of South Carolina, who was thoroughly loyal, who, because of his loyalty, was a refugee from the State. After the rebellion commenced he entered our Army, served throughout the war, was wounded, is now drawing a pension. His property was taken and used, and consumed or destroyed by the Union troops during the existence of the rebellion. Now, is it not competent and proper for the political department of this Government, whatever the courts may have decided as to the status of the parties while war was raging, to pay that loyal man, though he was a constructive enemy according to the decision of the courts?

Mr. CARPENTER. Understanding that question as coming from the great heart of the Senator from Indiana, I should say yes; let us be generous with such a man; certainly, let us give him a pension; if that will not support him handsomely, let us give him more; and if he wishes to call it compensation for property, let him call it so. But when the question comes from the brain, when the owner comes here for the purpose of making a legal claim against the Government, I deny it. It was that man's misfortune that his property became enemy property. It may not have been his fault, but it certainly was not the fault of the Government. He is compelled, at the worst, only to have his property subjected to a state of things which was forced upon it by the community in which his property was situated. This was not the fault of the General Government, and the General Government cannot be made liable to compensate him for that inconvenience or for any of its consequences. We went down to South Carolina with our troops to suppress an insurrection. There was but one way to do it, and that was to treat the entire State as enemy's territory, and every man, woman, and child in it as a public enemy. As the Senator from New Jersey said, that was the merciful method. Now, then, the mere accident of one man's being loyal in feeling, and although for that reason he may have been compelled to escape from his home, cannot change the principle. If that was enemy's property we had a right to deal with it as such, and all the courts declare that doctrine; the necessity of the case imposed it upon this Government during the war.

Mr. PRATT. Another question. Did not the political department of the Government, did not Congress, did not the President, during the whole continuance of the war, recognize that the Government had friends in the seceded States? Did it not in numerous instances, one or two of which I will refer to, recognize a distinction in the enemy's country between those who were waging war against the Government and those who were friendly to the Government? I remember one instance, the act of 1862. It declared that the Secretary of the Interior should drop from the pension-rolls all persons who were either actively engaged in the rebellion or who were aiding and abetting the rebellion, or who sympathized with those who were waging war upon the Government; that they all should be dropped from the pension-rolls; and all the rest, of course, were to be retained on the pension-rolls, and were.

Then I remember there was another act which made an appropriation of some kind, to the extent of $2,000,000, for the purpose of furnishing arms to the friends of the Government who lived in the rebel States. There were other acts and proclamations of the President which recognized this distinction between friends of the Government and enemies of the Government in the insurrectionary States.

Mr. CARPENTER. That is undoubtedly true. But when the Senator refers to that fact he means in the seceded States, as States without regard to where the line of force was drawn. The Government of the United States certainly never made any provision to help people living inside the lines of the rebellion; and the question we are now discussing is, whether the Government is liable after peace is established for an act done in the enemy's country, properly done at the time it was committed?

Mr. HOWE. Let me remind my colleague of one act which the Government did pass for the benefit of its friends within the seceded States and on the wrong side of this hostile line, to wit, the act for the reclamation of abandoned cotton, by which it was provided that all such cotton should be taken, and should be sold, and the proceeds paid into the Treasury irrespective of whether it belonged to a friend of ours, or a foe of ours; yet making this distinction, that our friends, no matter where they lived, might go into the Court of Claims, and recover there a judgment for the proceeds of their cotton.

Mr. CARPENTER. What does that prove, except that in a particular instance it pleased Congress to be very indulgent and very generous to that class of people? It does not change the principle I am now contending for.

What Congress is pleased to do, and what the Government of the United States may be arraigned at the bar of justice for not doing, are very different things. Will the Senator from Indiana claim that after this war had ended a pensioner whose name had been stricken from the roll as an act of war, while war was raging, could come here and claim of the Government, as matter of right, his back pension?

Does my colleague mean to say, in the case put by him, that if Congress had not given any such grant, had not made any such provision, those persons could come into the Court of Claims, or go to the bar of justice anywhere, or call the nation to account at the bar of public opinion, and demand as a right that the Government should do so and so? That the Senator must make out in order to make the other fact of any avail in this discussion.

Mr. HOWE. It occurred to me, Mr. President, that this Government of ours, which is always controlled by justice in its legislation, and not by any higher law, might pass just such an act for the relief of its friend when he came to us from outside of those fiery lines asking this measure of justice as we did in fact pass while he was shut up within those lines and made no demand upon us whatever. In other words, if this controlling sense of justice, which should always inspire legislators, impelled us to make just that distinction in favor of our friends when they asked nothing of us, it might require us to do the same thing when they come forward and demand of us to do it.

Mr. CARPENTER. It occurs to me that the law which my colleague refers to may be justified upon a totally different ground. It may have been a very wise act of war. Suppose in case of a war with Great Britain Congress should pass an act that any man in Canada who would give supplies to our Army, or who would do any other thing which it would be desirable to us to have him do, should have certain advantages in the future. That might be a wise measure of war. When we were dealing with the rebel States this legislation on the part of Congress, the resolutions that Congress was constantly passing, were designed to satisfy the southern people that the Government was disposed to be just with them; and not only that, but to be generous; and it proved this by all these acts of generosity, and I take it they are traceable to that feeling and to that purpose rather than to be regarded as a standard of strict justice. Congress did not assume to administer exact justice in that case; if it had, it would have administered a different dose, I think, from that which was provided in that particular act; its disposition in that regard was very different. Congress was not in a mood to deal very tenderly with the South as matter of justice; but as matter of policy, wise policy, Congress passed this act.

The law to which both Senators have referred seems to me to be defensible on two grounds: first, as an act of generosity within the power of Congress; and, secondly, as a wise act of war, one well devised to divide and distract the enemy. The only constitutional objection there could be to this measure—I do not entertain it—is that which my friend from Kentucky put so pertinaciously and so warmly the other day to the Senator from New Jersey, that this measure can only be defended as an appropriation for the general welfare.

I do not see any objection to its constitutionality except on that ground, and I do not agree to that. I think Congress could constitutionally pass this proposed amendment, and a state of things may come in the future when Congress will be justified in entering upon this subject and providing for some of these cases. We are not talking about that now. This amendment does not ask Congress to make appropriations in particular cases for our friends. It proceeds upon a principle, and declares that all the classes mentioned in it may go to the Court of Claims and demand relief as a matter of right and justice.

I say they have no right to demand it as a matter of justice. I say they are precluded, from the fact that the things they complain of were done in enemy's country, and were justifiable when done; and if justifiable when they were done, they must be considered as justifiable for all time.

Mr. STEWART obtained the floor.

Mr. LOGAN. Will the Senator give way for a moment? I presume this discussion will continue to-morrow, and I should like to have an executive session.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. FERRY, of Michigan, in the chair.) Does the Senator from Nevada yield for that purpose?

Mr. STEWART. I yield.

Mr. LOGAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After seven minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at four o'clock and fifty-five minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, March 19, 1874.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

WILLIAM SADLER.

Mr. COTTON, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 2380) granting a pension to William Sadler, of Washington, District of Columbia; and moved that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the same, and that it be referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

DEVELOPMENT OF MINING RESOURCES.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour begins at seven minutes past twelve o'clock. The House will resume the consideration of the bill (S. No. 16) supplemental to the act entitled "An act to promote the development of the mining resources of the United States," approved May 10, 1872. The Committee on Mines and Mining reported the bill with an amendment in the nature of a substitute for the second section. When the bill was last under consideration amendments were offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. NEGLEY.]

Mr. KENDALL. I desire to move an amendment to the amendment moved by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN.]

The amendment moved by Mr. HOLMAN was to add to the first section of the bill the following:

Provided further, That nothing herein contained shall affect or make void the proceedings for patents had by applicants for claims on mines on the Comstock lode, in the State of Nevada, nor shall it be construed to repeal, impair, or in any way affect the provisions of the act granting to A. Sutro the right of way and other privileges, to aid in the construction of a draining and exploring tunnel to the Comstock lode, in the State of Nevada, approved July 25, 1866.

The amendment of Mr. KENDALL was to strike out the words "affect or make void the proceedings for patents had by applicants for claims on mines on the Comstock lode, in the State of Nevada, nor shall it," so that the amendment of Mr. HOLMAN will read as follows:

Provided further, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to repeal, impair, or in any way affect the provisions of the act granting to A. Sutro the right of way and other privileges, to aid in the construction of a draining and exploring tunnel to the Comstock lode, in the State of Nevada, approved July 25, 1866.

Mr. NEGLEY. I object to the amendment to the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is under the impression, upon further examination, that the amendment of the gentleman from Nevada is in order at this stage. The Chair did not observe until just now that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana is to the first section of the bill, not to the second. He was under the impression that it was a proviso to the committee's amendment. Therefore the amendment of the gentleman from Nevada can be entertained now.

Mr. STORM. I understood that the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana was accepted by the gentleman having charge of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman had no right to accept it.

Mr. STORM. I understood the Chair so to declare.

The SPEAKER. The Chair never decided that a gentleman representing a committee has the right to accept an amendment. The gentleman in charge of this bill admitted the amendment, that is, yielded for its presentation to the House; but he could not incorporate it into the bill.

Mr. ELDREDGE. In the order in which the amendments now stand, should not that of the gentleman from Indiana be first disposed of?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will so construe.

Mr. PAGE. Am I entitled to the floor as having charge of the bill?

The SPEAKER. The Chair so understands.

Mr. PAGE. I desire to state that on Tuesday last, when this bill was reported by myself from the Committee on Mines and Mining, my colleague upon the committee, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. NEGLEY,] came to me for the purpose of having an amendment to the bill accepted. I did not know what that amendment contained. I understood the gentleman to assure me that it merely excepted from the provisions of the bill the Comstock lode. It will be remembered that after I consented that the amendment should be sent to the Clerk's desk to be read, I stated that if the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. KENDALL] had no objection to the amendment, I certainly had none. I had not at that time an opportunity to examine the full scope of the amendment; but since that time I have examined it, and I am of opinion that it ought not to be adopted. I hope the House will vote it down. I have no objection to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nevada to the original amendment of the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him why we should not provide that the vested rights of Mr. Sutro, if he has any, should not be taken away by this bill?

Mr. PAGE. I have just stated that I have no objection to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Nevada, which I think will guard carefully the vested rights of Mr. Sutro and everybody else.

Mr. ELDREDGE. The gentleman did not hear my question through. I understand that the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana only goes to the extent of preserving.

Mr. KENDALL. It goes further.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I hope I may be allowed to finish my remark.

Mr. PAGE. The amendment of the gentleman from Indiana goes further. It exempts from the provisions of the bill all the mines upon the Comstock lode.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I hope the gentleman will allow me to finish my statement.

Mr. PAGE. I do not wish to be further interrupted. The bill now under consideration has been carefully examined by the Committee on Mines and Mining, who have unanimously reported it, and ask its passage. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. NEGLEY,] who was present when the committee took action upon the bill, and who consented to it, has now offered an amendment which I ask the House not to adopt.

I desire to explain the provisions of the Senate bill now under consideration. The first section provides—

That where applications for patents for mining claims have been filed in the proper district land office, and legal notice thereof given without the appearance of an adverse claimant, and in which cases no further proceedings have been had for the purpose of perfecting title, such applicants shall make final proof and payment on said claims within one year from the date of the passage of this act; and in cases of like applications for patents hereafter filed, the applicants shall, in the absence of an adverse claim during the notice, make said final proof and payment within one year from the date of filing such application, in default of which the proceedings for patent so had by such applicants shall be considered void and without effect.

The act of Congress approved May 10, 1872, provides in the second section that any party who holds what is known as a "quartz claim" under that act, may, if he has complied with all the requirements of the local laws then in force in his mining locality, make his application under the provisions of the act of 1872 to purchase from the Government by paying the sum of five dollars per acre. The sixth section of that act provides that notice of his application, after being filed with the register and receiver in the land office, shall be published in some newspaper for the period of sixty days, after which time no adverse claim can be admitted. I desire to read the concluding sentence of the sixth section of that act:

At the expiration of the sixty days of publication the claimant shall file his affidavit, showing that the plat and notice have been posted in a conspicuous place on the claim during said period of publication. If no adverse claim shall have been filed with the register and the receiver of the proper land office at the expiration of the sixty days of publication, it shall be assumed that the applicant is entitled to a patent, upon the payment to the proper officer of five dollars per acre, and that no adverse claim exists; and thereafter no objection from third parties to the issuance of a patent shall be heard, except it be shown that the applicant has failed to comply with this act.

Now, sir, the practice has been that after the application has been made, and the notice published for a period of sixty days, at the expiration of which time no adverse claim can be considered, then the party rests upon his rights, goes no further toward obtaining the patent to his claim; and the Government does not get the pay for it. The party rests upon his rights, and does not go on and perfect his claim, and pay the Government for it.

Now, the first section of this bill provides that within one year from the expiration of the sixty days, or from the date of the application for a patent to a mining claim, the applicant shall perfect his title and pay the Government the sum of five dollars per acre. I trust every gentleman here will recognize the justice of this, because under the present law they can stop after the sixty days have expired, and the Government is kept out of this money, and no adverse claim after this can be admitted.

The second section of this bill provides that testimony in contested cases may be taken before any officer authorized to administer oaths in the said district where the claim may be situated, or if out of such district, then before the judge or clerk of any court of record. The thirteenth section of the law of 1872 provides that all affidavits may be taken before any person authorized to administer an oath. The second section of this bill provides that all ex parte affidavits may be taken before any officer authorized to administer an oath when taken within the land district within which the claim is situated; if without the land district, then before a clerk of a court of record; or if taken out of the State, then also before a clerk of any court of record. The bill only goes further than the present law by permitting the evidence to be taken where parties reside out of the land district. That is the only addition it makes to the law of 1872. I trust, therefore, that after this explanation I have made every gentleman here will see the necessity for the passage of this bill.

But, sir, I am sorry that my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. NEGLEY] offered the amendment he did the other day. And at the same time I regret to have to refer to the fact that Mr. Sutro is cumbering the tables of members of this House with defamatory publications against every member of Congress who does not see fit to vote for some pet measure of his, charging such members with being corrupt, and acting, as he asserts, in the interest of the Bank of California. Why, Mr. Speaker, the ghost of the Bank of California has followed this distinguished gentleman all over the continent. I remember receiving a letter from this gentleman some time ago warning us against the Bank of California, and telling us that his rights were to be invaded by that institution. No longer ago than yesterday he gave notice that no bill should be passed in the interest of the miners of the United States unless he was first consulted; that he would defeat every measure introduced into this House affecting those interests unless he were first consulted as to its provisions. I trust, Mr. Speaker, that the members of this House, while they will not adopt any measure that would be unjust to Mr. Sutro, or any one else who has vested rights, will not allow Mr. Sutro or anybody else to dictate to them when the great mining interests of this country are at stake.

A bill has been introduced by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. WARD,] and is now under consideration by the Committee on Mines and Mining, which contains the same provision as is contained in the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. NEGLEY.] We have not reported that bill as yet; we are still engaged in considering it. It contains virtually the same provisions; only the bill offered by the gentleman from Illinois is a general one, while the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania applies to the Comstock lode. And I say, Mr. Speaker, rather than that the interests of hundreds of people among my constituents and the constituents of the gentleman from Nevada, [Mr. KENDALL,] and perhaps of every member upon this floor—because the stock in some of those mineral claims in Nevada is owned by people all over the country—rather, I say, than an odious amendment like this should become a law, I should infinitely prefer that the whole bill should be defeated. I do not recognize the right of any individual, however distinguished he may be, to declare publicly or privately that no bill shall become a law until he is first consulted. I do here protest, in the presence of the members of the Forty-third Congress, that the interests of the mining States of this Union shall not be made subservient to Mr. Sutro or any of his adherents.

Mr. NEGLEY. Will the gentleman allow me to address one interrogatory to him?

Mr. PAGE. Yes.

Mr. NEGLEY. Does the gentleman know of his own knowledge that Mr. Sutro made such a declaration?

Mr. PAGE. I do. I do know it of my own knowledge. I never saw Mr. Sutro in my life, and would not know him if I did see him. But I do know that he made that declaration; and I appeal to the members upon this floor not to put a law upon the statute-book that would be an outrage upon the parties who may be fortunate or unfortunate enough to own stock in the Comstock lode.

The main provisions of the bill have, I believe, been explained by me satisfactorily, and I hope they will be adopted. I am willing, Mr. Speaker, so far as I am concerned, that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nevada should be incorporated in this bill. I do not desire to affect any right that might have been acquired by Mr. Sutro, or anybody else. But I do claim that the interests of the people of the mining States are paramount to the interests of any individual.

I will now yield, Mr. Speaker, ten minutes of my time to the gentleman from Nevada, [Mr. KENDALL.]

Mr. NEGLEY. Will the gentleman from California, before he takes his seat, allow me to put an interrogatory to him?

Mr. PAGE. Yes, sir.

Mr. NEGLEY. The gentleman has declared to the House the amendment I have offered is a gross outrage upon his constituency; will he have the kindness to state to the House wherein it is an outrage, and wherein it does injuriously affect the rights of any one of his constituents?

Mr. PAGE. Mr. Speaker, I will answer the gentleman's question by simply saying it does all that by repealing the present law, and providing that parties who have not or do not take out their patents within six months shall have their claims forfeited.

Mr. NEGLEY. By repealing; how and in what way?

Mr. PAGE. The very amendment which the gentleman offers has the tendency to repeal the act of 1872.

Mr. NEGLEY. Wherein is it a repeal?

Mr. PAGE. I yield now to the gentleman from Nevada.

Mr. KENDALL. I wish, Mr. Speaker to say that I trust gentlemen will engage in this discussion temperately, understandingly, calmly. I am glad to see my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. NEGLEY] smile approval at this remark with his accustomed good nature.

I said when this amendment was offered the other day that I desired time to carefully examine its scope and bearing. The amendment was offered by a member of the Committee on Mines and Mining, where the bill had been carefully and repeatedly considered. It was offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. NEGLEY,] a member, as I have said, of the Committee on Mines and Mining, then and here for the first time. It had never been brought to the attention of the committee by that gentleman nor by any one else. I find no fault with this; not at all. It is undoubtedly the right of the gentleman to select this method to mature the bills reported to this House by his own committee.

Sir, the more I have considered the effect of this amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, the more I am convinced that, in its seemingly harmless phrase, a great wrong may be done; that it may have the effect, though I know my friend does not intend it, of robbing a class of people of millions of their money and property if it becomes the law—millions of the money of my constituents.

Mr. NEGLEY. I hope the gentleman will state right here how it will rob millions from his constituents.

Mr. KENDALL. That I will do with a great deal of pleasure, if my friend will allow me, for it is a part of my speech, if you please; only do not let him get impatient.

The bill reported by the committee (S. No. 16) provides that, where applications have been made for patents to mining claims, the claimant shall go on and perfect his title, if no adverse claim is set up within one year; and in default thereof, what? Not that his claim shall be forfeited or be open to relocation; not that he shall be deprived of any rights of possession whatever? No; only his proceedings and preliminary application shall be void, and that, if thereafter he shall wish to obtain a patent to his claim, he shall begin anew, just as if no application had been made at all.

Now comes in this amendment; and what does it provide? Notice the difference; notice the harshness of its conditions. The amendment applies to claims on the Comstock lode, so called, in the State of Nevada. It requires "all persons, companies, or corporations" holding mines on this lode to make their application within six months from the passage of this act, and then to make final proof; and, in case no adverse claim is presented, take their patent within six months from the filing of such application. Then follow other conditions and requirements of which I shall speak. Now, sir, what is to be the penalty for a failure to comply with this mandatory clause to make application and take out a patent? Nothing less than a forfeiture of the claim, which is declared to be open to relocation by any other parties whomsoever!

Does the gentleman who offers this amendment, do gentlemen of this House, understand the state and condition of mines and mining on this Comstock lode? I will tell him, I will tell you, because I think I know something about it. I find here one of Mr. Sutro's maps—one of three hundred kindly put upon our desks—of which I can make some use.

A great part of this lode shown across this map [holding it up] is possessed by a number of corporations or companies which are working successfully rich and productive mines. These constitute one class, and of them I will soon speak.

Outside of the claims of these companies, along that great lode, wherever it has been explored, or wherever it can be traced, or wherever it is supposed to exist in any of its branches or ramifications, are not less than two hundred claims or locations in various stages of development, but all of which, so far, have been unproductive, without a dime of profit to their owners, but a dead and heavy expense to every one concerned; and I am glad to see my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] interested in what I am saying, for he knows how this is from personal observation. These are prospecting claims. You see them all around the vicinity of that lode, extending over the hills and along the ravines for from seven to ten miles. They are worked in shafts and pits and through tunnels, often by poor men; by men whose all—their muscle and sweat and indomitable will—are invested in the desperate venture of finding a paying mine. They are engaged in a hand to hand struggle, engaged in the most hazardous business known to men, often deeply in debt for the necessaries of life, working on, hoping on, sometimes almost against hope; they are men oftenest who have given their best days, the prime of life, to this too fascinating pursuit; but, nevertheless, a pursuit that has more than once saved the country from a financial panic and rescued the credit of the Government at the breaking out of the rebellion, and took us safely through the civil war.

Such are these prospectors, and these are the privations and hardships they endure. And now, sir, what do you propose to do? Look at the new burden that is to be imposed. These men, so far, have only an empty, barren, excavation in the earth. They do not know yet whether they have a claim that is worth the paper upon which their application would be written or their patent engraved. You compel them to pay $500 or $1,000 in fees and purchase-money for the poor privilege of delving along the strike of this lode in the hope of finding paying ore. Some of them have thus worked for ten, twelve, fifteen years, and are poor and disappointed in their hopes even now.

Mr. NEGLEY. Will the gentleman tell us how these poor men can have been working for fifteen years without making a dime?

Mr. KENDALL. The gentleman is too impatient. He should know, and does know—every one knows—that such is unfortunately too often the hard fate of mining for the precious metals. But I will come to that.

Mr. NEGLEY. I am interested in what the gentleman says.

Mr. KENDALL. I am glad my friend is interested.

To require them to do this is, I say, a hardship that every miner will and may rightfully regard as an oppression. The effect will be to discourage prospecting. Who will want to take out a United States patent, with all its attendant expense, merely for the privilege of hunting for a mine? Why single out the unproductive mines along the Comstock lode? Why strike at the prospectors there? Elsewhere you allow the prospector to hold his claim by possession as long as he pleases. Even if he has made application for a patent and fails to perfect his title, you do not forfeit his claim; you only remit him back to a new application. Why this inequality? To prospectors for mines generally you say, "If you have made application for a patent to your claim, and no contest has arisen, go on and perfect your title, or else lose the benefit of the step already taken. You may remain in possession of your claim until it is worth patenting, or forever, if you are willing to take the chances of adverse claim of title." But to the prospector on the Comstock lode you say, "Apply for your patent, receive and receipt for the same, or else your claim shall be open to relocation by other parties—by the first vagabond that has a mind to levy black-mail."

Now, sir, as to the other class of "persons or companies"—those who are working productive mines along this lode—the "Ophir" company, the "Belcher," the "Hale and Norcross," the "Crown Point," &c.: the mines of these companies are of immense value, and at first view of the case it no doubt seems a plausible proposition to require them to pay the Government price for their locations and receive patents. But, Mr. Speaker, my fellow-members of the Mining Committee, gentlemen of the House wishing to see fair play and justice to every one, I do assure you, and will convince you that in view of past legislation, an amendment of the sort proposed would work a monstrous wrong.

Bear with me now a moment while I call your attention to this past legislation, and to certain well-known facts connected therewith. Reference is made in the amendment now under discussion to "the Sutro tunnel act of July 25, 1866," which granted the right of way and certain other franchises to Mr. Adolph Sutro and his associates to construct an exploring and draining tunnel into the Comstock lode. At different times during the same year, 1866, contracts and agreements were entered into between the principal mining companies on the Comstock lode and Mr. Sutro, looking to the construction of this tunnel. These contracts executed by the various companies at different times from April to August, 1866, are elaborately drawn, detailed in statement, and closely guarded in all the conditions and stipulations. I have here copied from one of these original instruments—all identical in terms—the first and the fourth articles, which I ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

ARTICLE 1. The parties of the first part, in consideration of the premises, and in consideration of the covenants and agreements hereinafter mentioned, to be kept and performed by the party of the second part, covenant and agree to and with the party of the second part, that the parties of the first part will, on or before the 1st day of August, 1867, commence, and with reasonable energy and vigor, and at their own expense, run, excavate, and complete the tunnel and lateral drifts hereinafter mentioned, and put the same in condition for use, in accordance with the provisions of the said act of the Legislature of the State of Nevada, and with the covenants in this agreement contained, for the purpose of draining the mines on the said Comstock lode, and furnishing other conveniences for working the same.

* * * * * * *

ART. 4. If the work shall not be commenced on or before the said day, and with said sum of $3,000,000 subscribed, and 10 per cent. thereof actually paid in cash, as hereinbefore provided, or if, after so commencing, the parties of the first part shall during any year fail to expend on account of the work the sum of money hereinbefore agreed to be expended during such year, this agreement shall, at the option of the party of the second part, cease and determine, and thereafter be of no effect.

Mr. KENDALL. Another article of the agreement provided that the mining companies should pay to Mr. Sutro a royalty of two dollars per ton on all their ore extracted after the tunnel should be completed.

Now, I turn to the Sutro tunnel act of July 25, 1866, and request the Clerk to read the third section.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That all persons, companies, or corporations owning claims on said Comstock lode, or any other lode drained, benefited, or developed by said tunnel, shall hold their claims subject to the condition, (which shall be expressed in any grant they may hereafter obtain from the United States,) that they shall contribute and pay to the owners of said tunnel the same rate of charges for drainage or other benefits derived from said tunnel or its branches, as have been, or may hereafter be, named in agreement between such owners and the companies representing a majority of the estimated value of said Comstock lode at the time of the passage of this act.

Mr. KENDALL. There is the contract, and there is the legislation in reference to it now on the statute-book.

Mr. NEGLEY. Do you object to that legislation?

Mr. KENDALL. Not at all; you mistake the drift of my argument entirely, as you will see directly. I repeat, there is the contract and there is the statute law.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. KENDALL. I ask the indulgence of the House for a few moments longer.

Mr. NEGLEY. I hope the gentleman will be allowed to proceed.

Mr. PAGE. I yield five minutes more to the gentleman from Nevada.

Mr. KENDALL. The contract stipulates for the construction of the tunnel and the payment of the royalty. The statute comes in and declares that these companies, parties to the contract—

Shall hold their claims subject to the condition (which shall be expressed in any grant [patent] they may obtain from the United States) that they shall contribute and pay to the owners of said tunnel the same rate of charges * * * as have been or may be hereafter named in agreement between such owners and the companies, &c.

Now, sir, recently, as I am informed, these companies have instituted suit—quia timet—to test their liability to pay this royalty of two dollars per ton on the ore extracted when the tunnel shall have been completed. They claim, as I understand, that Mr. Sutro, on his part, has failed to comply with the conditions of the contract, which is, nevertheless, a cloud upon their title, and that consequently they are released from their obligations.

Mr. NEGLEY. Does the gentleman say that himself?

Mr. KENDALL. I beg the gentleman not to interrupt me; I think I shall answer any questions he might desire to ask before I get through.

As to the merits of this suit, they cut no figure here. I had believed all along that these contracts were of binding force, and I am free to say that I hope they are. I wish this enterprise of the Sutro tunnel to proceed. I have believed, and still believe, that it will do much to develop and encourage the mining interests of the West. I have been in favor, and am still in favor, of appropriate legislation in its aid. I repeat and reaffirm all that I have said in its favor. But I will not, if I know it, legislate for a controversy, for a suit pending. Here is the contract, and here is the existing statute, as I have shown you. Upon the facts, whatever they may be, and upon the law as they find it, the parties are in court; and now comes the amendment under consideration, thrown in suddenly, in the manner I have mentioned, which would settle in the most summary and arbitrary way the entire controversy. Gentlemen surely understand me. Read, if you please, the amendment:

All persons, companies, or corporations owning claims or mines on said Comstock lode shall make application for patents within six months from the date of the passage of this act; and in the absence of a bona fide adverse claim during the notice make final proof and payment, and file a receipt for such patent in the same manner as hereinafter provided, within six months from the date of filing such application, or, if already filed, from the date of the passage of this act; and in default thereof, or in default of filing with the register of the land office at Carson City, in all cases where patents have already been issued, an acknowledgment of the receipt of such patent, subject to the conditions therein contained, within ninety days from the passage of this act, such claims or mines shall be open to relocation by other parties in the same manner as if no location of the same had ever been made, always subject, however, to the conditions of the Sutro tunnel act, approved July 25, 1866.

That is, plainly and in terms, you propose to compel these mining companies to take out patents which, by the law of July 25, 1866, will be and can be issued only on condition that the companies shall pay the royalty of two dollars per ton on their ore. They cannot get their patents without this condition being attached to them. You would say, by this amendment, to these companies, "You shall take out patents to your claims binding you, in perpetuity, to pay this tax, or your claims shall be subject to relocation."

But, sir, the legality of this very tax, this royalty, is the very subject-matter of the suit pending. Is such to be our legislation? I hope and trust not. And here I take occasion to repeat that I have been, and still am, friendly to the Sutro tunnel enterprise. I have spoken in its behalf here and before the people in my State. I should rejoice to see it encouraged by Government aid. I will oppose, with all the force and influence I possess, any infringement on the rights of its projectors. Hence I will support a part of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN.] And for the reason that I support the one, for that reason I oppose the other. The one protects vested rights; the other tramples them in the dust. Let not Mr. Sutro, or his swift and ill-judging friends, claim equity for themselves, while they would outrage the rights of others. As for me, I intend to perform my public duty without fear or favor from either of the parties that have been mentioned in this discussion. They are nothing to me in my action here, either of them, although for them, as individuals or citizens, I have no feeling but of kindness and good will.

One word further in regard to the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN.] Why the first clause of this amendment? Why the words—

That nothing herein contained shall affect or make void the proceedings for patents held by applicants for claims on mines on the Comstock lode?

Why make this useless provision? I assert that no good reason can be shown. We want no special legislation, favorable or adverse, for the miners on that lode; and hence I have offered an amendment to the amendment; so that the amendment will simply read—

That nothing herein contained shall be construed to repeal, impair, or in any way affect the provisions of the act granting to A. Sutro the right of way and other privileges, to aid in the construction of a draining and exploring tunnel to the Comstock lode.

I would not detract the value of a picayune from the rights of Mr. Sutro, and I am glad the saving clause is in the bill.

Mr. PAGE. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. BLAND. Having resided for nine or ten years on the Pacific coast, and for some six years of that time near this Comstock lode at Virginia City, I believe I can offer a few suggestions why the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. NEGLEY] should not prevail. I lived there before this legislation by Congress in reference to what is known as the Sutro tunnel. I believe the country would be better to-day if all this legislation was wiped out. I know from my experience on the Pacific coast, and especially while in Virginia City, that honest miners, the toiling portion of that community, were frequently oppressed by these large companies.

I do not think that the interests proposed to be subserved here to-day are particularly those of the large mining companies or of Mr. Sutro. As I understand it, the honest, toiling miners, who have prospected the mines, who have expended their money in their development, and who are now probably unable to purchase these lands, having expended all their means in prospecting and developing the claims, are liable to be ground down by the operations of both the Bank of California and of these rich mining companies. As I understand it, this bill is in the interest of the miners, and not in the interest of the rich companies.

There is a little secret history concerning this Comstock lode that you gentlemen here may not be acquainted with. Those who have resided there will know that there are veins traversing north and south, parallel with that Comstock lode, which is situated on the brow of a large hill or mountain; above and below that lode are other veins or lodes running parallel with it. Those other veins have been prospected ever since the discovery of the Comstock lode. These rich companies have always contended that the Comstock lode embraced all these other parallel lodes or veins. Sutro, in running his tunnel, will have an opportunity to open some of them and use them. But there is a third party, the honest miners who have prospected these other lodes, who believe that they have some rights irrespective of Sutro or the Bank of California. They are the parties to be affected by this bill.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The SPEAKER. The five minutes of the gentleman have expired.

Mr. BLAND. Allow me a few moments more.

Mr. PAGE. I cannot do so, for I have to call the previous question in five minutes, and I have promised to yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. NEGLEY] for three minutes.

Mr. BLAND. I have not yet had an opportunity to state what I desire on this subject.

Mr. PAGE. I cannot yield further to the gentleman; I must call the previous question in five minutes or this bill will go over.

Mr. NEGLEY. I appeal to the gentleman from California [Mr. PAGE] to yield to the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. BLAND.] This is an important question, and the discussion of it should not be cut off in this way.

Mr. PAGE. I shall not object to yielding, if the time for calling the previous question can be extended.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the gentleman will yield, and that the time will not be taken out of that to which he is entitled.

Mr. RANDALL. So far as I have heard, all who have spoken have been on one side.

Mr. PAGE. I will yield, with the understanding that I may be allowed to call the previous question.

Mr. BLAND. It is proposed by this amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania that the parties or companies "interested in claims on this Comstock lode" shall, within a certain time, take out their patents. Now, if you say that you will compel them to do what is an impossibility, for they do not know whether their claims are on what is technically the Comstock lode or not, and thus they may lose their title by a mere technicality. I protest against it in the name of the miners there, who I know have been delving for years and years, while these rich corporations have been trying from time to time to dispossess them of their rights under this very technicality. I say the interest of the honest toilers in the mines, who I know have spent their money in those enterprises, demands that the protection here proposed should not be confined to the Comstock lode. Such a restriction is a trick, and will work great damage to the honest toiling people of that section of the country, many of whom, after exhausting their means, are not able to take out patents. When you compel a party to take out a patent and vest the title in him, right there prospecting ends. As long as a patent is suspended there is likely to be prospecting and delving for silver and gold. When a title is obtained that is the end of the matter. The proper policy would have been to compel parties to expend a certain amount of money or to make certain discoveries before giving them a title.

Mr. SPEER. Is the gentleman in favor of the bill and against the amendment?

Mr. BLAND. I am in favor of the bill, and against the amendment.

Mr. SPEER. Against the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN?]

Mr. BLAND. I am opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. NEGLEY,] because it is confined to the Comstock lode. Under that amendment parties may locate in what is considered the Comstock lode, but they may find out afterward that it is not, so that the whole location will be vitiated; or parties may locate a lode and get a patent for it, and a party who claims that he is on the Comstock lode may get a patent and shove them off. I say that under such a provision as the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, interminable litigation will grow up to the injury of the honest miner.

Mr. SPEER. Is the gentleman in favor of the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana?

Mr. BLAND. I am.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. Speaker, at what time does the morning hour expire?

The SPEAKER. At seven minutes after one o'clock.

Mr. PAGE. If a vote on the bill is not reached to day, will it come up in the morning hour to-morrow?

The SPEAKER. It will not come up until next Tuesday.

Mr. PAGE. There are several gentlemen who desire to speak on the bill, and I do not wish to cut off debate at all, but I desire to reserve all points on the bill and to bring it to a vote.

The SPEAKER. The Chair apprehends that the floor will not be claimed for other business to-day until half-past one o'clock, at which hour the special order will supervene.

Mr. PAGE. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. NEGLEY] for ten minutes.

Mr. NEGLEY. Mr. Speaker, it is a source of very great surprise to me that the presentation of an amendment in such simple and explicit terms as that which I have offered, and now pending, should awaken the opposition of almost every Representative from California, as well as the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. KENDALL] and the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. BLAND.] This opposition is seemingly made on behalf of the "honest miner;" but I think an examination as to the application for patents made upon the Comstock lode will show that it is in the interest of rich corporations, and that my amendment is not liable to any reasonable objection. I trust I shall have the attention of the House while I explain briefly my reasons for offering and supporting the amendment now pending. As great stress has been laid upon the rights of the companies mining upon the Comstock lode, permit me, by way of explanation, to call attention to the number and character of the applications made for patents and the claims secured under a possessory title and patents.

There are thirty principal mining claims on the Comstock lode. Of these twenty-two companies have applied for patents. Eight companies have never applied for patents. Only fifteen have been issued. One application has been rejected, and two are now being examined. Of the fifteen patents issued only seven have been delivered; seven remain in the register's office unclaimed. Of all those delivered but one receipt is on file. The application has been made on most of these claims for more than six years, surely a sufficient time to execute the requirement of a liberal law, and in nowise oppressive to those enjoying the bounty of the Government without cost to themselves.

Now, it appears that there has been a purpose in refusing to take out these patents; that there is a similar purpose in concealing from the Government and from the public the existence of the receipts and the patents; for information reaches me (and it comes undenied) that the register of the district has disappeared; that the receipts given for six of the seven patents have also disappeared; and up to this time the Government has not received a single dollar for the immensely valuable property which it has passed over to these mining companies, who, if the gentleman from Nevada is correct in his assertion, have realized $200,000,000 from the mines situate on the Comstock lode.

Mr. KENDALL. I hope the gentleman will not misstate what I said. My remark was that the product of the Comstock lode had probably reached $200,000,000; but I might have added that the expense of extracting that amount of mineral wealth has reached probably $250,000,000.

Mr. NEGLEY. It does not make any difference, Mr. Speaker, as to the question of figures. If I had made a statement on the subject, I should have estimated the sum at $170,000,000, which has been realized by the mining companies working this lode. The Crown Point, one of these companies, has paid in dividends during the last two years upward of $2,000,000. Another company, the Belcher, has paid an equal amount. These are the poor mining companies referred to, who have their earnest advocates on this floor; and while speaking here in behalf of their rights these gentlemen forget that there are other rights involved worthy of special consideration, the rights of those who hold, under conditions perfected by contract and statutes, which remain to be fulfilled—obligations that the terms expressed in one of the sections of Senate bill No. 16 seek to annul. That this mischievous legislation has been actuated by improper motives I do not affirm; but I am constrained to question the spirit of equity claimed by the advocates of the bill.

If it has been offered in good faith and intended to protect all existing rights, why then has my amendment, proposing this and nothing more, provoked such bitter opposition from the honorable gentlemen who have awakened a lively interest in the House this morning by their vehemence?

As early as July 25, 1866, Congress was pleased to grant to Mr. Sutro a franchise, permitting him to purchase a certain quantity of land at $1.25 an acre, and a certain quantity of mineral land at five dollars an acre. He was also authorized to construct a tunnel penetrating into the Comstock lode, to test experimentally, if you please, the value of the lode at that great depth, which would be about two thousand feet from the top of the mountain.

At the same time the mining companies then working the Comstock lode, who did not, however, own a foot of land, but merely held the possessory title by license, or a squatter's privilege, entered into written contracts with Mr. Sutro, agreeing to pay him so much per ton for the ore to be extracted and carried out through the proposed tunnel at the base of the mountain, at a far less cost than by the existing methods of raising the products of the mines, thereby dividing the profits of the enterprise with the miners.

Mr. PAGE. Allow me to interrupt the gentleman to ask him whether he does not know there are several claims below the proposed level of the Sutro tunnel?

Mr. NEGLEY. I am referring, Mr. Speaker, to the records before me; I refer also to the act of Congress passed July 25, 1866, and to the requirements contemplated in that act.

Mr. Sutro entered upon the consummation of this great work with zeal and in good faith, relying upon the pledges of the Government and the promises of the parties contracting with him. He has proceeded with the faithful execution of the work until the present time. He has expended nearly $2,000,000 of private capital. There have been completed upward of six thousand feet of this tunnel, and when consummated it will not only be a great contribution to the science of geology and mining, but it will create and give a fresh stimulus to the mining interests of the United States.

But Mr. Sutro soon found a jealous opposition on the part of these mining companies, accompanied by extraordinary efforts to obstruct the progress of his vast and hazardous undertaking. From that day to this they have continued their opposition in every possible form, fairly and unfairly. They have attempted to prevent his enterprise receiving credit abroad. They have embarrassed his operations at home by instituting suits in the State of California, as we are informed by the gentleman from Nevada. They now appear by the presence of their friends—worthy gentlemen, I agree—upon this floor, who seek to prevent a proper construction of the law being made in his favor in any act passed by this Congress amendatory of the mining laws.

The gentleman from California is correct in stating this bill was agreed to by the Committee on Mines and Mining. It was done, to be sure, without much consideration on my part. It was a matter of no special interest to my constituents, nor did it occur to me whether Mr. Sutro's interests were protected or not. In fact, it was not incumbent upon me to watch over the interests pertaining to the Sutro tunnel until it became my duty, as a member on this floor, to enter my protest against a bold attempt to deprive his company of their vested rights.

But, sir, when I came to give a little attention to the act of Congress relating to the Sutro tunnel now upon the statute-book, and when I came carefully to consider the pending bill, I then discovered what appeared so simple in verbiage was really intended to cut off the rights of Mr. Sutro under the patents, which would be declared void and of no effect should the Senate bill pass without amendment.

Mr. PAGE. I desire to ask the gentleman right here one question: If that is all he desires, why is he not willing to accept the amendment of the gentleman from Nevada, [Mr. KENDALL,] because that says in express language it shall not affect Mr. Sutro?

Mr. NEGLEY. I am the best judge in the line of my duty of what I shall support and what I shall not support.

Now, in giving reasons why I think this bill ought not to pass without the pending amendment, I will read some extracts from the paper I hold in my hand, as part of my argument in favor of the amendment:

Many have made applications, but have purposely neglected to take any further steps to perfect their titles,——

Mr. KENDALL. What paper is the gentleman reading from?

Mr. NEGLEY. For the gentleman's better understanding I will send it to the Clerk's desk, and ask to have read the portions which I have marked with pencil.

Mr. KENDALL. I hope the House may be apprised of the nature and source of the document, so we may judge of its authority and authenticity.

Mr. PAGE. I desire to have the gentleman add to it the name of its author.

Mr. NEGLEY. Please do not interrupt me any further.

Mr. KENDALL. I have a duplicate of it here on my desk, and I wish to state that it is signed by Mr. Sutro, and is headed "The California Bank ring against the Sutro tunnel."

Mr. PAGE. I also have a duplicate of it.

Mr. NEGLEY. I hope both the gentlemen have duplicates, as it contains nothing but facts.

Mr. PAGE. It is signed by Mr. Sutro himself. I have the full text of the pamphlet. I believe I am the possessor of one of the original copies.

Mr. KENDALL. Lithographed, is it not?

Mr. PAGE. No, sir.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has the right to have the document read.

Mr. NEGLEY. I desire to have the portions read which are marked with blue pencil.

The Clerk read as follows:

Many have made applications, but have purposely neglected to take any further steps to perfect their titles, while others have received their patents, but it can no longer be shown that they have formally accepted them, for the only evidence to that effect, the duplicate receipts, have been stolen from the register's office at Carson, and the register in office at the time has disappeared.

Section 1 of Senate bill No. 16, referring to mining claims, patents for which have been applied for, and the proof not perfected in one year, provides that "in default of which the proceedings for patents so had by such applicant shall be considered void and without effect." * * * * * *

1. To allow the acceptance of the terms of the Sutro tunnel act, implied by an application for patents, to become void by the operation of law, so that it shall no longer be evidence of such implied acceptance.

2. To allow not only the application, but all the proceedings for patent so had by such applicants, to become void and without effect, which might be construed to make void also the proceedings for patents already issued, especially in those cases where the duplicate receipts have been stolen.

3. To enable these parties to speedily secure a new patent without the Sutro tunnel clause, should they, towards the end of the session, succeed in smuggling in a repeal of the Sutro tunnel act at so late an hour that Congress could not correct the error before another session.

4. To allow them, in a new application for patents, to enlarge and float the boundaries of their claims further east, in order to cover the country in which the late developments give every reason to suppose that the Sutro tunnel will make large and independent discoveries of lodes.

Another amendment to Senate bill No. 16, offered to-day, declaring that such mines on the Comstock lode shall be open to relocation, for which patents are not applied for within six months and the title perfected within six months additional, would have that effect, and would at the same time secure to the Government the price of the land, which has been withheld from it for a number of years.

Mr. NEGLEY. The paper from which the Clerk has just read has been addressed to members of this House by Mr. Sutro. It contains the facts which are the basis of the argument in favor of the adoption of the amendment I have offered. Better reasons than those contained in that pamphlet do not present themselves to my mind.

The gentleman from California during his remarks stated the adoption of my amendment would be a great outrage.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. GARFIELD. I rise to move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to resume the consideration of the legislative, judicial, and executive appropriation bill.

Mr. PAGE. The motion of the gentlemen from Ohio is not in accordance with my understanding that the regular order would not be demanded until half-past one o'clock. It is because of that understanding that I have allowed the discussion to run on.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California [Mr. PAGE] has the right to try the sense of the House on seconding the previous question.

Mr. GARFIELD. If the gentleman wishes to try the sense of the House on seconding the previous question, and the bill of which he has charge, with the amendments to it, can be brought to a vote without further debate, I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. If the demand for the previous question is seconded, the House will immediately come to a vote on the bill and amendments. If the House declines to second the demand for the previous question, the Chair will then recognize the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD.]

Mr. NEGLEY. Will the Chair explain the order of voting if the previous question should be seconded?

The SPEAKER. If the previous question shall be seconded, the first vote will be on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. KENDALL] to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] to the first section of the bill; and the next vote will be taken upon the proviso offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. NEGLEY] as an addition to the proviso offered by the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. NEGLEY. And if the House refuses to second the demand for the previous question the bill and amendments will be left open for further debate.

The SPEAKER. If the House refuses to second the previous question the bill will go over till Tuesday morning, in the morning hour.

Mr. MERRIAM. Mr. Speaker, I hope this question will go over to some future time for public discussion, as interests of vast amount are involved.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California, Mr. PAGE, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. NEGLEY, will act as tellers on the demand for the previous question.

Mr. PAGE. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. If the previous question shall not be sustained, what position will the bill then occupy?

The SPEAKER. The bill will be in precisely the same position as it is now, and will go over till the morning hour of Tuesday.

Mr. RANDALL. I would suggest that a viva voce vote be taken on seconding the previous question. It may perhaps save the time that would be consumed in voting by tellers.

The question being taken on seconding the demand for the previous question, there were—ayes 13, noes not counted.

So the previous question was not seconded.

The SPEAKER. The House having refused to second the call for the previous question, the bill goes over till the morning hour of Tuesday next. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] is now recognized by the Chair to move that the House go into Committee of the Whole on the legislative appropriation bill.

REVISION OF THE STATUTES.

Mr. POLAND. Before the motion of the gentleman from Ohio is put, I ask unanimous consent that the revision of the statutes may be engrossed by using a printed copy of the same with the amendments copied into it, and that the reading of the engrossed bill may be dispensed with.

Mr. RANDALL. There should be attached to it a certificate of the Clerk of the House that the engrossment is true and correct.

Mr. POLAND. I have no objection to that.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will the Chair state what the proposition is?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POLAND] from the Committee on Revision of the Laws of the United States, asks that when the revision is completed in the evening sessions of the House, it may be engrossed by using the printed copy of the same with the amendments copied in, and that the reading of the engrossed bill in the House may be dispensed with. And the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] suggests, as a condition thereto, that the engrossed copy presented to the House shall have the certificate of the Clerk of the House that it is correctly and truly engrossed.

Mr. RANDALL. With a recital of the resolution granting this permission.

The SPEAKER. Of course. If there be no objection this arrangement will be made. The Chair hears none.

Mr. POLAND. I desire to say one word further in reference to this revision. The committee were in hopes to have completed it this week. They now expect to be able to finish the revision next week, and the committee will not ask the House to have an evening session for this evening. We do not ask another session for this work until Wednesday of next week.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

Mr. GARFIELD. In view of the statement which has just been made to the House by the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. POLAND,] I hope the House will consent to hold an evening session this evening for the consideration of the legislative appropriation bill, unless the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. MCCRARY] wants it for the consideration of the transportation bill.

Mr. MCCRARY. I am very reluctant to consume any of the time of the House in contending about the order of proceeding. And I have therefore said to my friend from Ohio, with the concurrence of the Committee on Railways and Canals, that I will not press the special order to-day; but certainly on Monday I shall endeavor to bring it up and have its consideration continued until it is disposed of. I think it can be disposed of on Tuesday, and I understand the gentleman from Ohio to say that he will not antagonize the measure at that time.

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope the gentleman will take Saturday and Monday for his measure, and get it disposed of on Monday.

Mr. MCCRARY. If that arrangement can be made, I will be glad to have it so; but I am not certain now that that can be done.

Mr. MERRIAM. I appeal to the House to take up on Tuesday the banking and currency question. The country is waiting for the action of Congress on that question. Four months have elapsed and nothing has been done in regard to it. And meanwhile the business of the country is almost stagnated, and is looking to us for relief. I think we should not take up bills which can as well be postponed, and put them ahead of that question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is under the necessity of restraining the daily discussion as to the order of business. The House must proceed to business, instead of occupying time in discussing its order.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I desire, with the leave of the House, to suggest to the chairman of the Committee on Railways and Canals whether he will not now ask unanimous consent that the debate on the transportation bill may proceed on Monday, after the morning hour.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would advise the gentleman from Massachusetts that there is a special order, in charge of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] from the Committee on Commerce, in regard to the Louisville and Portland Canal, which comes up immediately after the morning hour on Monday.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I understand that will take but a few minutes, and this unanimous consent may be given subject to that.

The SPEAKER. Subject to that and subject also to a pending motion of the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. BROMBERG,] in regard to the bill from the Committee on Commerce in relation to infectious diseases; that, however, is not for debate, but merely for a vote.

Mr. DAWES. I would like to hear that statement again.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts suggests that the bill reported by the Committee on Railways and Canals be taken up on Monday after the special order for that day is disposed of, and that Monday and Tuesday be devoted to its consideration; Tuesday to be the last day, and the vote to be taken on that day. The Chair has heard a desire expressed by some gentlemen, which it is not especially his province to mention, but which he states for the information of the House, that there should be five or ten minutes' debate on amendments allowed on the transportation bill. The gentleman who has charge of the bill will please take notice of that fact.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. If the gentleman from Iowa is asking unanimous consent, I must object.

Mr. GARFIELD. Then I insist on my motion that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Before going into Committee of the Whole—

VESSELS IN COAST TRADE AND FISHERIES.

Mr. ALBRIGHT, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2549) to amend an act entitled "An act for enrolling and licensing ships or vessels to be employed in the coasting trade and fisheries, and for regulating the same," passed February 18, 1793; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

SUBSISTENCE OF INDIANS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, in relation to an appropriation for subsisting the Red Cloud and White Stone Indian agencies; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

GATLING GUNS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, in relation to an appropriation for the adoption of the Gatling gun; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

NORMAN WIARD.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting an inclosed letter from Norman Wiard, proposing experiments in ordnance and for making and testing new guns of large caliber; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

ABOLITION OF THE FRANKING PRIVILEGE.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, in answer to a resolution of the House of December 8, 1873, in relation to expenses incurred upon the abolition of the franking privilege; which was referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

SALE OF HORN ISLAND RESERVATION.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, in answer to a resolution of the House of February 16, 1874, in relation to the sale of the Horn Island military reservation in the Gulf of Mexico; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

FIRE-ALARM TELEGRAPH IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, in relation to House bill No. 1574, to aid in the construction of a fire-alarm telegraph in the District of Columbia; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

SURVEYS OF RIVERS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting reports of surveys made of Fort Deer River, below Dyersburgh, Tennessee, and the Red River of the North, from Moorhead, Minnesota, to Pembina, Dakota; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

FINES, PENALTIES, ETC.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, in answer to a resolution of the House of March 10, 1874, transmitting a statement of the fines, penalties, and forfeitures collected in the districts of Boston and New York, from November 30, 1873, to March 1, 1874, and the disposition made of the proceeds thereof; which was referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM REDUS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, in relation to the claim of William Redus for compensation on account of depredations committed by Osage Indians; which was referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

MRS. FLORA A. DARLING.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, in relation to the petition of Mrs. Flora A. Darling for the restoration of money and valuables which she claims were taken from her in January, 1864, by the military authorities at New Orleans; which was referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

WRECK OF THE SHIP PATRICIAN.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, in relation to an examination of the wreck of the ship Patrician, on Noon Day rock, at the entrance of the harbor of San Francisco, California; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

EXPENSES OF THE MODOC WAR.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting papers showing the cost, in the Quartermaster's Department, of the Modoc war; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

RECONNAISSANCE OF THE UTE COUNTRY.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, in answer to a resolution of the House of March 6, 1874, transmitting a report and map of the reconnaissance in the Ute country, made in 1873 by Lieutenant E. H. Ruffner, of the Corps of Engineers; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

LIEUTENANT B. F. HUMPHREY.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Attorney-General, in relation to the case of Lieutenant B. F. Humphrey, of the United States Army; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

CONFERENCE COMMITTEE.

The SPEAKER announced as the conference committee on the part of the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses upon the bill (H. R. No. 1923) authorizing the payment of annuities into the Treasury of the Seminole tribe of Indians, Mr. AVERILL, Mr. SHANKS, and Mr. COMINGO.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. CRITTENDEN was granted leave of absence for two weeks on account of sickness in his family.

Mr. STANARD was granted leave of absence for a fortnight.

Mr. BARRERE was granted leave of absence for ten days.

COMMISSIONER OF FORESTRY.

Mr. DUNNELL, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, under the law, and referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That there be printed five thousand extra copies of the report of the Committee on the Public Lands on the message of the President in relation to the appointment of a commissioner of forestry.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

The House then resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. WOODFORD in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 2054) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. When this bill was last under consideration, the committee was taking a vote by tellers upon an amendment offered by the gentleman from West Virginia, [Mr. HEREFORD,] which amendment will be reported by the Clerk.

The amendment was in the portion of the bill relating to the contingent expenses of the Senate, and was to reduce the appropriations for clerks to committees from $25,000 to $15,000.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to say, before the vote is taken on that amendment, that it recurs to me as rather a novelty that the portion of this appropriation for Senate expenses, which the Committee on Appropriations have cut down more than any other perhaps, in the debate here seems to have been the most violently assailed. Last year the two items of appropriation for clerks of committees and pages of the Senate amounted to $44,000. This year, with the increase of pay made in the appropriation bill of last year, the estimates would have been $65,000. In the first place we repealed the increase of salary and took off that extra, and then we cut down the pay of the pages of the Senate fifty cents per day, making the total for these two items $24,700, or almost $10,000 less than before the increase of pay, less than it has been any year since the war. We have cut it down so low that our only fear is the Senate will consider it almost an outrage that we have cut so deeply. Now the proposition is that this appropriation already cut so low shall be reduced nearly 40 per cent. further. Again, if gentlemen desire to follow at all any line of regular order in cutting down, where it can be done, and let the appropriations stand where they are already cut as deeply as they ought to be, this at least will not be interfered with. I hope the amendment will not be agreed to.

Mr. RANDALL. There is one suggestion I desire to make to the gentleman in charge of this bill. It is that if at any time it is found that this sum is not sufficient the Senate can secure an appropriation for the deficiency. It is in the contingent expenses not only of the two Houses of Congress but in all the Departments that the great leaks have been discovered. To my mind it is the duty of this House to correct them wherever it can, and not compare the appropriations of this year with those of any other or with the administration of Mr. Buchanan, as was done the other day. It does not matter to this House nor does it matter to the country at this time what were the expenditures of the Government under Mr. Buchanan's administration. We want them cut down now to what they ought to be. If they were too high then, two wrongs do not make a right, and we had better correct the evil now.

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope that we will have a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The tellers will resume their places—the gentleman from West Virginia, Mr. HEREFORD, and the gentleman from Wisconsin, Mr. RUSK.

Mr. HEREFORD. I desire a little information upon this point. I have no desire to cut down the appropriation bill below what is actually necessary. But, as I said in my remarks when this bill was before under consideration, the appropriation now asked for is very much larger than it was in 1866 and 1869.

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman is mistaken about that. In 1868 the appropriation for this purpose was $55,000, and we now propose to give $31,000. The two items of appropriations for clerks of committees and for pages of the Senate were estimated for in a lump, and the Committee on Appropriations have separated them, as here reported.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 70, noes 84.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For hire of horses and mail-wagons for carrying the mails, $5,475.

Mr. GARFIELD. I offer the following amendment, which will not change the amount:

After the word "mails," insert "and for one saddle-horse for messengers."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For fuel and oil for the heating apparatus, $10,000; for furniture and repairs of furniture, $9,000; for labor, $12,000; for folding documents, and materials therefor, $5,000; for packing-boxes, $740; for miscellaneous items, exclusive of labor, $25,000.

Mr. RANDALL. I move to amend the clause just read by striking out "12" and inserting "7," so as to make the appropriation for labor $7,000; and by striking out "25" and inserting "15," so as to make the appropriation for miscellaneous items, exclusive of labor, $15,000. This amendment will make a reduction of $15,000. My object as to the first branch of my amendment is to obtain an explanation; and as to the matter of miscellaneous expenses of the Senate, exclusive of labor, I am satisfied that $15,000 is all that should be asked or appropriated.

Mr. GARFIELD. In answer to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, I will state that the item of appropriation for labor last year was $16,000. The estimate was for $16,000 this year. The Committee on Appropriations, after conference with the Senate Appropriations Committee on this as on other items concerning the appropriations for that body, ventured to cut down this item to $12,000, although that was going a little lower than the Senate committee were willing to assent to. The estimate for miscellaneous expenses, exclusive of labor, was $40,000. We cut it down to $25,000, believing that a reduction of $15,000 could probably be borne.

Here I want to say once for all that, in regard to the Senate expenditures, which come almost exclusively under the management of that body, we did not feel quite the same freedom in cutting down as we would upon any matter relating to our own House. We did, however, go a little further than the estimates would seem to warrant, partly by consent of the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate, and partly by going beyond what they were willing to assent to. It seemed to us that a reduction of $4,000 in the item for labor and $15,000 in the item for miscellaneous expenses was going as far as we could safely go. We did not wish to risk the necessity of deficiencies in matters of this sort, if we could avoid it. That is all the explanation I have to give.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman is fully aware that the contingent expenses of the two Houses, embraced, I believe, under the designation of miscellaneous expenditures, have been the subject of great scandal. I have examined this bill, and believe firmly that an appropriation of $15,000 for miscellaneous expenses of the Senate, exclusive of labor, is sufficient for that body.

I know that there is a sort of etiquette between the two Houses which makes it difficult for us to cut down the Senate estimates; but if we do not make a reduction in the expenses of the Senate, we shall be embarrassed when we come to the question of cutting down our own, as I have no doubt we are disposed to do. If the expenditures of the Senate be allowed to remain untouched, then, however much disposed we may be to correct abuses, there may be some difficulty in cutting down our own expenses if the result should show that the House is running at a less rate of expense than the Senate.

I withdraw that part of my amendment relating to the appropriation for labor, and confine the amendment simply to the last item of the paragraph, so as to reduce the miscellaneous expenses of the Senate, exclusive of labor, to $15,000, instead of $25,000 as proposed in the bill. The expenditure of $40,000 for such purposes (which the gentleman from Ohio says was the old figure) was a rank waste of money without excuse; and if the gentleman has been watching the newspapers of late, as I suspect he has, he knows that the Senate in its expenditures for miscellaneous items is sadly vulnerable.

Mr. GARFIELD. I only remind the gentleman that out of this miscellaneous fund are paid all the expenses of investigating committees unless special additional appropriations are asked for.

Mr. RANDALL. That is not so as to the District of Columbia investigation.

Mr. GARFIELD. I do not speak of that; but I say that the expenses of ordinary investigations, ordered by either House singly, are paid out of the miscellaneous fund.

Mr. RANDALL. Well, I would much prefer that investigating committees should have their expenses provided for by a direct and specific appropriation for the purpose.

Mr. GARFIELD. The Committee on Appropriations have cut down this item from $40,000 to $25,000. If the Committee of the Whole think it can be still further reduced so as to make the amount $15,000, according to the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, I will not contend about the matter, but submit to the judgment of the committee. I have done my duty in stating the case.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. RANDALL, there were—ayes 49, noes 33; no quorum voting.

Mr. GARFIELD. For the sake of saving time, I will not contest this question further. I am willing the amendment shall be considered as adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the amendment will be considered as adopted.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

For one captain, $2,088; three lieutenants, at $1,800 each; twenty-seven privates, at $1,584 each, $42,768; and eight watchmen, at $1,000 each, $8,000; making, in all, $58,256, one-half to be paid into the contingent fund of the House of Representatives, and the other half to be paid into the contingent fund of the Senate: Provided, That whenever a member of the Capitol police or watch force is suspended from duty for cause, said policeman or watchman shall receive no compensation for the time of such suspension.

Mr. GARFIELD. I am instructed by the Committee on Appropriations to move the following amendments:

In line 89 strike out $2,088, as the salary for the captain of the Capitol police, and insert $1,800; in line 90 strike out $1,800, as the salary of each of three lieutenants, and insert $1,600; in lines 91 and 92 strike out $1,584, as the salary of the privates, and insert $1,200.

The law fixing the pay of the Capitol police at the figures stated in the printed bill was passed in the beginning of 1872. We have followed that law steadily until last year, when the pay of the Capitol police, under the general salary increase, was increased 15 per cent. In pursuance of that increase the estimate for the Capitol police was $66,994.40. The committee, following the late reduction, reported it as it stands here in the bill, doubting whether they had the right, without the point of order being made against it, to reduce the amount. But on reflection they agreed to lay before the House a proposition making the reduction as I have suggested in this amendment to pay eighteen hundred, sixteen hundred, and twelve hundred dollars, respectively, for the three positions of chief, assistant chief, and private in the force, which will make a reduction of nine thousand and some odd hundred dollars, or nearly ten thousand dollars in the total. This, the committee believe the police force can stand without very serious injury, and they ask it be adopted.

Mr. RANDALL. Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not care to antagonize the Committee on Appropriations. It is an ungracious thing at any time to reduce salaries. I shall, however, call attention to a memorandum which I have made here when I was studying this bill, that the captain of the watch at the Treasury gets only $1,400, while the watchmen get $720 each, the acting lieutenant $1,000, as will be seen by looking at the appropriations made in this very bill.

Mr. GARFIELD. That is right.

Mr. RANDALL. Then why should a distinction be made in the two forces?

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks, why should that discrimination be made? The subject was brought before the Committee on Appropriations, and this was the answer: In the Treasury Department, as in all other Departments, there is a responsible head, who has control and charge of the building, and the watchmen there are very much more subordinates, personally, than here in the Capitol. It was necessary, in the judgment of Congress, in a building abandoned for a large share of the year by its natural managers, the two Houses of Congress; a building which probably has from twelve to sixteen millions of property in it, in the building and furniture—there is, perhaps, more in the Treasury Department, but it is not left to be guarded for a large portion of the year only by watchmen—this building, I say, is left a considerable portion of the year without anybody in charge of it, unless it be the organized police force; and it was deemed necessary in the judgment of Congress years ago, when this thing was discussed, and the present force organized, it was considered of the utmost importance that the men who are to be intrusted with the high responsibility should be men of such character as would require a higher salary than is paid to ordinary watchmen.

The committee then having charge of the appropriations under the lead of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] gave this matter full review, and a sub-committee of the Committee on Appropriations, of which the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] was a member, made a careful examination of the whole subject and reported in favor, not only of the present police organization, but of the present rates of pay as reported in this bill. The reasons they gave to the House were satisfactory that the organization should remain in the main untouched, but we thought, in view of the general reduction of expenditures, this large reduction might reasonably be made.

Mr. WALLS. I move to strike out the proviso just read, and will insert in lieu thereof what I will send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the appointment of the Capitol police shall hereafter be made by the Sergeants-at-Arms of the two Houses and the architect of the Capitol extension, but the captain of the police force may suspend any member of said force, subject to the action of the officers above referred to.

Mr. GARFIELD. I make the point of order on that amendment that it changes the law, and therefore is not in order.

Mr. WALLS. It is precisely the law of last year. I wish to ask the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations why it is that his committee seeks to change the law from what it was last year, so as to make every member of the Capitol police force subject to the action of one man, the captain of the police. Now, if this bill passes as reported by the committee, any member of the Capitol police force may be suspended by the captain of the police force, and there is no one to determine whether he has been suspended for proper cause or not. It is all left to the captain of the police. My amendment is copied verbatim from the appropriation bill of last year. I hope the amendment will be agreed to.

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman is mistaken in regard to the facts. The point of order does lie against his amendment. The fact is that all the captain of the police force can do is to temporarily suspend a man and report his case to the three others, who can reappoint or remove and appoint another. That does not change the bill at all. We have added a proviso that when the captain of the police force suspends a man, he shall be without pay until the power that can appoint or remove shall determine whether he shall stay or not.

The CHAIRMAN. The section as reported by the committee appears to change the law in some respects, and the Chair will not hold that the point of order lies against the amendment of the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. WALLS. I cannot see why the pay of a policeman or watchman should be stopped during the time of his suspension. If the captain has power to suspend a man, and he has to wait for trial, I think he ought to be paid until he is tried and dismissed, if that should be the result, or until he is restored. This is nothing more nor less than an attempt on the part of some one to put the control of the police in the power of one man, and that, the captain of the police.

Mr. GARFIELD. What the gentleman is discussing is not an amendment to my amendment at all. I raise the point of order that it is not germane.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] is correct. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Florida to offer his amendment after that of the gentleman from Ohio has been disposed of. The Clerk will again read the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. DUNNELL. I move to strike out the proviso beginning on line 98.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DUNNELL] is subject to the same point of order as that of the gentleman from Florida, [Mr. WALLS,] that it is not germane to the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Minnesota at the proper time to offer his amendment. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD.]

Mr. SENER. I ask that it may be reported.

The CHAIRMAN. It has been twice reported already.

The question being taken on Mr. GARFIELD'S amendment, it was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will now recognize the gentleman from Florida [Mr. WALLS] to offer his amendment.

Mr. WALLS. I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the proviso beginning in the ninety-eighth line, as follows:

"Provided, That whenever a member of the Capitol police or watch force is suspended from duty for cause, said policeman or watchman shall receive no compensation for the time of such suspension."

And insert the following words:

That the appointment of the Capitol police shall hereafter be made by the Sergeant-at Arms of the two Houses and the architect of the Capitol extension; and the captain of the police force may suspend any member of said force, subject to the action of the officers above referred to.

Mr. WALLS. I will state that this is verbatim the law of last year; and I cannot see why the Committee on Appropriations should want to change the control of the police force or the pay of the men. I do not think it right to suspend a man from office and keep him here waiting for trial, and not pay him at all during that time. I wish to have the law made just as it was last year.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire simply to say that the Committee on Appropriations found that in order to give a proper control over the police force it was necessary to make the men understand that if they got drunk, or behaved badly in any other way, so that they were suspended, and had their names laid before the board who had the power to remove or appoint, they could not draw pay while under suspension for cause. In order therefore to keep the police force under better control, and to have better discipline among them, this clause was added, that when a member of the police force was suspended for cause, the pay should be stopped until the case was disposed of by the board having the power of suspension or removal. This does not change the old law at all, except simply by saying that while he is suspended, during the time of suspension, the pay of the policeman or watchman shall not go on. I hope the committee will not strike out the proviso. By retaining it they will both save money to the Treasury and increase the efficiency and discipline of the police force.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Florida, [Mr. WALLS.]

Mr. O'BRIEN. I ask the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations if the amendment of the gentleman from Florida is not the law at present?

Mr. GARFIELD. Certainly it is the law; and all his amendment does is to strike out the proviso, which deprives a man of pay while he is suspended for cause.

The question being taken on the amendment offered by Mr. WALLS, it was not agreed to.

Mr. DUNNELL. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the proviso commencing on line 98, as follows:

"Provided, That whenever a member of the Capitol police or watch force is suspended from duty for cause, said policeman or watchman shall receive no compensation for the time of such suspension."

Mr. DUNNELL. While the adoption of this proviso might possibly save a few dollars to the Treasury, I think its principle is decidedly wrong and oppressive. It should be remembered that when a man is suspended he has liabilities as well as when he is at work. This proviso strikes at the man's family. If the man be so unfortunate as to be accused of some dereliction of duty he is suspended. He might be kept suspended for thirty days or sixty days, and on then being brought to trial may be found innocent; yet in that case, under this proviso, he loses his pay during the time of his suspension, although afterward found innocent.

The gentleman from Ohio has said that a man may be suspended for being drunk. Now, our laws should be humane; they should be Christian as far as possible. Suppose this man who is thus suspended has been suspended for drunkenness—you suspend him and then cut off his pay. By doing so you but madden the man and drive him to desperation. You make his family, his wife and children, suffer. I say this is wrong. When a man is suspended for an alleged cause let him be tried forthwith, and, if found guilty, let him be removed; if found innocent, let him be acquitted and go on with his work. But by no means hang him up and suspend his pay at the mere caprice and whim of this captain of police. You give this captain too much power altogether. You make him a petty tyrant. He can kill and make alive at his word, and suspend the man's pay.

Mr. Chairman, we never take away a man's salary until he is found guilty. His salary goes on while he is under trial. I say let us carry out this principle here, and let these men be tried and have their compensation while they are being tried. The principle of this proviso is wrong, and I hope the committee will strike it out. I ask a division on it.

Mr. GARFIELD. If the gentleman's amendment is carried, it will break down all the discipline of the force; we might just as well let them go at once.

The question being taken on Mr. DUNNELL'S amendment, it was not agreed to.

Mr. GARFIELD. I am disposed to think that there is no objection to an amendment which has been suggested by the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. BARRY.]

Mr. BARRY. I move to insert after the word "cause," in the proviso, the words "and not reinstated;" so that it will read:

Provided, That whenever a member of the Capitol police or watch force is suspended from duty for cause, and not reinstated, said policeman or watchman shall receive no compensation for the time of such suspension.

If a man is not reinstated, it seems to me he ought not to be paid during the time of his suspension; but if he is reinstated he should be paid.

Mr. GARFIELD. I have no objection to that amendment, but it should come in at the end of the proviso, after the word "suspension."

Mr. BARRY. Very well; I will offer it in that form.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask that authority be given to the Clerk, when amounts are changed in a paragraph, to change the footing so as to make it correspond.

The CHAIRMAN. It will be so ordered if there be no objection. The Chair hears none.

Mr. SENER. I move to strike out in lines 93 and 94 the word "eight" where it occurs, and to insert "twelve;" so as to make it read:

Twelve watchmen, at $1,000 each, $12,000.

I ask the attention of the committee to this amendment. There are now, and there have been, as I understand, but eight watchmen employed under authority of existing law in addition to the Capitol police. The necessity for twelve watchmen will be shown by the two letters which I send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., December 12, 1873.

Hon. JOHN R. FRENCH,
Sergeant-at-Arms United States Senate:
Hon. N. G. ORDWAY,
Sergeant-at-Arms House of Representatives:

It becomes my duty to call your attention to the fact that the fences have all been removed from the east and west parks of the Capitol grounds, leaving those grounds wholly open and exposed, without watchmen during the night-time; and as four watchmen were left off the rolls some time since, I think it would be well for you to ask the Vice-President and the Speaker of the House of Representatives to authorize you to put on four men—the same number that was dropped when the last change was made—in order that you may have some watchmen whom we can place in the grounds at night, to prevent injury being done to the trees and other property of the Government.

I find already that much of the box bordering around the walks has been removed during the night since the removal of the fences.

Respectfully, &c.,

S. S. BLACKFORD,
Captain United States Capitol Police Force.

I concur in the necessity for the additional men.

N. G. ORDWAY,
Sergeant-at-Arms House of Representatives.

Approved, the public service seeming to demand it imperatively.

J. G. BLAINE.

I concur in the views of the Speaker.

H. WILSON.

OFFICE SERGEANT-AT-ARMS HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, March 18, 1874.

MY DEAR SIR: I have to go away for a day or two, and on looking into the appropriation bill I find that there are but eight watchmen provided for, whereas there should be twelve.

The Appropriation Committee did not appropriate for but eight last year; but when the fence was removed from around the Capitol grounds it became necessary, in order to protect the trees and shrubs, and to see that no damage was done during the night, to have two more men for each park, making four in all. This increase was made upon the authority of the Speaker of the House and the Vice-President, and upon the application of the captain of the police. The men were put on duty on the 1st of January; and I believe some of them went to duty about the 16th of last December.

Mr. French, the Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate, is away, and I have not the order of the Speaker and Vice-President at hand, but my clerk will get it and make a copy for you to use when you get to that part of the appropriation bill providing for the watchmen. State these facts; and, if necessary, read the captain's letter and the authorization of the Presiding Officers of the two Houses, which make it obligatory upon the Senate and House to make the appropriation.

I am obliged to be away for a day or two, and write you this note in order that the matter may not be overlooked if it should come up during my absence.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

N. G. ORDWAY,
Sergeant-at-Arms House of Representatives.

Hon. J. B. SENER.

Mr. SENER. Mr. Chairman, it will be seen by the reading of those letters that these watchmen have been placed on duty, and that they have been discharging the duties required of them, and that they are doing duty daily or nightly; that they were placed there under an authorization by the Speaker of the House, and the Vice-President of the United States, the Presiding Officer of the Senate. It is shown also by the officers who have these matters in charge that they are necessary. They have discharged the duty for two or three months and have received no pay. If this appropriation is not made, these watchmen, the necessity of whose employment is certified to by the Presiding Officers of the two Houses, and by the police authorities of the Capitol, will have to be discharged, and the result will be that the public grounds will be exposed.

Mr. HOLMAN. I rise to oppose the amendment. The papers which have been read at the Clerk's desk are in harmony with all the communications that come to this House from officers of the Government. I think that if a communication were to come here proposing to diminish the number of employés or to reduce their salaries, it would do what seldom happens here—create a profound sensation.

For the purpose of getting a few facts about these items of expenditure, I send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read an amendment putting the appropriation back to what it was a few years ago when a distinguished citizen of Illinois, Mr. Elihu B. Washburne, was here demanding economy on the other side of the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the whole paragraph and insert:
For Capitol police, $21,480.

Mr. HOLMAN. Twenty-one thousand four hundred and eighty dollars was the entire appropriation for this purpose in 1866. I have copied the amendment from the act of 1866.

Mr. GARFIELD. Before the gentleman moves to strike out, it is in order to perfect the paragraph by amendments.

Mr. HOLMAN. Still a substitute is, of course, always in order, although it will not be voted on until the amendments proposed in order to perfect the paragraph shall have been disposed of.

The CHAIRMAN, (Mr. POTTER in the chair.) It is in order for the committee, in the first place, to perfect the paragraph by amendments thereto before voting on striking it out.

Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly, the vote will first be taken on the amendments to perfect the paragraph; but still the motion to strike out is in order.

The CHAIRMAN. But the gentleman from Indiana will see that other gentlemen may desire to perfect the paragraph.

Mr. HOLMAN. A motion to strike out is always in order; but it does not come to be voted on until propositions to amend the text have been voted on.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will regard the motion of the gentleman from Indiana as pending.

Mr. HOLMAN. Now, Mr. Chairman, I have said so often that I do not desire to repeat it, but I must, that there can be no such thing as economy in appropriations unless we commence somewhere. Gentlemen talk about diminishing extravagant expenditures, but they never reach the point at which they are willing to commence. These millions and millions of dollars appropriated for salaries are made up of small items.

Now, in 1866, when gold was at a premium of 50 per cent., and when the expense of living at the capital was certainly higher than it is now, an appropriation of $21,480 was deemed to be sufficient for this purpose, whereas it is now proposed to appropriate over $50,000 for the same purpose. I have not asked the gentleman from Ohio to go back to the more economical period before the war; I do not ask that, but I take one of the most expensive periods in our history, the year 1866, when the cost of living was far beyond what it is now.

All I ask is that we shall go back a short time, that we shall retrace our steps to the extent only of fixing upon reasonable standards of expenditure as they were understood eight years ago. Nothing has occurred since then to render it necessary to increase the number of persons to be employed here, or to increase their salaries, unless it be the vandalism which has torn down the tasteful and elegant inclosures about these grounds. If that is given as a reason, then I say it is like other steps of your progress; you first lay the foundation for an increase of expenditure, and then come forward and ask appropriations to meet it. You first enact a law to remove the monuments which were agreeable to our memories because they reached far back into the past, and then you come forward and insist upon an increased number of employés and an increase of appropriations to the extent of more than $30,000 a year for that purpose. It is thus, step by step, that these millions are built up. I trust there is an opposition party in this House who will show to the country that they have at least a disposition to resist this tendency to increase the appropriations of the Government.

Mr. SENER. I respect the motives which prompt my distinguished friend from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] who opposes this amendment or any other that may be offered which seems to increase instead of curtailing the expenditures of this Government. But it seems to me the true test to be applied to this amendment or any other is simply to ascertain whether it is necessary for the public service. Is it essential for the preservation of these grounds, the ornament of this capital, and the pride of this nation? Is it necessary that these walks and paths shall be patrolled, protected at the lone hour of night, when citizens from all parts of the Republic, and those residing here in Washington, are passing to and fro through these grounds? If this force is necessary for that purpose, I say that no mere cry of economy should be sufficient to sway the judgment of this House against voting an appropriation which is recommended by our Sergeant-at-Arms, approved by the Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate, and which also has the indorsement of the distinguished Presiding Officer of this body, and likewise of the Vice-President of the United States. This amendment involves simply an appropriation of $4,000, and in the judgment of those officers it is necessary in order to protect these grounds in the night time, to keep away bad people, to protect citizens who are passing through the grounds, and to guard the trees and shrubbery which surround and make these grounds beautiful.

Mr. GARFIELD. I oppose the amendment, and hope it will be voted down.

Mr. GUNCKEL. I wish to call the attention of the committee to the numbers employed on the police force. We have here, for this Capitol alone, twenty-seven members of the police and four officers, and also eight watchmen. And if gentlemen will turn to pages 10 and 11 of this bill they will find that provision is made for quite a number of other employés, engineers, firemen, &c.; and among them four additional laborers in the Capitol, at an annual expense of $2,880. They will also find quite a number of laborers employed not only in the Capitol, but in other public grounds. Each public square in Washington has provided for it a watchman at Government expense.

According to this bill the police force and watchmen employed in the Capitol cost over $58,000 per annum. Thinking this item rather large, I had the curiosity to ascertain the expenditure for similar purposes in England. I found that for the two houses of Parliament the number employed was about one-third less; that the ordinary annual expenses for police and watchmen for the two houses of Parliament is £2,360; then there is an extra expenditure for police and watchmen during the sessions of Parliament of £430, making a total of £2,790. Now, calculating the pound at five dollars in our currency, it will be seen that the entire expense of policing and watching the two houses of Parliament is $13,950; while for performing that service about this Capitol the expense is $58,000, or about four times as much. I am told by gentlemen who have visited the Parliament buildings, (I have not,) that they are about as large and about as difficult to police and watch as this Capitol. Why, then, should we pay four times as much for that service here?

We have here a police force of twenty-seven men, and for that are provided a captain and three lieutenants. I object to the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. SENER,] and as soon as it shall be in order I will move to cut down the number of officers, and also the number of privates in this police force, believing the force larger than is necessary. I agree with my friend from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] that if we really mean economy, we should commence here and now.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I ask my colleague [Mr. SENER] to withdraw his amendment, and I will renew it

Mr. SENER. I will do so.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I renew the amendment simply to say to the House that my friend from Ohio [Mr. GUNCKEL] seems to think that everything in this House and in this country must be measured by the standard which is established in England. I want to ask him if he desires that we shall pay our laborers according to the standard of pay in England? I noticed that while the military appropriation bill was before the House the gentleman called attention to the fact that we pay a great deal more for certain things in this country than is paid for similar things in England.

Does not the gentleman know that we pay more to mechanics and laborers of all grades than they receive in other countries? It is one of our proudest boasts that labor is better rewarded in this country than in the despotic countries of Europe. This is one of the principal things that draw immigration to our shores; and I hope that whatever argument the gentleman may make in regard to these matters he will not contend that labor in this country should be put on a level as to pay with labor in Great Britain and Europe.

Mr. PARSONS. Is it not true that the members of this police force are on duty only one day out of every three?

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I do not know whether that is so or not; that is a question the gentleman can answer for himself, if he has any information on the point.

Mr. PARSONS. I understand that the whole difficulty about the police force is simply this: there is one captain of police——

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. As the gentleman is not asking a question, I hope he will not speak in my five minutes.

Mr. GUNCKEL. I wish to ask the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. PLATT] whether he means to say that an ordinary laborer in England gets only one-quarter as much as a similar laborer in this country; or, in other words, does a laborer here get four times as much as a laborer in England?

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I believe that average will hold good.

Mr. GUNCKEL. Then the gentleman is not well informed on the subject.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. Certainly the American laborer receives a much larger proportion of pay than the laborer abroad.

Mr. GUNCKEL. Four times as much?

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I do not know whether the disproportion is so great as that in all cases, but I know that it is in some instances. I do not, however, care particularly about that point. I want to protest, as a member of this House and as a representative of American laborers, against any attempt being made here to introduce into this country the standard of prices prevailing in countries abroad.

Mr. PARSONS. I had no intention of occupying a moment's time in regard to this question——

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I renew the amendment offered by my colleague, [Mr. SENER.]

Mr. PARSONS. I was about to do the same thing; I am obliged to the gentleman for his courtesy. The sum appropriated by this bill for Capitol police force is now about $40,000, with the reduction proposed in the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations. I believe the salaries fixed are about right, and that they ought to be left as the Committee on Appropriations has left them. But I wish to ask the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations whether it is not true that there are three lieutenants of police in this Capitol, and that the Capitol police is divided into three squads, each squad doing duty one day in every three? Is not that the reason of the extraordinary expense for watching this Capitol? I believe that every man who is employed in the various Departments of the Government has daily occupation and daily hours of labor. But as to the Capitol police, my impression is (I may be entirely wrong) that only nine men are on duty every three days.

Mr. GARFIELD. They are on duty eight hours out of every twenty-four.

Mr. PARSONS. If these policemen only work twenty-four hours in three days, and if that is the reason of the enormous expense of this police force, my idea would be that instead of adding four watchmen, as my friend from Virginia desires, some of these twenty-seven policemen who are doing nothing around the Capitol should be dispensed with.

Mr. ALBRIGHT. Do not eight hours constitute a legal day's work?

Mr. PARSONS. Not for a member of Congress. [Laughter.]

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. This proposition does not affect members of Congress. Before the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. PARSONS] takes his seat I wish to call attention to the fact that, according to his own statement, these men work daily the number of hours recognized by the present laws of Congress as a day's work for Government employés. They are on duty eight hours out of twenty-four.

Mr. PARSONS. I do not so understand.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. It is the fact. These policemen are divided into three gangs, which do duty in succession, each serving eight hours out of the twenty-four.

Mr. SENER. I wish to ask my friend from Ohio [Mr. PARSONS] whether he prefers that the park of this Capitol should be guarded by four watchmen or by privates of the police force, receiving a salary of $1,500?

Mr. PARSONS. I do not particularly object to the gentleman's amendment; but I desire that these policemen shall perform their full share of duty.

Mr. KELLEY. Permit me to offer a suggestion. In addition to the fact that these men are on duty eight hours out of every twenty-four, it should be borne in mind that when the House and the Senate adjourn, the fires go out; and I know a number of these men who have suffered very much in health from their exposure to the intense cold and the draughts prevailing in this Capitol at night.

Mr. PARSONS. I have in my desk at this moment a large number of applications for places on the Capitol police, because these positions pay so much better than places on the police in my own city. These applicants are perfectly willing to run the risk of any damage to their health in this Capitol, where they are protected from the sun and the storm, rather than serve twelve hours daily in the open air upon our city police, engaged often in fighting with burglars and exposed to the other perils to which policemen everywhere else than here are subjected. I do not object to a properly regulated and properly paid police in the Capitol. I did not rise to make any objection on that score, but to inquire whether it is the fact that these men are only on duty one day out of every three.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on the amendment is exhausted.

Mr. SENER. I hope the House will recollect that this is recommended by all the officers having charge of the matter as necessary.

The amendment to the amendment was again reported.

Mr. ARCHER. I move to amend the amendment, making it "nine" instead of "twelve."

Mr. WOODWORTH. Will the gentleman yield to me for one moment?

Mr. ARCHER. I will say what I have to say, and the gentleman from Ohio can take the floor afterward.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the remarks of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SENER] are calculated to mislead the House. The four watchmen appointed under the order of the Vice-President and of the Speaker of the House have been ordered to be paid up to this time out of the contingent fund of the Senate and House.

Mr. SENER. I beg the gentleman's pardon; I am almost sure that it is not so. Does the gentleman know the fact to be as he states it?

Mr. ARCHER. I am on the Committee on Accounts, and we have passed their bills; but whether the proper officer of the House has paid them or not I cannot say. If he has not, they will be provided for in the deficiency bill, and not in this.

Mr. SENER. I understand differently.

Mr. ARCHER. But the effect of the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia would not be to pay the four men employed under these officers, but it would be to perpetuate and make the number of watchmen about the grounds twelve instead of eight, which would be a permanent increase of four.

Mr. SENER. Do you think eight are sufficient?

Mr. ARCHER. I think eight officers are sufficient to guard the grounds which lie in front of the Capitol. But the Committee on Accounts have audited these bills for payment out of the contingent fund of the House and Senate, or by a provision in the deficiency bill, because the Speaker of the House and the President of the Senate thought at that time, while the first changes were being made, it was necessary there should be this temporary guard. The eight now provided by law, I feel satisfied, and I think my committee feel satisfied, are sufficient to guard the grounds around the Capitol. I mean those eight in addition to those we have in the Botanical Garden and in addition to the Capitol police which the law now authorizes.

Mr. SENER. Will you pass any more accounts?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. WOODWORTH. I do not wish to say a single word, but I have in my hand a little information on the subject discussed by my colleague, [Mr. PARSONS,] and I desire it may be read at the Clerk's desk. I think he will find that he is altogether mistaken in some of the statements he has made.

The Clerk read as follows:

UNITED STATES CAPITOL,
Washington, D. C., March 18, 1874.

DEAR SIR: Your letter of a late date making inquiries as to the duties, numbers, &c., of the Capitol police, was duly received, and in answer thereto I submit the following:

The United States Capitol police force consists of one captain, three lieutenants, and twenty-seven privates, and is divided into three "reliefs" of nine privates and one lieutenant, each relief doing duty twelve out of every thirty-six hours, alternating day and night the year round, excepting thirty days' leave of absence granted to each man during the recess of Congress. Counting two hours for one, for every hour of night duty, as is the custom in other branches of Government employ, the Capitol police render to the Government twelve hours' duty out of every twenty-four hours.

The duties of the Capitol police are to preserve order and decorum within the Capitol and its grounds; to protect the public property within the same from injury and depredation; to enforce the rules and regulations prescribed by the Presiding Officers of the two Houses of Congress in regard to the opening and closing of the building and admitting persons thereto. And after the adjournment of Congress, each day and during the night, as well as during the recess, the Capitol with its entire contents is in charge of the Capitol police, and they are held strictly responsible for the faithful protection of the same. The building is required to be patrolled outside every night, as often as once every hour, and the windows to the various committee-rooms examined, that they may not be left open exposing their contents to theft. And each policeman while on duty inside of the building is required to visit all parts of his post once in every fifteen minutes; and in this way the Capitol and all of the public property therein contained, is guarded day and night the year round. There is scarcely a night when the building is searched by the police but that the windows or doors to committee-rooms, or other rooms connected with the Senate or House of Representatives, are found insecure and frequently left open. The night of the 24th of February, the windows and doors opening into ten committee and other rooms, containing the most valuable documents and records of both Houses of Congress, were left unfastened. And again, on the night of the 8th of March, 1874, there were found open, in like manner, fourteen windows and doors of important rooms in connection with the Senate and House of Representatives. And from January 1 to March 8, 1874, sixty-seven windows and forty-three doors opening into important rooms of the Senate and House, have, at different times, been found open, exposing their contents to theft. They were secured by the police on night duty. So it will be seen that the Capitol police renders valuable service to the Government in protecting the public property under their charge, as well as preventing the building from being defaced by curious and careless visitors. And while other employés of the Capitol are enjoying the luxury of sleep, the police are required to be watchful and vigilant at all hours of the night. As to the reduction of the force, I will say that the Capitol is visited by thousands of people every day, and to preserve order throughout the building, to protect the business of the Supreme Court and Court of Claims from interruption, to guard the Congressional Library and a vast mass of important records of the courts, as well as of both Houses of Congress from depredation, and watch a large amount of valuable property besides, cannot, in my judgment, be properly done with a less number of men than we now have. It will be remembered that in addition to the duties of the police, above enumerated, each member of the force is required to furnish his own uniform at an expense of about $125 per annum.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

S. S. BLACKFORD,
Captain United States Capitol Police.

Hon. L. D. WOODWORTH.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on the amendment of the amendment to the amendment is exhausted.

Mr. SENER. I ask the gentleman from Maryland to withdraw the amendment to the amendment, and I will renew it.

Mr. GARFIELD. I shall object to any further withdrawals.

Mr. SENER. I have a right to renew the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment to the amendment, and all debate is out of order.

Mr. SENER. May I ask a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Certainly.

Mr. SENER. I am certainly not familiar with the parliamentary usages of the House, but I have observed this, that when certain gentlemen offer to withdraw there is no sort of objection. I do not see why my friend cannot withdraw his amendment so I may renew it and speak to it.

Mr. GARFIELD. I object to any withdrawal.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. ARCHER,] asks leave to withdraw his amendment. Is there objection?

Mr. GARFIELD. I object.

The amendment to the amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. SENER. I move to amend the amendment by striking out "twelve" and inserting "eleven."

The CHAIRMAN. That amendment is in order, and the gentleman has the floor.

Mr. SENER. Mr. Chairman, I see one thing very plainly here, that a young member has to assert his individuality or he will get but little show in this House. I observe certain members can debate from the beginning to the end of our daily sessions and it is always in order; but if certain others of us rise to speak we are always very disorderly. The House will bear me witness that I have not annoyed them much during this session. This is my second appearance on this floor. And I am here now to respond to what my friend from Maryland [Mr. ARCHER] has said.

The gentleman from Maryland has made the point as against me that this additional force is not necessary; while in the same breath he contends that the Committee on Contingent Expenses has done, what? Why, that they have absolutely passed these accounts—for what purpose? Passed them that they may be put into the next deficiency bill, so that they may be paid month after month until July of this year, the end of the present fiscal year.

If, then, the Committee on Accounts have done this thing; if they have done it upon their responsibility as members of this House, and upon their responsibility as the most trusted committee of this House; if their action is an approbation of the action of the Sergeant-at-Arms of this House, and of the Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate, and of the Presiding Officers of both Houses, does that go to show that my amendment is unnecessary? Does it not, on the contrary, establish the fact of its necessity? If it is necessary for the current fiscal year, then why strike it down, and attempt to strike me down here when I offer to insure a necessary appropriation for a necessary service? If it is necessary until July, will it not be necessary after that time?

I say, coming back to my original amendment for twelve watchmen, that it is right; that it is necessary for the protection of this Capitol. It is not right to save at the spigot and waste at the bung. It is not right to be striking at the subordinate watchmen, and to be voting other appropriations that will be coming in soon; not only recommending an increase of salaries to heads of Departments, but absolutely recommending additional service in those Departments.

I withdraw my amendment to the amendment, and hope the committee will see the necessity of what I first proposed, namely, of increasing the number of watchmen to twelve.

Mr. ARCHER. I desire to say just one word. When the Committee on Accounts passed these accounts, they passed them subject to the approval of the House when the House should come to act upon them in the consideration of the deficiency bill. The high officers of this House and of the Senate had thought it was necessary at that time that these men should be employed; that in accordance——

Mr. BUFFINTON. My friend from Maryland, who is my colleague on the Committee on Accounts, I think is somewhat in error. If I understood him correctly, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SENER] stated that the Committee on Accounts had passed bills when there was no appropriation.

Mr. SENER. That is what my friend from Maryland told me.

Mr. BUFFINTON. The appropriation bill passed last year provides that this account shall be paid, one half from the contingent fund of the House, and the other half from the contingent fund of the Senate. The Committee on Accounts have passed no bill unless there has been an appropriation for it.

Mr. SENER. I leave the question to be settled between my two friends of the Committee on Accounts. I know nothing about it myself.

Mr. ARCHER. That was the view of the Committee on Accounts. But since the Committee on Accounts have met, and since I have been here in the House this morning, the Clerk informs me that the appropriation last year was for eight watchmen, but that, twelve having been employed, there would be a deficiency, which would have to be made up in the deficiency bill. The action of our committee is not the doing of an illegal act by disposing of any money which we had not the control of.

Mr. SENER. I did not mean to say that.

Mr. ARCHER. I understand that. I understand that the gentleman did not mean to be offensive in that way. It is for the whole House to act on what we have done, and either approve or disapprove.

Mr. SENER. But you recommend favorable action. I ask leave to withdraw my amendment to the amendment.

There was no objection, and the amendment to the amendment was withdrawn.

The CHAIRMAN. The question recurs on the original amendment of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. SENER,] to strike out "eight," before the word "watchmen," and insert "twelve."

The question being taken on the amendment, there were—ayes 9, noes not counted.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to offer an amendment to perfect the paragraph before a vote is taken to strike it out.

The CHAIRMAN, (Mr. WOODFORD in the chair.) The Chair is informed that, while he was absent, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] moved to strike out the paragraph. Does the gentleman from Indiana insist on taking the sense of the committee on that motion?

Mr. HOLMAN. I do; but I think the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GUNCKEL] is in order when he proposes to perfect the original text before the committee votes on the question of striking it out.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GUNCKEL] will be reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 90 strike out "three" and insert "two," so it will read "two lieutenants;" and in line 91 strike out "seven," so it will read "twenty privates."

Mr. GUNCKEL. I desire to raise the question whether this Capitol police force is not unnecessarily large. I propose to cut down the officers one, and to take seven from the number of privates.

In some remarks I made a few moments ago I endeavored to show that the expense of this police force was unnecessarily large, and I compared it with similar expenses in connection with the houses of Parliament in England. My friend from Virginia [Mr. PLATT] called attention to what I said upon that point, and criticised me for saying it. I think it would be proper for me, if I were endeavoring to enconomize, to compare my expenses with those of my neighbors, if I were carrying on a store or manufactory, so that I might ascertain by the comparison with the way in which my neighbors conducted a similar business how I might retrench. Looking at this matter in the same way, I had the curiosity to ascertain what the similar service costs in another country, and from the comparison I made I find this expense unnecessarily large.

Now, my friend says that I do not take into account the fact that labor is cheaper there than it is here. But, sir, as I suggested to him, it is certainly not four times greater here than it is there. And more than that, he fails to take into account the other fact, that the force here is twice as large as the force there. Is there any reason why it should take two men to do duty here which it takes one man to do there? I assert that there is no building in the United States where so large a force is employed in proportion to its size as about this Capitol. We find the newspapers of the country wondering all the time what this Capitol police force has to do, and we have heard to-day, for the first time officially, that there is a police force numbering thirty-one men; that that force has only a holiday of one month in the year; that occasionally some of them are awake when others are asleep, and that on a given occasion they shut fourteen windows. Twenty-seven policemen shut fourteen windows! Now, I maintain that an expenditure of over $50,000 a year for this police force is unnecessarily large, and I think the very communications which have been sent here and read at the desk show that fact better than anything else could. I hope, therefore, that in the line of economy we shall reduce this appropriation. It is said that we are "penny-wise;" that may be so; but it does not therefore follow that we are "pound-foolish." There is another old adage, that if you take care of the pennies the pounds will take care of themselves; and I have generally found that those who are disposed to be economical in little matters are the very gentlemen who stand up for economy in greater matters.

Mr. GARFIELD. I want the committee to understand the reason why not only the present Committee on Appropriations, but the Committees on Appropriations for several years past, have recommended the present organization of the Capitol police. It was thought to be unsafe to leave this Capitol without a force at all times on hand and watching it; and it was also thought that whatever the force we may have ought to be, it should be divisible by three, and that each one of the three divisions ought to have somebody to command and take charge of it.

Mr. GUNCKEL. Why three? There are only two wings to the Capitol.

Mr. GARFIELD. Simply because no one, so far as I am able to find out, is willing or able to stand watch for one half of twenty-four hours each day of the year and guard everything in this Capitol and take care of it. The understanding has been, and that has been the practice for five years, that there are three reliefs. One-third of the force goes on for eight hours, while the others rest; the second third goes on for the next eight hours; and the last third goes on for the next eight hours, and such relief is under the command of an officer. Now, if gentlemen think it safe to leave this building for a part of the night unwatched, let them do so. If you have only two reliefs, one will have to be on duty during one part of the day and the other for the other part of the day, and for the rest of the time the building will be left unguarded and liable to be broken into by burglars.

Mr. KASSON. What are the present stations of the police?

Mr. GARFIELD. The committee called the officers of the Capitol police before them and asked them precisely how they disposed of the nine men that go to make up one-third of the twenty-seven, and they informed us that they kept up nine police stations—one to each wing in each story; and it seemed to us when they gave us the stations which they kept constantly occupied by policemen that it would not be safe to abandon any one of those stations.

Mr. KASSON. How about the dome?

Mr. GARFIELD. The dome itself requires constant watching. During the day a stream of visitors is pouring up and down the flight of stairs that leads to the top of the dome. The doors of the Capitol are open on all sides during the day, and members of Congress have access here late into the night; and if gentlemen think it safe to leave so valuable a property as this, isolated as it is, standing alone by itself, let them say so. It is not, as Westminster Hall is, surrounded by the courts and by other buildings, with all the police of the city to guard it; it is not everywhere shut in, as the houses of Parliament of England are. There is no comparison between the relative exposure of the two buildings. For my own part, I believe we have made this provision as close and careful in its economy as it ought to be made.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. RANDALL. It seems to me that the captain could perform the duties of one of these lieutenants with great propriety.

Mr. SPEER. Is not the amendment divisible, so that we can take a vote first on the reduction of the number of lieutenants? I think the captain should take the place of one of the lieutenants.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment is divisible.

The question was taken on the first clause of the amendment; and on a division there were—ayes 29.

Without counting the negative votes tellers were ordered, and Mr. GARFIELD and Mr. RANDALL were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 39, noes 57.

The CHAIRMAN. Is a further count insisted upon?

Mr. RANDALL. It is.

The CHAIRMAN. The rule requires that when the absence of a quorum is disclosed in committee the roll of members shall be called. The Chair has done all in his power to induce members to vote and to facilitate the business of the committee. The Chair will now enforce the rules, and direct the roll to be called, in order to ascertain the absentees, to be reported to the House.

Mr. O'BRIEN. Is it in order to move that the committee rise?

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will rise informally to receive a message from the Senate.

The committee rose, and Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts, having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore—

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate was communicated to the House by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, informing the House that the Senate had passed without amendment House bills of the following titles:

A bill (H. R. No. 215) to exempt George W. Richmond, of Pittston, in the State of Pennsylvania, from the payment of $881.29 for postage-stamps stolen from his office while postmaster;

A bill (H. R. No. 476) to establish bonded warehouses for the storing and cleaning of rice intended for transportation;

A bill (H. R. No. 1576) for the relief of Reuel B. Fuller, of Wilton, Maine;

A bill (H. R. No. 1756) to amend an act entitled "An act to withdraw from settlement and sale a certain section of land in Wyoming Territory," approved May 23, 1872; and

A bill (H. R. No. 2225) to amend an act entitled "An act to prevent the extermination of fur-bearing animals in Alaska," approved July 21, 1870.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed, and requested the concurrence of the House in, bills of the following titles:

A bill (S. No. 221) to fund the sum due the Prairie band of Pottawatomie Indians under the provisions of the treaty of February 27, 1867, and to transfer and fund any sum which may be found due from the Citizens' band of Pottawatomies to the Prairie band, according to an agreement entered into between said bands July 18, 1873, and to use both principal and interest for the civilization of said Indians;

A bill (S. No. 207) for the relief of C. E. Rogers;

A bill (S. No. 318) to provide for the transmission of merchandise in certain cases;

A bill (S. No. 465) for the relief of Joseph Council, of Mobile, Alabama;

A bill (S. No. 470) for the relief of James R. Young;

A bill (S. No. 580) to authorize the employment of certain aliens as engineers and pilots; and

A bill (S. No. 583) making an appropriation to defray the expenses of the joint select committee to inquire into the affairs of the District of Columbia.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Committee of the Whole resumed its session.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will proceed to call the roll of members.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I rise to a point of order. It is that the committee having risen, and the House having received a message from the Senate, there cannot now be a call of the roll until a new vote shall disclose the want of a quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The rising of the committee was informal, and according to the usual custom. The Chair, with great respect, does not think the point well taken.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Can the business of receiving a message from the Senate be transacted except in the House with a quorum present? And is it not, therefore, a presumption that a quorum of the House in receiving that message has transacted business?

Mr. RANDALL. The question of a lack of a quorum was not raised in the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The count upon the last vote disclosed no quorum voting. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL,] insisting upon a further count, it is the duty of the Chair, under the rule, to direct the roll of members to be called.

Mr. O'BRIEN. As this is an important bill, I insist upon my motion that the committee rise.

The CHAIRMAN. That motion is not in order. There is evidently a quorum of members present in the Chamber, although the count on the last vote discloses that no quorum was voting.

Mr. SPEER. On Tuesday last when the committee divided, and it was shown that there was no quorum voting, if I am not in error, the Chair held that the only motion in order was that the committee rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair, having served one day's session longer now than he had then, understands the rules better and will enforce them. [Laughter.] The Clerk will proceed to call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following members failed to answer to their names:

Messrs. Adams, Arthur, Atkins, Barber, Barnum, Barrere, Bass, Brown, Burrows, Benjamin F. Butler, Roderick R. Butler, Cessna, Freeman Clarke, Clinton L. Cobb, Cox, Creamer, Crocker, Crounse, Curtis, Dawes, DeWitt, Dobbins, Duell, Elliott, Farwell, Fort, Freeman, Gooch, Eugene Hale, Hancock, Hays, Gerry W. Hazelton, Herndon, Hersey, Hooper, Hoskins, Hunton, Hurlbut, Hynes, Jewett, Kellogg, Killinger, Knapp, Lamison, Lamport, Lansing, Lewis, Lofland, Lowe, Luttrell, Maynard, MacDougall, Morey, Morrison, Niles, Nunn, O'Brien, Orth, Page, Phelps, Pierce, Pratt, Ray, Richmond, James W. Robinson, Ross, Milton Sayler, Henry J. Scudder, Sheldon, Sloss, Small, George L. Smith, William A. Smith, Standeford, Starkweather, Stephens, Stowell, Sypher, Taylor, Tyner, Waldron, Jasper D. Ward, Wilber, John M. S. Williams, Wilshire, Wood, John D. Young, and Pierce M. B. Young.

The Speaker having resumed the chair,

Mr. WOODFORD said: The House being in Committee of the Whole upon the bill (H. R. No. 2064) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes, found itself on a division without a quorum. The Chair directed the roll to be called, and now, in accordance with the rule, reports the absentees, that their names may be entered on the Journal.

The SPEAKER. The roll shows the presence of two hundred members, and under the rule the House at once resolves itself again into the Committee of the Whole. But the Chair cannot refrain from remarking upon the extraordinary circumstance that, with two-thirds of the entire House present, the Committee of the Whole should be compelled to rise for lack of a quorum. The gentleman from New York [Mr. WOODFORD] will resume the chair as Chairman of the Committee of the Whole.

The Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union resumed its session.

The CHAIRMAN. A quorum having appeared upon the roll-call, the House is again in Committee of the Whole. The Clerk will read the pending amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 90 strike out "three" and insert "two;" so as to provide for two lieutenants of the Capitol police.

The question being taken on agreeing to the amendment, there were—ayes 23, noes 115.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The next question is upon the second clause of the amendment, which is to strike out "seven" in line 91 so as to provide for twenty privates instead of twenty-seven.

The amendment was not agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana moves to amend by striking out the pending paragraph and inserting the following:

For Capitol police, $21,480.

Mr. HOLMAN. I make a pro forma modification of my amendment, with the view of having read an extract from the appropriation act of 1866. I desire to show what was the appropriation for this purpose in that year, when the expenses of living in this city were far greater than they are now.

The Clerk read as follows:

For Capitol police, $21,480: Provided, That $330 of the appropriation for the Capitol police may be used during the present fiscal year.

Mr. HOLMAN. Now, Mr. Chairman, it is proposed that we shall more than double the appropriation made for Capitol police in 1866, a year which I have selected because it was one inevitably expensive. The proposition is to appropriate for the Capitol police over $50,000, an actual increase of nearly $30,000 in this item right here in our own household, as it were. Only a few years ago fourteen men, at a salary of $940 each, performed this entire duty. Now, one captain, three lieutenants, twenty-seven privates, and eight watchmen constitute this force. Yet gentlemen talk about economy, and profess to be in favor of retrenchment in the expenses of the Government!

If, sir, we cannot get back to that grade of expenditure which prevailed during the extravagant year of 1866, what do gentlemen propose to accomplish? We have time and again heard from the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations his statement about making heavy reductions, yet almost every item, as we reach it, shows something like a doubling of the appropriations over those adopted in 1866, which, as the first year after the war, I have taken as a standard. Yet you talk about economy and retrenchment.

It would seem that the party endowed with the control of the affairs of the nation is absolutely incapable of retracing its steps, and of effecting a reform inside of the party. Why, sir, every exhibition day by day on this floor shows the utter impossibility of doing that. Gentlemen here follow the lead of committees. A dozen gentlemen do the legislation for this House. A dozen members control our action upon all subjects of appropriation. When has the Committee on Appropriations, bringing in these enormous items of increased expenditure, been overruled by the action of the House?

I admit that the opposition here is ineffective. I admit that this side of the House shows none of that spirit of resistance which usually belongs to an opposition party. Thus you, gentlemen of the dominant party, are without any effective pressure from this side. The responsibility is solely upon you to make that strong, vigorous, determined opposition which would compel reduction. In the absence of any pressure to reduce expenditures, we are drifting on day after day and year after year until we are in danger of realizing the evils which have been predicted time and again when the corruptions arising from exorbitant and profligate expenditures shall sap the very foundations of the Republic.

Gentlemen talk about these being "small items." Sir, when do the big items come? I have never yet seen a gentleman who, after resisting reduction in small items, did not, when we came to larger items, find some excuse for appropriating the full amount asked. By the documents read at the Clerk's desk from the heads of your Departments and your Bureaus, and from officers of this Capitol, it appears that the disposition is to still press onward in adding to the monstrous load of salaries which are now weighing down the industries of the country.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Chairman, we are about to legislate for the pay of a number of disabled soldiers, who have been called into the civil service of the Government, and who give a legal day's work in each day, alternating day and night, for the humble pay they get.

Mr. GUNCKEL. How many disabled soldiers are there on the Capitol police force?

Mr. KELLEY. So far as I know, every man is disabled.

Mr. GUNCKEL. The gentleman is much mistaken.

Mr. KELLEY. They are broken in health by their exposure to the severity of each alternate night. I happen to know a number of them, and know whereof I affirm.

The course of the gentlemen on the other side in the economies they are pursuing is well described by a writer in the March number of the Fortnightly Review, when criticising the liberal party which was about being turned out of power in England. I wish to read what he writes, and you will see how applicable it is to the course the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] is pursuing:

The effect of their great and ceaseless efforts at economy was destroyed and turned to bitterness by the growing sense that this economy was in small things; that it allied itself to sharp practice, and was cynically indifferent to individual hardship. In a word, the impression deepened that there was about them a temper of meanness, and this impression stung the public mind. It is one of those things about which it is difficult to argue, and of which the object hardly ever estimates the force. When a man is generally believed to be mean, it is in vain for him to asseverate that he is prudent and just. It is equally in vain for him to treat the charge with contempt. It will pull down a man and it will pull down a ministry. A great nation does not care to learn that it has economized a million by maneuvers which touch its sense of self-respect.

And what is true of great nations beyond the water is true of the American people. They do not want a system of parsimony that shall degrade the servants of the Government. They do not want, when they call into such positions as we have called worn-out soldiers of the Republic, they shall be put on starving pay.

Gentlemen compare the expense of the police of the Parliament houses. Thank God, sir, the United States Government and none of the local governments of the country pay their servants as the British government pays its subordinates. We do not lavish upon the heads of the Government vast amounts, nor do we degrade to servile life whoever fills a humble place under our Government.

Again, sir, when a man enters the police of the Parliament house of England he enters a life-office, and when injured in its service he receives a pension; and during the years of old age and illness the government he serves cares for him. It is not so with these poor men. They are appointed for a short term of office. A change in the Congress of the United States may move them all. They are here at a distance from their homes, with their families with them, and some of them maintaining their families in their distant homes; and it will shock the sense of the American people to know the leaders of a great party are trying to make capital out of the reduction of the pay of this class of the servants of our nation.

Mr. ALBRIGHT. I desire to say a word or two on this subject.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted on the amendment.

Mr. ALBRIGHT. I will renew the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. It has not been withdrawn.

Mr. ALBRIGHT. I wish to say the force is composed of disabled soldiers.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman must move an amendment.

Mr. ALBRIGHT. I move to strike out the last word. Now, Mr. Chairman, there are three one-armed soldiers on this police force; five other pensioned soldiers, and nine soldiers besides who are hardly able for the ordinary duties of life. Then why attempt to strike at this class of men, who have given their limbs for the life of the country, who have given up almost everything they could give for their country? You are not paying them a great deal of money, while the duties they perform about this Capitol are responsible and important.

Now, why should there be any other rule applied to this police force than is applied to other employés of the Government? The men who work in the navy-yards and arsenals and in the different Departments of the Government are paid for eight hours' labor. That makes a day. Men in the Army, when they are on picket or ordinary duties, are off four hours and on two, giving one-third of their time to the country.

It is certainly true that this Capitol needs the care of men who are constantly on the watch to keep it in good condition, and not, as the gentleman from Ohio said, to open and shut twenty-seven windows or fourteen doors. They are performing a much more important duty than this; and it seems to me, and it has seemed to me all the time, that this striking at the inferior employés of Government, proposing to cut down their salaries and to lessen the force, is not generous and does not look very well, coming—I will not say from what party—but does not look well coming from men who represent the country in the halls of Congress.

I should regret to find the republican party commencing to strike down the one-armed, crippled, and pensioned soldiers employed here to take care of the Capitol. I should be sorry even to find the gentlemen on the other side belonging to the democratic party engaged in a movement of that kind. I do hope that all of us, whether of one party or the other, appreciate the services of the men who have fought for the country. I withdraw my amendment to the amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN. I offer the following amendment to the pending proposition:

Add the following proviso:
Provided, however, That any disabled soldier on said police force, if any, shall be retained on the same, notwithstanding the reduction herein provided for, and his salary shall be paid out of the contingent funds of the House and the Senate.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the entire amendment as it will read if this amendment to the amendment be adopted, as both the original amendment and the amendment to the amendment are offered by the gentleman from Indiana.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the paragraph and insert as follows:
For Capitol police, $21,480: Provided, however, That any disabled soldier on said police force, if any, shall be retained on the same, notwithstanding the reduction herein provided for, and his salary shall be paid out of the contingent funds of the House and the Senate.

Mr. GARFIELD. I make the point of order on that amendment. To pay this out of the contingent fund is forbidden by law.

Mr. HOLMAN. I submit that the gentleman's point of order comes too late, after the amendment has been read a second time in the committee.

Mr. GARFIELD. The amendment which has just been offered contains a clause about the contingent fund which is contrary to law.

Mr. HOLMAN. I consent to withdraw that portion of the amendment.

Mr. GARFIELD. I make the further point of order that making this a special law in regard to the officers of the police force is a change of the law.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has already overruled that point of order when made to a similar amendment, because the paragraph itself seems to involve a change of the existing law.

Mr. GARFIELD. But the gentleman moves to strike out the whole paragraph and put in a new one.

Mr. HOLMAN. Still it is germane to the pending proposition.

Mr. GARFIELD. Very well; let it go.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN.]

Mr. HOLMAN. As the amendment now stands, it makes the same appropriation as was made in 1866.

Mr. BIERY. I move to amend the amendment by striking out the last word.

I offer this amendment for the purpose of making a few remarks. It seems that the cry of economy is the great hobby that is ridden to-day in the House for purposes which I can understand. We find it brought in wherever a subordinate of the Government can be reached. Wherever there is a poor clerk serving for a small pittance, wherever a soldier getting employment here about the Capitol or elsewhere receives two dollars a day, he must be cut down. Now, I cannot comprehend that this attempt at what is called economy is made with any sincerity by the other side of the House.

This side of the House was lectured the other day by one of the prominent gentlemen on the other side from the city of New York, [Mr. COX.] He told us that we were like a set of Sunday-school scholars, who ought to learn to say—

Little drops of water,
Little grains of sand, &c.

We were reminded that New Hampshire in the East had spoken, and that after this the grangers of the West would come in with still greater meaning. It seems to me that the gentleman attempted to frighten the men on this side of the House from doing their proper duty, under the solemn oath which they took when they entered this House in December.

Sir, I cannot comprehend what the gentleman meant when he spoke of economy. I find that the same gentleman introduced a bill only few days ago providing that the Government should donate two hundred condemned cannon to be turned over to one McDonald, of the city of New York, for the purpose of a statue to Admiral Farragut. Why, sir, two hundred condemned cannon, at fifty cents per pound, would be $1,000,000. Are they all exploded cannon? Are they ordnance which cannot be sold? It may be that a cannon has been superseded by a later invention, and though in good order it is still a condemned cannon. We hear the cry of economy coming up on the other side of the House, but wherever there is a little loophole to sneak out by we find the cloven hoof sticking out.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. BIERY. I have only a few minutes and decline to be interrupted.

The gentleman told us that the grangers were coming, and he tells his friends on both sides of the House that a new party has sprung up, a party of economy.

Sir, we have had a little experience of that. In 1872 there was an attempt made to get up a party of that kind; but gentlemen opposite will not soon forget that party amalgamation. Does the gentleman propose to go back to his native Buckeye State to unite with the grangers? I see that they have just started an additional grange up East. Does the gentleman propose to join that? If so, I am afraid they will have a split in their grange.

The gentleman speaks of this side of the House, as Sunday-school scholars, and he says that we are mere atoms compared to the mountains and the stars. When he speaks of mountains, does he refer to that snow-clad mountain on the island of the Manhattoes that was erected for a court-house at a cost of $5,000,000, where, in purchasing carpets at the rate of five dollars a yard, they purchased enough to span the globe; where, in plastering at the rate of thirty cents a yard, there was plastering enough done to cover all the acres on the island of the Manhattoes? Is that the mountain he refers to? He says that we are only atoms when compared with the stars. Does he mean the stars of which he sang in his earliest years—

Twinkle, twinkle, little star, &c.?

Or does he refer to that beautiful sparkling gem of a star on the grass, the dew-drop? I would like the gentleman to explain. True, we are only atoms; but, as he says—

Little drops of water,
Little grains of sand,
Make the mighty ocean
And the pleasant land.

And this million of atoms altogether make the stars and the mountains both.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. COX. I do not propose to reply to the remarks of the accidental member from Pennsylvania. [Laughter.]

Mr. BIERY. I withdraw my amendment to the amendment.

The question recurred on Mr. HOLMAN'S amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN. I withdraw the latter clause of that amendment, as I see it is not necessary.

The Clerk read Mr. HOLMAN'S amendment, as follows:

Strike out the paragraph, and insert in lieu thereof:

For Capitol police, $21,480: Provided, however, That any disabled soldiers on such police force, if any, shall be retained on the same.

The question was put on the amendment; and on a division the Chairman stated that there were—ayes 28, noes 118.

Mr. HOLMAN. I rise to a question of order. If the Chair says that he counted 118 in the negative, I have nothing to say.

Mr. GARFIELD. The Chairman did say so.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not presume that it will be necessary to restate a fact twice to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask for tellers on my amendment.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. GARFIELD and Mr. HOLMAN were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 29, noes 114.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk read the next paragraph of the bill as follows.

House of Representatives:

For compensation of members of the House of Representatives and Delegates from Territories, $1,535,000.

Mr. RANDALL. I want to call the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations to the fact that there are three hundred and two Members and Delegates, at $5,000 a year, and the amount appropriated by this paragraph is $20,000 in excess of what will be required.

Mr. GARFIELD. There are always cases of contested elections, which are provided for in the estimate.

Mr. RANDALL. That comes out of the contingent fund of the House.

Mr. GARFIELD. Will the gentleman wait until I get through? A member sometimes takes his seat and it is contested, and another man is admitted, and the pay of the two overlaps. We provided last year that hereafter no expenses of contested elections should be paid out of the contingent fund. We, therefore, put in a surplus here for that purpose this year.

Mr. RANDALL. That explanation is satisfactory.

The Clerk read the next paragraph of the bill, as follows:

For mileage, $130,000.

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania. I move to amend that paragraph by striking out "$30,000," and inserting "$20,000;" and by adding thereto the following proviso:

Provided, That Senators, Representatives, and Delegates in Congress shall, from the first Monday in December, 1874, be paid only the actual individual traveling expenses incurred in going to and returning from their residences to the seat of Government, by the most direct route of usual travel, once for each session of the House to which such Senators, Representatives, or Delegates belong, to be certified under their hands to the disbursing officer of each House and filed as a voucher.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. I make the point of order upon that amendment that it changes existing law.

Mr. HOLMAN. It is only a limitation on the appropriation.

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania. I ask my friend from Missouri to withdraw the point of order, that we may test the sense of the committee on this question.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Missouri insist on the point of order?

Mr. PARKER. of Missouri. I do.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair believes that the point is well taken.

Mr. ALBRIGHT. I move to add at the end of the paragraph the following proviso:

Provided, That the mileage paid Representatives and Delegates from Territories shall not exceed the actual traveling expenses.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. I make the point of order on that amendment also.

Mr. HOLMAN. It is but a limitation on the amount appropriated.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair having twice ruled upon this point of order as against such an amendment, is compelled, consistently, to renew the ruling. If any gentleman desires to appeal from the decision of the Chair to the committee, the Chair will be happy to entertain the appeal.

Mr. SPEER. I appeal from the ruling of the Chair, on the ground that the amendment is simply a limitation on the appropriation.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is not in order.

The question was, "Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?" and being taken, upon a division there were—ayes 128, noes 18.

So the decision of the Chair was sustained.

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania. I move to amend the pending paragraph by striking out $130,000 and inserting $30,000. It will be found by reference to the second page of this bill that this Committee of the Whole have already agreed to appropriate $30,000 for the Senate. I move this amount for the purpose of calling the attention of the Committee of the Whole to a matter which perhaps they may not understand as well as they ought, otherwise the abolition of the mileage abuse would not be so strenuously opposed. In order to ascertain precisely what has been expended under the mileage system I took the pains to address a letter to the Secretary of the Treasury, the reply to which I ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., January 15, 1874.

SIR: In compliance with the request made in your telegram of the 13th instant, I have the honor to inclose herewith a statement of the amount paid to members of the House of Representatives, Forty-second Congress, for mileage.

I am, very respectfully,

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania. This is information which I wish to bring to the attention of this committee and the attention of the reformers, the real reformers—not the men who simply talk reform, but the men who act reform. I do this because I was very much surprised the other day, when I had occasion to bring forward this matter, to find that the point of order was made upon me by the gentleman who then had charge of this bill, [Mr. STARKWEATHER,] and who in his speech made use of the following language, laudatory of the republican party:

> What further reforms have been accomplished by a republican Congress? The mileage was a great abuse. A republican Congress has done this. It has cut off constructive mileage, reduced it one-half, and limited it to one mileage a session. The next step will soon be taken, and it will be abolished altogether.

Now, at the very first opportunity when my work would be effective I introduced this amendment. I have not taken the trouble to introduce a bill which might have been choked in committee or killed by various dilatory motions. But I have introduced it right here on the legislative appropriation bill, just as it was introduced last year. If it was proper to do it then and there, I hold that it is equally proper to do it now and here.

The statute of the 3d of March, 1873, restricted Senators, Members, and Delegates in Congress to the expenses incurred in coming from and returning to their homes once during each session of Congress, and directed each Senator, Representative, or Delegate to certify the amount expended, and file the same with the disbursing officer of the Senate or House as a voucher. This was passed, as I said before, became a law, and in the amendment I have offered I have given it almost verbatim.

I have introduced here nothing new or startling, but simply that which was adopted by the Forty-second Congress at its close, and readopted by the Forty-third Congress at its first session. I believe it is the honest wish of every member of this House that this proposition may be carried into effect. If that is so, then why not adopt it at once?

To show that this measure is feasible, that it is not a clap-trap proposition, I have shown to this committee exactly what was paid for mileage for the Forty-second Congress, and what was paid for actual traveling expenses to members for the first session of the Forty-third Congress. The amount paid for the Forty-second Congress was $196,000. The amount paid for the first session of the Forty-third Congress was $23,000. Double that amount, and you have $46,000, or a saving of $150,000 from the amount paid for the Forty-second Congress.

I now come to a practical point. Is it fair that we should charge so much more for traveling expenses than we incur? I am perfectly willing that every member should have paid him the actual expenses which he incurs in traveling to and from Washington City four times during his term. But I do most seriously object, so far as I am myself concerned, to being allowed one hundred and sixty dollars when I can make my trip for twenty-five.

Mr. CROUNSE. I move that the gentleman be excused from taking it if he does not want it.

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania. I did not hear the gentleman. If he uttered anything personal, my answer is I will have no personal quarrel. I ignore all questions of politics on this paramount subject of reform. I speak in behalf of the depleted Treasury.

Mr. CROUNSE. I do not know who the gentleman is that is now speaking, but I venture to say this: I bet that he lives contiguous to the capital, or not more than one State off, and that he is not a married man. [Laughter.]

Mr. SPEER. I raise the point of order that it is against the law to bet. [Laughter.]

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania. I do not know where the gentleman over the way hails from; but the locality of a man who answers an argument by a bet is of no consequence; that smacks of the ring.

Mr. CROUNSE. Well, I will guess, then.

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania. If the gentleman has an argument to make, I will try to answer him. I do not want him to undertake to bluff me off by proposing to bet.

I am sincere in this movement. I want the reform to commence with the members; and instead of reducing the pay of the poor, mangled soldier in the employ of the police force, I would vote him a reasonable increase. The man who came to the rescue of his imperiled country deserves well of Congress.

Mr. SPEER. I move that the committee rise for the purpose of having the gentlemen introduced to each other. [Laughter.]

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania. Some of the gentlemen around me have been kind enough to inform me that the gentleman on the other side is from Kansas. Now, it may be proper to refer to what his mileage would be for coming from Kansas.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. CROUNSE. I have but a word to say on this matter. Any reference that I may have made to the gentleman on the other side was in the most perfect good humor. It seems that we are not acquainted with each other; but I guess remarkably well, according to the information I have since had from members about me. I guessed in the first instance that the gentleman resided at a place very contiguous to the capital. I judged this from the fact that every time this mileage question comes up it receives an attack from some member who lives so near the capital that he can go home every Friday night and be back here by Monday. I guessed further that he was an unmarried man. I believe that on this point also I am borne out by the history of the gentleman. He has, I believe, no family to bring to the capital, or to visit if he leaves them at home. Therefore, he is at liberty and is likely to assail the mileage allowance. He can do it very cheaply and economically; but let the gentleman put himself in the attitude of myself and other members who live hundreds of miles away from this capital, and who have presented to us the alternative either of leaving our families at home or of bringing them here at an expense which the gentleman and others like him do not contemplate when they so vigorously attack this mileage.

Having said this much, I can almost wish that the mileage allowance were blotted out in order to remove a bone of contention which seems to be introduced here very often.

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SMITH] has already spoken, but if there be no objection he will be permitted to proceed.

Mr. GARFIELD. Let us have a vote.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the gentleman from Pennsylvania will be allowed five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to allowing the gentleman from Pennsylvania to speak five minutes further? The Chair hears none.

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania. The gentleman who has just taken his seat can state whether he was here as a member of the last Congress.

Several MEMBERS. He was not.

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania. Then his predecessor received over $1,000 as mileage. I presume from the practice out there that the gentleman travels on free passes. If I am mistaken he will correct me.

Mr. CROUNSE. What is the question?

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania. It is a very common practice for members from the West to travel upon passes. Perhaps that is the case with the gentleman. If I am mistaken, of course he will correct me.

Mr. CROUNSE. It is not so in my case. The gentleman may speak for himself, and I will speak for myself. I hold no passes, and I ask for none; I pay my way as I go.

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania. I am trying to ascertain the facts in regard to the question, and the gentleman can aid me very much if he will tell me exactly what was paid to him by the Sergeant-at-Arms as mileage for the first session of this Congress. The actual cost of travel to the gentleman, according to his own return, was $130. Now he will be entitled to receive as mileage at least $500. Is that fair? I submit that question to the House.

I have no personal feeling in this matter at all. I do not go home very often, perhaps not as often as I ought to do in order to attend to my professional duties there. As other members will bear witness, I have been absent only one day this session. I have been here uniformly, to the neglect of my practice at home. But the question is not whether I go home often or not. The question is, whether it is fair and honest for members of Congress to charge five times as much for their traveling expenses as is actually expended by them. Is it not fair to charge precisely what it costs, and no more? When a merchant sends a clerk out to attend to business, he would not allow that clerk to charge as traveling expenses ten times the amount of the actual cost.

I wish gentlemen to divest themselves of any personal feeling in this matter. I have none. My friend from Kansas [referring to Mr. CROUNSE] is a stranger to me; but I think, when we come to know each other, he will understand that what I am pleading for is substantial reform—a reform which commences at home, which commences with ourselves, not a reform which will cut down the pay of poor, unfortunate, crippled soldiers. I do not want to cut down their pay. I would rather raise the pay of the maimed soldier who has given his limbs while serving in defense of his country.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I would like to ask the gentleman a question. There is some misapprehension as to what he said concerning his expenses. He was understood by some to say that it cost him twenty-five dollars to get from his place of residence to this city.

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania. O, no. During the whole term it would not cost me more than that. Twelve dollars and fifty cents is the cost of the trip both ways.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I thought there was a misapprehension on the subject; and I wanted the gentleman to make himself explicit.

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania. I want to be explicit. We have been exceedingly careful to say no Army officer, no naval officer——

Mr. ATKINS. If I have the right to object, I do object.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the gentleman's objection?

Mr. ATKINS. That the gentleman shall not go beyond his time.

The CHAIRMAN. He is going on in his time.

Mr. ATKINS. I object to his exceeding his time.

The CHAIRMAN. That objection would have been in order when he rose to take the floor the second time. The Chair asked for objection, but there was none.

Mr. ATKINS. I thought the Chair said his time was out.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair asked if there was objection, but there was none. The gentleman has a few seconds left; and then the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Oregon.

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania. Time is money, Mr. Chairman, but it does not seem to be worth much to me or to the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has now expired. Is there objection to the debate being continued?

There was no objection.

[Mr. NESMITH addressed the House. His remarks will appear in the Appendix.]

The question recurred on the amendment of Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania.

The committee divided and there were—ayes 58, noes 95.

Mr. SENER demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania, and Mr. CROUNSE were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 58, noes 92.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MELLISH. I move to strike out line 106, "for mileage, $130,000."

It seems to me it is time this great American swindle should be abolished. That is all I have to say.

Mr. CLYMER. It will be remembered that in response to the popular demand, made with a determination not to be disregarded, this House in January last passed a bill fixing the salary of its members at $6,000, including the pay, the mileage, stationery, and all other perquisites formerly received by members of Congress. The bill went to the Senate. It was there amended by fixing the salary at $5,000, restoring the mileage, and allowing each member $125 for stationery. The bill came back to this House, and the question was whether we should concur in it as amended by the Senate. There was an almost universal expression of opinion here, publicly at least, and also by many privately, that as it was the best thing we could obtain from the Senate we would have to agree to it; but that when the proper time came, either in this appropriation bill or by special law, we could abolish this mileage system, which has always been condemned by the American people as a swindle and a fraud.

That was what was then almost universally agreed to. I did not believe, sir, that it would be done, and the votes in this committee to-day prove that it cannot be done. And it was for that reason, sir, that I and the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] and some others voted against the bill as amended by the Senate. I thank my colleague from the Lancaster district, [Mr. SMITH,] who had voted for concurring in that bill as it came from the Senate, for his effort to do his duty to-day. He deserves the thanks of this House. He deserves, and will I know receive, his reward at the hands of his constituents of the great county of Lancaster. He has shown by official data that the actual expenses of both coming and returning here for all the Members and Delegates of this Congress are but $46,000. He has shown that for the last Congress the mileage was $196,000. And had that Congress been equal in numbers to this, it would have been at least $250,000. And having shown that the actual expenses were but $46,000, it is clear that $150,000, or if you estimate it by the increase in the number of Members and Delegates, $200,000, are to be given away without cause and without reason. I say, sir, that when gentlemen go back to their constituents they will have to explain the change in their position to-day from the ground they occupied in voting on the bill restoring mileage. It is my proud satisfaction that I have recorded my vote against it. The people demand its repeal, and will never rest satisfied until their wishes are obeyed.

Mr. TREMAIN. What is the question before the committee?

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the motion offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. MELLISH] to strike out the line 106, "for mileage, $130,000." Upon this motion the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLYMER] has spoken under the rules in its favor. It will be in order for the Chair to recognize one member who shall speak against the motion offered by the gentleman from New York.

Mr. TREMAIN. Then I will offer a word or two. As the law has been passed by the present session of Congress, mileage is allowed to Representatives and Delegates in coming to and returning from the next session of Congress. This bill provides for the expenses for the year ending June 30, 1875, and therefore makes provision, and the only provision that is contemplated to be made, for the mileage expenses of the next session of Congress. This House having, after full consideration, deliberately determined that the salaries shall be as they were under the old law, with the mileage and the stationery, and then other expenses were allowed by prior law, in addition to the $5,000, I submit that it is trifling with the legislation of this House to attempt now to legislate so that no provision shall be made for the payment of the mileage, which both Houses of Congress, by overwhelming majorities, have declared shall be awarded to and received by the Representatives. And I submit that the amendment would leave this House in the awkward position of having passed a law by an overwhelming majority that mileage should be allowed at the next session of Congress, and yet in the appropriation bill making no appropriation for allowing this compensation to be drawn. Is this the way, sir, to change existing laws? If the existing laws are to be amended, let them be amended in the proper way.

But I have risen, sir, more for the purpose of expressing my desire, as a humble member of this House, that the House will with more energy and more activity proceed to the discharge of the important business before it. We have here an appropriation bill composed of sixteen hundred lines. We have been in session day after day and have only reached about the ninetieth line of this bill. When are we to get through with these appropriation bills? When are we to reach the great questions upon which the country is anxiously looking for action by this House—the financial measure, the transportation measure, the bankrupt law, the civil-rights bill, the Geneva award bill, and various other measures in regard to which the country is looking to us anxiously for action? I submit we are trifling with the valuable time of the House and the country, and I hope the amendment will not be adopted.

Mr. RANDALL rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on the pending amendment has been exhausted.

Mr. RANDALL. I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. NIBLACK. I rise to make a parliamentary inquiry. Is it not in order to perfect the text before the motion to strike out is put? If it is, I desire to submit an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The paragraph which it is proposed to strike out consists of a single line. Before the motion to strike out is put, it is in order for the Chair to entertain an amendment to perfect the text.

Mr. NIBLACK. I desire to reduce the amount proposed by one-half, and on that proposition I desire to be heard.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognized the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL,] and then he recognized the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. NIBLACK,] as he supposed upon a point of order. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is entitled to the floor.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not propose to be drawn into a discussion on this question of compensation. I have always been in favor of adequate salaries, and lest I might be charged with a dog in the manger policy, I have abstained from voting on this question of mileage; but I cannot allow that the suggestion shall be made and pass unnoticed that there is any equality in a member from the State of New York, or from the West, receiving any more salary than I do in a blind-door way, when his services and expenses are little more than mine. For instance, I sat here in the Thirty-eighth Congress alongside of the Delegate from Washington Territory, who received $18,000 a year under this system of mileage, while I received but $6,300. That is an inequality which should be corrected either in this bill or elsewhere.

But there is one other remark of the gentleman from New York [Mr. TREMAIN] which I want to combat, and that is that we here who are seeking to reduce these appropriations, and seeking to reduce the expenditures of the Government, are standing in the way of legitimate legislation. For one, I will stand here like a rock, if necessary, upon each item of the bill where I feel that there can be a reduction made, and I will not be drawn away from the subject before us by the bankrupt bill, or the increase of currency bill, or anything else. The greatest possible benefit that this House can render to the people of the country is to strike down the expenditures of the Government, and I did, for one, suppose that we would have the co-operation in that respect of the Congressman at large from the great State of New York.

Mr. TREMAIN. Will the gentleman answer me one question?

Mr. RANDALL. I will if I can.

Mr. TREMAIN. Suppose your salary law which you have passed remains unchanged, and you then refuse to appropriate money to pay the mileage, is not that mileage a legal debt against the Government, and are you proposing to repudiate it?

Mr. RANDALL. I propose to ask the gentleman this question: if a majority of this House say they will not appropriate money for that purpose under that law, how are you going to sue for it?

Mr. TREMAIN. Just as any other claimant who has a claim against the Government does, come to the next Congress and ask Congress to do what it agreed to do.

Mr. RANDALL. Well, I propose to discuss these appropriations item by item, whether they involve dollars or cents.

Mr. MELLISH. I have only one sentence to utter. My amendment has been characterized by my colleague [Mr. TREMAIN] as trifling. I have only to say that, at every opportunity to stop the stealing of $130,000 from the Treasury of the United States, I shall continue to indulge in trifling.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. I rise to a point of order. Does the gentleman from New York undertake to say that members of the House are engaged in stealing $100,000? Is that what he means?

Mr. MELLISH. I repeat what I said when I introduced the amendment. I think this is the great American swindle. I think that exactly defines what it is. I do think it is the greatest abuse that has existed under any Government since the world was made.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. I want to know if the member from New York means that the gentlemen composing this House of Representatives have by their votes been engaged in the business of stealing $130,000?

The CHAIRMAN. Neither the question, in the form put, nor the original remark of the gentleman from New York seems to the Chair to be parliamentary. [Laughter.]

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. I want to ask the Chair if the remarks of the gentleman from New York were parliamentary? My remark is directly pertinent to the remarks of the gentleman; and when, by direct declaration or by innuendo, the gentlemen who are my colleagues on this floor and myself are charged with stealing money, whether it is parliamentary or not I will be found on this floor combating that declaration.

Mr. GARFIELD. Let us have a vote now.

Mr. POTTER. Is debate on the pending question exhausted?

The CHAIRMAN. It is.

Mr. RANDALL. I withdraw my amendment to the amendment.

Mr. POTTER. I renew it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would state that some time ago, after the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. NIBLACK] raised the point of order, it seemed to be generally understood that he was to have the floor after the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL.]

Mr. NIBLACK. The amendment I desire to offer is to perfect the text.

Mr. RANDALL. I hope the gentleman will withdraw his amendment for the present, and let us have a free fight over this matter.

Mr. NIBLACK. No, sir; I cannot do that. I move to strike out one-half of the appropriation, so as to make it $65,000, which would be equivalent to fixing the mileage at ten cents per mile. I have always been opposed to the proposition embraced in the salary bill of the last Congress, which looked simply to paying the traveling expenses of members, for the reason that there never would in practice be any uniformity about it. It is left to members to certify the amount of their expenses, and there is no way of supervising or testing the question of the amount to which they are entitled. I think the time has come when the mileage ought to be reduced. I know that if my motion should prevail, and we cut down the amount of the appropriation one-half, there would still be a legal claim against the Government, as the law now stands, for the remaining one-half. But I make this pledge in the presence of this committee: that if my motion shall prevail I shall certainly follow it up by the introduction of a bill which will legalize the reduction, and fix the mileage hereafter at ten cents per mile for the ensuing session of Congress, and for all time to come. I think that ten cents a mile is but a fair allowance for traveling expenses, allowing a little more compensation than the actual expenses of traveling. I therefore submit my motion in good faith; I shall insist on a vote upon it; and if it shall be adopted, I intend to follow it up with a bill legalizing the reduction which it proposes.

Mr. POTTER. I rise to oppose the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. NIBLACK.]

Mr. MELLISH. Will my colleague [Mr. POTTER] allow me to explain one sentence of my statement?

Mr. POTTER. How long?

Mr. MELLISH. Not more than a minute.

Mr. POTTER. I will yield.

Mr. MELLISH. In answer to the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. PARKER,] I will say that I will modify my statement so as to call this only constructive stealing, or legal stealing. But I do not withdraw the expression that this system of mileage is the great American swindle.

Mr. POTTER. I rise to oppose, pro forma, the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. NIBLACK,] not because it proposes to reduce the appropriation for mileage, but because it does not reduce it enough.

My distinguished colleague, the Representative at large from the State of New York, [Mr. TREMAIN,] is undoubtedly right in saying that this method of getting rid of mileage is not the best method of legislation; that it is irregular, when the law provides mileage for members, that we should not make the appropriation in accordance with the law. But it is none the less true that we must sometimes approach reforms in an indirect way. During the last Congress when it was desired to raise the salaries of members and officers of the Government, no other method was found practicable except exactly this indirect way. The provision of law increasing salaries in that Congress was grafted upon an appropriation bill and completed by the report made by a committee of conference. It is true that in the first instance the House gave leave to consider the measure in connection with an appropriation bill; none the less it was through the medium of an appropriation bill the change in the law was effected.

Now, my distinguished colleague may be sure that if we can make a sufficient reduction in the appropriation, by a vote of the House, some method will be found by which we can alter the law so as to make it conform to the reduction. It is not an infrequent movement, in the interest of sound economy and legislation both, to begin a reform at the appropriation end. I quite agree that the mileage for members of the next Congress will be a debt after that Congress meets. But I am equally confident that if we succeed in reducing this appropriation for mileage at this Congress, the next movement certain to follow will be to make the law as to mileage conform accordingly.

So far as the mileage itself is concerned, my view is simply that the present system of mileage is unequal and unjust; that if any payment of the kind should be made to members it should be of actual traveling expenses. I have never yet heard any one make a satisfactory defense of the present system of mileage on principle. If the present salary of members of Congress is not large enough, (and I am bound in frankness to say that I do not think it is quite enough,) then let it be increased to a fit sum, and have the increase take effect only at some future time, as it ought. But so far as mileage is concerned, to give one member for coming here $2,000 and another but five dollars beyond his actual traveling expenses is most unequal, and, as I think, is entirely unjust; and I am in favor of any form of movement, direct or indirect, which will lead to the ultimate repeal of any such allowance for mileage or other perquisite beyond the fixed and equal salary that may be given by law to each member.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. The member from New York [Mr. MELLISH] saw proper to amend his statement.

Mr. RANDALL. And to make it a little worse.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. And to rest upon his last statement that "this is the great American swindle."

Mr. POTTER. The gentleman is not alluding to me, I hope?

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. No; not at all.

Mr. GARFIELD, (to Mr. POTTER.) You are not a great American swindle, and never were.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. I suppose the gentleman means that it is a swindle, because it proposes to take out of the Treasury the sum of $130,000. Now, sir, it so happens that during the present session of Congress we have had before us several propositions on this question of the pay of members of Congress. One proposition adopted by this House was that in lieu of mileage and all allowances each Senator, Member of the House, and Delegate in Congress should receive an annual salary of $6,000. If that proposition had prevailed by a vote of the Senate and become the law of this country, then, instead of appropriating this sum of $130,000, we would have had to appropriate an amount aggregating $155,000 more for the pay of members of Congress.

Now, from the statements of the gentleman from New York [Mr. MELLISH] in this debate it would be inferred that he was the last member of this House who would have voted for that increase of our salary. Yet, unfortunately for him, the record shows that he voted for this proposition to pay $6,000 a year to each member of Congress.

Mr. MELLISH. Is not the gentleman mistaken?

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. I will take the official record of the vote for it.

Mr. MELLISH. The record is incorrect, then. [Laughter.]

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. Well, I prefer to stand upon the record as being more certain than the memory of the gentleman.

Mr. MELLISH. I know the vote was right in the New York papers.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. I venture the assertion that if the gentleman were called upon to answer under oath he could not tell how many pages of the RECORD were occupied by a speech of his which consumed only five minutes in the delivery, but which, when published in the RECORD, was found to embrace nearly all the editorials of the New York dailies for weeks past, and to aggregate eight or ten pages.

Mr. MELLISH. Was not that speech a good deal better than many that are delivered here?

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. If the gentleman would abstain from filling the record of this House with two or three speeches a day, as has sometimes been the case, there would be perhaps a little more money saved to the Treasury.

Now, I want to know how any gentleman can maintain himself upon a proposition of this kind. There is a law existing requiring a certain amount to be paid for mileage; yet the gentleman stands upon the record as indorsing a proposition that proposes to take from the Treasury for that purpose $155,000 more. This proposition is denominated "the great American swindle;" while the other is all honest and fair and right.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have no personal feeling in my remarks; but I am sick and tired of sitting day after day listening to certain gentlemen of this House impugning the motives of everybody else here. We are all peers upon this floor. No man's motives ought to be impugned upon any speech which he makes or any vote which he casts. Yet it has become a common practice day after day for some member to get up here and denominate some proposition as a "steal" and a "swindle." Yet these same gentlemen propose to go out to the country and ask the people to respect this Congress as it ought to be respected as the representative body of a great and proud nation, although they themselves, day after day, by their declarations and their conduct, are educating the country to believe that this House is made up of thieves. It is for the purpose of correcting, if possible, this obnoxious and pernicious practice that I have made these remarks.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. RICE. I move that the committee rise.

Mr. MELLISH. May I be allowed one sentence?

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope that before the committee rises we shall have a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX.]

Mr. MELLISH. It seems to me that I ought to be allowed to correct the statement of the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. PARKER.]

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] yield to his colleague, [Mr. MELLISH?]

Mr. COX. I yield for one minute.

Mr. MELLISH. My name appeared in all the New York papers as voting with the 131 members who voted to reduce the salary. There were 130 votes in the negative. If I had not voted as I did, that proposition would not have been carried.

I say, further, that the difference between the speeches which are put in the RECORD by the gentleman from Missouri and those of myself is, that my speeches are for the purpose of keeping money in the Treasury, while his are to try and take it out.

Mr. GARFIELD. Now, Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent——

Mr. COX. I believe I still have the floor. I only yielded one minute to my colleague, [Mr. MELLISH.]

Mr. RICE. I thought I was recognized on a motion that the committee rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RICE] as soon as the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] has concluded his remarks.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I think it is about time that the committee should rise. So much irascibility has been exhibited in the debate, so much has been said in the way of reproach upon Congress, that I think the time is about come when we should go to our festivity; in other words, our dinner.

One word as to what fell from my honorable colleague [Mr. TREMAIN] who represents the State of New York at large. He ought to know that it will never be possible to blot out this mileage abuse unless we stop the appropriation. We have to-day the chance for a fair vote upon the proposition to stop the appropriation. In no other way will this abuse ever be repealed. Unless we adopt some such proposition, this inequality will be kept up; and there will be no end to this discussion about salaries or mileage. The people will discuss it this fall. They are discussing it now. Only two or three of us who opposed the bill that was passed the other day, get proper credit with the people. The discussion is going on. It will not stop, sir. It is a good deal like the water-wheel into which a man clambered and went to sleep, he being a little "tight." [Laughter.] When he awoke somebody said to him, "Johnny, what are you doing there?" "O!" said he, "I am in bed; but the darned thing won't stay still." [Laughter.] So it is with this movement. You never will have an end to this discussion about mileage unless you blot out the appropriation for the cash. I hope this House will do so upon the proposition now presented. I move that the committee rise.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask that we may have a vote to-day; otherwise another day may be consumed in this discussion.

Mr. SENER. I object to debate.

Mr. TREMAIN. I hope my colleague [Mr. COX] will withdraw for a few minutes his motion that the committee rise.

Mr. COX. My colleague [Mr. TREMAIN] can go on just as well to-morrow as now.

Mr. TREMAIN. The floor was promised to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. RICE,] and he has consented that I shall occupy it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair stated that at the close of the remarks of the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] he would recognize the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. RICE,] for the motion that the committee rise. If any gentleman insists upon it, it is proper that motion should be put.

Mr. TREMAIN. I will renew the motion that the committee rise, if my colleague will withdraw it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. TREMAIN] asks unanimous consent to speak five minutes. The Chair hears no objection. At the expiration of his remarks the motion that the committee rise will be put.

Mr. TREMAIN. Mr. Chairman, this debate has assumed a most extraordinary phase. During the discussion of the salary bill, in the few remarks I submitted to this House, I took occasion to express my entire disapproval of the whole mileage system. Congress, after considering the question of the appropriate salary which should be paid, after having devoted weeks of discussion to it, has passed a law establishing the rate of compensation. Is there any man who sincerely believes, during the present session of Congress, that compensation will be changed? Is it to be supposed this Congress is so fickle-minded, after having devoted so large an amount of time and discussion to that question, it will be changed? I submit there is no man here who can coolly and deliberately believe for a moment the law we have put on the statute-book is to be changed during the present session. What, then, is the consequence?

Mr. ELDREDGE. I rise to a question of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ELDREDGE. My point of order is that the House is in a state of disorder.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin raises the question that the House is in disorder. The point seems to be well taken, and gentlemen will at once resume their seats.

Mr. TREMAIN. I am, sir, as on the original question, entirely opposed to the inequalities of the mileage system; but I am in favor of sustaining the honor, the credit, and the plighted faith of this Government. And I submit, sir, with that law standing on the statute-book, with members coming to the next Congress and no appropriation made to pay them, this House has placed the Government in a condition of quasi repudiation.

It is in vain to say this is the proper mode to bring about your reform. Pass your appropriation in conformity with the plighted faith of the Government, and then, if you can secure an amendment of the law, your appropriation becomes a mere brutum fulmen. It harms nobody. But of course, if on the other hand you do not amend your law, you stand in a position of repudiating the honorable obligations of this Government.

I submit again, all this debate on this allegation of reform is simply superficial.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. TREMAIN. With pleasure.

Mr. COX. I wish to ask him whether there ever was a good plan of reform except under the old English parliamentary system of stopping supplies? Why, sir, all our progress in liberty comes from the use of that by the Parliament of Great Britain.

Mr. TREMAIN. I undertake to say the British government, with that fidelity to its plighted faith and honor which ever distinguished it, has never in that indirect and sneaking mode sought to avoid the effect of statutes passed. Never, sir. They do business in the old-fashioned Anglo-Saxon mode of hitting the evil full and squarely in the forehead. If you propose to amend the law, amend it by a bill directly for that purpose, but never repudiate in form or substance.

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire to offer a compromise proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. It was understood at the close of the remarks of the gentleman from New York the Chair would entertain a motion that the committee rise.

Mr. HOLMAN. I am willing to submit that motion.

Mr. TREMAIN. I promised to renew that motion, which had been for a moment withdrawn. I now do so.

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope the committee will not rise.

Mr. RANDALL. I object to debate.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 62, noes 78.

So the committee refused to rise.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to ask a parliamentary question. I wish to know whether debate is not exhausted on the pending amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The pending amendment is that offered by the gentleman from Indiana, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out "130," in line 106, and insert "65;" so it will read "for mileage, $65,000."

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to say a word.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is clearly exhausted on that amendment.

Mr. NIBLACK. I insist on a vote.

Mr. HOLMAN. I rise to a question of order. The gentleman moved to strike out this paragraph, and I moved to insert certain words. I make the proposition as a measure of peace.

Mr. GARFIELD. Is there an amendment pending?

Mr. HOLMAN. I propose one.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

That any provision of law allowing mileage to Senators, Members, and Delegates be, and the same is hereby, repealed. And such Senators, Members, and Delegates shall hereafter receive only the actual expense of traveling from their place of residence to attend the sessions of Congress; and the sum necessary for that purpose for the next fiscal year is hereby appropriated.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. I raise the point of order on that amendment that it changes existing laws.

Mr. HOLMAN. When it was proposed in last Congress to raise the salary of the Chief Executive of the nation, and this point of order was raised, the proposition was held to be in order.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. Is debate in order on the point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires in making his decisions to be guided by precedents, and will be very grateful for any precedent which may be cited bearing on the point of order which has been raised.

Mr. HOLMAN. During last Congress, the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES,] I think, being in the chair, the motion being made to increase the salary of the Chief Executive, the Chair decided that the proposition was in order. The Committee of the Whole overruled that decision, but it was subsequently sustained by the action of the House.

Mr. DAWES. The precedents are all the other way. There was a rule made on purpose to make it in order to increase a salary, but there is no rule to make it in order to decrease a salary. The principle of the rule is understood to be this: that it may be necessary, in the opinion of the House, in order to carry on the Government, to increase the compensation of certain of its officers; but it was assumed that no House would ever suppose it could be necessary, in order to carry on the Government, to decrease the compensation.

Mr. POTTER. That is the theory of the rule.

Mr. DAWES. Yes; that is the theory of the rule.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of the opinion that the point of order raised by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. PARKER] is well taken, and rules the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] out of order.

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope we will now have a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. NIBLACK,] which the Clerk will again report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by striking out "$130,000" and inserting "$65,000;" so it will read: "for mileage, $65,000."

The question being taken, there were—ayes 68, noes 98.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask that the Clerk commence the reading of the next paragraph, and I shall then move that the committee rise.

The Clerk read as follows:

For compensation of the officers, clerks, messengers, and others receiving an annual salary, in the service of the House of Representatives, &c.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WOODFORD reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the special order, being the bill (H. R. No. 2064) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

CHARGES AGAINST THE COMMISSIONER OF PENSIONS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Commissioner of Pensions, transmitting his reply to the charges of Mrs. Helen M. Barnard; which was ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

REDUCTION OF THE ARMY.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. The edition of the bill (H. R. No. 2540) reported by the Committee on Military Affairs for the reduction of the Army is pretty well exhausted. I move that it be reprinted.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

EMPLOYMENT OF ALIENS AS ENGINEERS AND PILOTS.

On motion of Mr. CONGER, by unanimous consent, the bill (S. No. 580) to authorize the employment of certain aliens as engineers and pilots was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

COMMITTEE ON EXPENDITURES IN THE DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio, Mr. PARSONS, asks to be excused from serving on the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice. To this request the Chair hears no objection. And the Chair appoints, in the place of the gentleman from Ohio, the gentleman from Alabama, Mr. SHEATS.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. MILLS, by unanimous consent, obtained leave of absence until Tuesday the 24th instant.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. DARRALL, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills and joint resolutions of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 1015) to authorize the President to accept, for citizens of the United States, the jurisdiction of certain tribunals in the Ottoman dominions and Egypt, established, or to be established, under the authority of the Sublime Porte and of the government of Egypt;

An act (H. R. No. 1956) for the relief of Willard Davis;

An act (H. R. No. 1223) for the relief of L. S. Campbell;

An act (H. R. No. 2228) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to change the name of the propeller William M. Tweed, of Buffalo;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 29) authorizing the Secretary of War to detail a medical officer of the Army to inquire into and report upon the causes of epidemic cholera;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 52) explanatory of resolution approved January 31, 1868, entitled "A resolution limiting contracts for stationery and other supplies in the Executive Departments for one year;" and

An act (S. No. 360) making an appropriation for a topographical survey of the Capitol grounds and plans for improving the same.

CYPRESS BAYOU AND SODA LAKE.

Mr. McLEAN, by unanimous consent, presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of Texas, requesting her Representatives to use their efforts to procure an appropriation to improve the navigation of Cypress Bayou and Soda Lake, and to make Jefferson a port of entry; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

FIRST INTERNAL-REVENUE DISTRICT, OHIO.

Mr. BANNING, by unanimous consent, presented a memorial of the internal-revenue gaugers of the first district of Ohio; which was referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

And then, on motion of Mr. GARFIELD, (at five o'clock and ten minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following memorials, petitions, and other papers were presented at the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. ALBERT: The petition of Cicero A. Moore and others, of the Ninth Maryland Volunteers, for extension to them of the benefits of the act giving three months' extra pay to those soldiers who were prisoners in the hands of the enemy in Andersonville, Libby, and other prisons in the South, to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. ARCHER: The petition of Mary Ann Drury, for a pension, to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions and War of 1812.

Also, the petition of George N. Dale and other members of the Vermont bar, of similar import, to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. POTTER: Communications of Francis T. Garretson, of New York, in relation to postage on letters within the limits of the city of New York, to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

By Mr. SCHUMAKER, of New York: Memorials and resolutions of the New York Academy of Medicine, numbering 400 physicians; the New York Pathological Society, comprising 300 physicians as members; the New York Medical Library and Journal Association, comprising 300 physicians as members; and the Medical Society of the County of New York, having 700 physicians as members, asking Congress to increase the efficiency of the Medical Department of the United States Army, to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. SENER: The petition of John H. Parker and others, heirs of Thomas Parker, deceased, of Accomack County, Virginia, asking indemnity for French spoliations, to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Also, the petition of Warner Ewbank, of Lancaster Court-House, Virginia, for relief, to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. SMITH, of Virginia: The petition of M. G. Anderson and others, citizens of Louisa and Hanover Counties, Virginia, for the establishment of a post-route from Perkinsville, in Goochland County, to Hopeful, in Louisa County, Virginia, to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

By Mr. STANDEFORD: The petition of sundry tobacco manufacturers and dealers of the State of Kentucky, for the abolition of the import duty on mass or stick licorice, to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Also, the petition of William McDowell for the passage of a special act giving him arrears of pension, of a general law repealing the limitation clauses in existing pension laws, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, the petition of William Nay, of similar import, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, the petition of Violet Jividon, of similar import, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, the petition of Caroline Dawkins, of similar import, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, the petition of Richard Pollard, of similar import, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, the petition of John Hazel and James Childs, of similar import, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, the petition of T. M. Armstrong and others, of similar import, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. TREMAIN: Resolutions of the Union League Club, of New York City, in favor of the general principles of the joint resolution H. R. No. 1917, so far as the same relates to the cancellation of fraudulent naturalization papers, to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. VANCE: The petition of E. J. Hoffman and others, for a post-route from East La Porte, Jackson County, to Cherryfields, Transylvania County, North Carolina, to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

By Mr. ——: Papers relating to the claim of Mrs. Mary Sublatt, for a pension, to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions and War of 1812.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, March 20, 1874.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I move that the further reading of the Journal be dispensed with.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine moves that the further reading of the Journal be dispensed with. The Chair hears no objection, and the reading is dispensed with.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. ALLISON presented the petition of sundry citizens of Muscatine, Iowa; a petition of citizens of Iowa City, Iowa; a petition of the State University of Iowa, and a petition of citizens of Solon Post-Office, Johnson County, Iowa, praying the substitution of arbitration as a means of settlement of international differences instead of war; which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. BOGY presented resolutions of the State Grange of Missouri, in relation to the disposition of the public lands; which were referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. HAGER presented a resolution of the Legislature of the State of California, remonstrating against the granting of an additional subsidy to the Pacific Mail Steamship Company; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a resolution of the Legislature of California, in favor of the passage of an act declaratory of the meaning of the joint resolution of Congress of June 28, 1870, in reference to the reserve for a land grant to the Southern Pacific Railroad Company in that State, and for the restoration of certain lands therein to the public domain; which was referred to the Committee on Railroads.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. I presented a few days since a memorial from the chiefs and head-men of the Oneida Nation of Indians, asking the payment of certain sums of money claimed to be due the Six Nations of Indians under the treaties of 1838 and 1842, which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs. I move now that that memorial be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. INGALLS presented additional testimony in the case of Martin V. Jackson's application for a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont, presented a petition of Rev. N. Newton Glazier and others, praying for an amendment of the pension laws; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. SCOTT presented the petition of Madeline Vinton Dahlgren, widow of the late Rear-Admiral Dahlgren, asking compensation for property taken and used by the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. SCOTT. I present a petition of citizens of Philadelphia and New Jersey, asking Congress to grant to the Red Bank Ferry Company a landing at the foot of Broad street, and the right of way, as I understand, across League Island, for the purpose of enabling the farmers to have quick transit to the city of Philadelphia. I move its reference to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN presented the petition of Charles Fitch and others, heirs of Joseph Billings, praying indemnity for spoliations committed by the French prior to the year 1801; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. LEWIS presented the petition of Myer Myers and others, praying to be indemnified for spoliations committed by the French prior to the year 1801; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented the petition of Dabney H. Maury, of Richmond, Virginia, praying the removal of his political disabilities; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. KELLY presented a petition of citizens of Oregon and Washington Territory, praying for the removal of obstructions in the Columbia River at the Cascades and the Dalles; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. PRATT. I beg leave to present seven petitions emanating from citizens of different parts of the State of Indiana, praying Congress to take steps as promptly as possible, in co-operation with other governments, for the settlement of international difficulties by arbitration, and the formation of a high court of nations, or such other pacific measures as the wisdom of Congress may suggest for the settlement of international difficulties without resort to arms. I move their reference to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The motion was agreed to.

IMPORTATION OF CHINESE.

Mr. HAGER. I have a resolution from the State of California in regard to Chinese immigration, and as it is an important subject for us in California, I desire, after submitting the resolution, to make some explanatory remarks.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from California asks unanimous consent to make some explanatory remarks on the memorial which he proposes to present. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. HAGER. A short time ago a memorial was presented by my colleague from the laboring men of the State of California, signed by nearly 17,000, asking for relief on the same subject-matter to which this joint resolution of the Legislature which I now offer relates; that is, to the importation of Chinese into the State of California. I use the word "importation" instead of "immigration" intentionally, as the correct descriptive term, as I will explain.

It is a subject of very considerable moment to us, I may say of the highest importance, and, although perhaps not well understood here, it is rapidly assuming such proportions as must necessarily make it a national question. I will read this resolution, as it embraces the whole subject-matter, and will take occasion to explain the subject to which it relates in connection with the Burlingame treaty:

Concurrent resolution on Chinese immigration.

Whereas the great influx of Chinese into the State of California has proved detrimental to the moral and material well-being of our industrial classes by forcing on them a competition at wages below the cost of subsistence to men of our own origin, who have families depending on their labor for support and education; and whereas article 5 of the treaty of 1868, between the United States and the Chinese Empire—the former containing forty million inhabitants and the latter nearly four hundred millions—provided that the parties thereto shall impose no obstacle to the emigration of their citizens and subjects from one country to the other, for the purposes of curiosity, of trade, or as permanent residents; under which stipulation it is notorious that large numbers of persons, frequently aggregating over one thousand in a single vessel, are brought into the port of San Francisco, by companies of associated Chinese capitalists, under contract made in China, to perform labor at low wages for their masters for a series of years, within the United States, which contracts are enforced by the edicts of secret tribunals, which inflict, in defiance of our laws, cruel and arbitrary punishment; and whereas it is against public policy, and the future welfare of our people, that under any pretext whatever encouragement should be given, by treaty stipulation or otherwise, to the immigration, free or involuntary, of a servile laboring element, whose low standard of living and morality menaces the communities in which it may reside with pestiferous disease; and whereas Mongolian labor has driven from employment large numbers of our people, by a competition which has been prolific of idleness, vice, and suffering among our people, thereby assisting to fill our jails, poor-houses, and hospitals with unwilling inmates: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the senate, (the assembly concurring.) That our Senators be instructed, and our Representatives requested, to use their influence to have articles 5 and 6 of our treaty with China modified so as to discourage the further immigration of Chinese to our shores by appropriate action on the part of the Federal Government.

Resolved, That his excellency the governor be requested to forward a copy of the foregoing preamble and resolution to our Senators and Representatives in Congress, at as early a day as possible.

W. IRWIN,
President of the Senate pro tempore.
MORRIS M. ESTEE,
Speaker of the Assembly.

Such is the resolution of the Legislature of the State of California, and to my own knowledge the recitals therein are correct.

This subject of Chinese immigration, so called, is not understood, I respectfully submit, either in this Chamber or among the people of the Atlantic States. Is has not the characteristics of immigration. We call it the importation of Chinese, and it is so denominated in this resolution, and the word used is strictly appropriate. It is the importation of a servile element of that people, and it has none of the characteristics of free and voluntary immigration. The treaty to which this resolution refers, article 5, reads as follows:

ART. 5. The United States of America and the Emperor of China cordially recognize the inherent and inalienable right of man to change his home and allegiance, and also the mutual advantage of the free migration and emigration of their citizens and subjects, respectively, from the one country to the other, for purposes of curiosity, of trade, or as permanent residents. The high contracting parties, therefore, join in reprobating any other than an entirely voluntary emigration for these purposes. They consequently agree to pass laws making it a penal offence for a citizen of the United States or Chinese subjects to take Chinese subjects either to the United States or to any other foreign country, or for a Chinese subject or citizen of the United States to take citizens of the United States to China or to any other foreign country, without their free and voluntary consent respectively.

Article 6, which is also alluded to in the resolution, is as follows:

ART. 6. Citizens of the United States visiting or residing in China shall enjoy the same privileges, immunities, or exemptions, in respect to travel or residence, as may there be enjoyed by the citizens or subjects of the most favored nation. And, reciprocally, Chinese subjects, visiting or residing in the United States, shall enjoy the same privileges, immunities, and exemptions in respect to travel or residence, as may there be enjoyed by the citizens or subjects of the most favored nation.

It will be observed that by article 6 the Chinese are placed upon an equality with the most favored nations, and so are we in China placed upon an equality with the most favored nations. Our citizens have the privilege to go to China for curiosity, for trade, or for permanent residence; yet it is well understood that Americans cannot penetrate into the interior of China unless by special license, and then it is necessary to have a guard of soldiers for protection. So far as they dare be, they are to-day as exclusive in their intercourse with us as they were anterior to this treaty.

Now, sir, I do not want it to be understood that we object to the treaty as it reads. Neither would we object to it if its provisions were observed and faithfully carried out. But the provisions of this treaty are disregarded. The Burlingame treaty, as it reads, might not be objectionable to the people of the State of California, for the reason that it merely recognizes the right of immigration from China to the United States, for "purposes of curiosity, of trade, or as permanent residents," and prohibits immigration for other purposes, such as we complain of, and as I will explain. There is no immigration to the State of California or to the United States from China for purposes of curiosity, of trade, or as permanent residents. The lowest estimate from the best sources of information, is that there are about eighty thousand Chinese now in California, and some estimate it at one hundred thousand. Of those eighty thousand, there is not one in a thousand that comes there for purposes of curiosity, or of trade, or as a permanent resident. This article (article 5 of the treaty) further says:

The high contracting parties, therefore, join in reprobating any other than an entirely voluntary emigration for these purposes.

That is, for the purpose of trade, of curiosity, or of permanent residence. Then it proceeds to provide that each country shall pass penal laws to prohibit any other kind of emigration from China to this country or from this country to China.

The point which I wish to get at is to explain the character of this Chinese emigration, and to show that it is not only in conflict with the Burlingame treaty, but in conflict with a law as old as March 2, 1807. That was the law to suppress the African slave trade.

I will read section 1 of that act of 1807, intended to abolish the African slave trade and to prohibit the importation of persons of color to be held to service or labor. It reads as follows:

That from and after the 1st day of January, 1808, it shall not be lawful to import or bring into the United States, or the territories thereof, from any foreign kingdom, place, or country, any negro, mulatto, or person of color, with intent to hold, sell, or dispose of such negro, mulatto, or person of color as a slave or to be held to service or labor.

Under the Burlingame treaty I undertake to say that there is gradually being introduced into the United States a species of slavery, and instead of that treaty being a blessing, as it has been regarded, I venture to say that next to the African slave trade it will prove to be the greatest curse that ever befell our country, unless some remedy be administered here to prevent this importation of servile labor—I may say this introduction of slavery.

Mr. BAYARD. Is it the cooly trade?

Mr. HAGER. It is nothing else but the cooly trade, and it is being gradually introduced, as I hope to show.

The same thing, I may say here, has heretofore been attempted in Australia, but they, more philosophical and far-seeing, perhaps, than we, have suppressed it. There is no longer any Chinese emigration to Australia. For certain political and social reasons they found it absolutely necessary to prohibit it. Formerly they had one hundred thousand; now they have twenty thousand; and in the adjoining island of New Zealand they have prohibited and excluded it entirely.

I have stated that not one in a thousand comes to the State of California for the purposes of curiosity, or of trade, or as a permanent resident, according to the language of this treaty. They do not come there as free, voluntary immigrants, with wives and children and the surroundings of home, but they come under servile-labor contracts entered into before they leave the ports of China, and against the prohibition or decrees of the Chinese government. In a conversation that I had with Governor Low, our minister to China, a short time before I left California, he told me that the Chinese government had tried in every way to carry out the provisions of this treaty by prohibiting this kind of emigration, knowing that it was contrary to our laws and contrary to the provisions of article 5 of this treaty; but it is carried on through the English port of Hong-Kong, outside of the jurisdiction of Chinese authority and law.

We cannot complain of the Chinese government as violating that treaty by encouraging an involuntary emigration under these servile-labor contracts. They are enticed to the port of Hong-Kong by the agents of the parties that own and control them in the State of California, and they are embarked from that port; and the Chinese government have no control over it, or if it had, as I am informed, it would have been suppressed long ago.

The facts are these: all the Chinese in California are owned by companies, known as the six Chinese companies, an association of Chinese capitalists located in San Francisco, who have their agents in China, at Hong-Kong and in the interior, collecting from that vast population the refuse, the most degraded portions of it, binding them to these servile-labor contracts, under which they are brought to California, and all Chinese so imported are owned and controlled by these six companies as effectually, as thoroughly, as the slaves of the South were formerly owned and controlled by their masters. For a small stipend they bind themselves to these companies for a term of years, and the companies hire them out in California and receive the proceeds of their labor. This is the question which I wish to present to the Senate, and this is the question that is brought before Congress by the resolution of the Legislature of California which I have had the honor to present. These companies pay all the expenses of these servile laborers, and clothe and feed them. When they arrive at San Francisco they are taken charge of by their agents; they are lodged and taken care of, and they are hired out to our people from one up to ten thousand, if you see fit to make an application for that number; and they are entering into all the avenues where labor seeks employment. The result is they exclude our own citizens. The result is that they discourage the foreign emigrant to California, are crowding out citizen labor from every avenue where it seeks employment; and this is discouraging foreign emigration from Europe to California.

It is well understood among the immigrants that come from Europe that if they go to California their labor must come into competition with this servile Chinese labor, and the consequence is they are discouraged from going there. Our own citizen labor is unable to compete with this servile labor, because what will sustain a Chinaman will not sustain our citizen laborer. If a citizen can afford to work for fifty dollars a month, a Chinese will do it for thirty dollars; if the citizen labor comes down to thirty dollars a month, Chinese labor will come down to twenty dollars; and if citizen labor comes down to twenty dollars, the Chinese will come down to ten dollars, and then they will make money. That is the condition there, so that there is no fair competition. Their clothing and their food are inexpensive compared with ours; they are taken care of, as I say, entirely by these companies, with the understanding that they are to be sent back to China dead or alive, believing, as they do, that it is essential for their happiness in the future world, and that if they would there mingle with friends and relatives they had known on earth they must be buried in their native country.

Mr. BAYARD. Do they make their own contracts for labor?

Mr. HAGER. They make their own contracts; they make them in China before they come here, and bind themselves to these companies for a term of years.

Mr. BAYARD. Individually?

Mr. HAGER. Individually they enter into these contracts in China, and the emigration is encouraged by the steamship companies for the profits of the traffic, and sometimes a thousand, sometimes fifteen hundred, come over in one vessel. The agents of these six companies of capitalists associated together in San Francisco have their agents in China, and they procure these men, get them to enter into these contracts, and ship them, not from a Chinese port, as I have stated, but from the English port of Hong-Kong. Governor Low told me the Chinese government was opposed to the emigration, and had tried to suppress it, and would do it if they had the power. But it has no power to do it in that port.

Mr. MERRIMON. For what sort of labor are they used?

Mr. HAGER. They are hired in private families as cooks, and in the capacity of chambermaids, although they are males, as waiters, and as porters in stores; in the factories, in the mines, in the fields of agriculture, wherever labor is employed, there these Chinese are offered at lower rates than our citizens can afford to work for, and the result is that at this time there are thousands of our own people in the streets of San Francisco destitute of the necessaries of life, because they have been crowded out from all employments by this Chinese labor. They cannot compete with it. It is not a question as between the sobriety of this nation or that, or the honesty of this or that race, or the skillfulness of this or that people; it is merely a question of cheap labor. Our people cannot compete with them. It is impossible, because, as I say, if they come down to twenty dollars a month the Chinese can make money at ten dollars a month; and one race must give way to the other; the result will be that either our white citizen labor will be entirely driven from every field of labor, or else, driven to desperation, with starvation before them, there will be an upheaval which will lead to scenes of violence and blood, however much we may deplore it, shocking to our humanity, and which may produce a thrill of horror throughout the civilized world. We have been apprehensive of this for years. It has been on the eve several times of being precipitated.

Now, sir, as I stated, you can go to these companies and hire from one to one thousand, or from ten to ten thousand, or even twenty thousand, of these people at such rates as you may bargain for; and if they have not the number on hand they will supply them; they will send to China for them. You can go there from here and make a contract with these six companies to bring you fifty thousand Chinese here, just as fast as the vessels can bring them across the ocean, under these servile-labor engagements to the companies. The companies collect all their wages; the Chinese do not collect them. They receive a small stipend, which is agreed upon beforehand. They have their secret tribunals, where they administer justice, right in our midst. They never go into an American court for the administration of justice among themselves. They have their own secret tribunals, as this resolution recites, where they pronounce judgment and where they inflict punishment, corporeal and otherwise; so that these Chinese are kept together in fear and by superstition, so that they are entirely obedient to these six companies. That is the condition of Chinese immigration, so called, which we call Chinese importation, as it exists in California, and, as I say, in derogation of the very language of the treaty under which they are brought here.

We are peculiarly situated. We are at the extreme verge of this western continent. The course of empire can go no farther west. We occupy the place where the Occident and the Orient meet. Chinese civilization and American civilization meet upon the shores of the Pacific, and we have got to breast this storm, this influx from Asia in our State. We see it in all its bearings, in all its evils. We see that it is driving our own citizens and European immigration from us; we see that if it is to be continued, with our new commercial relations, with steam communication with China, in the course of time they must outnumber us. China might spare one million or five millions of its surplus population without experiencing the sensation of a vacuum. They will come if there is a field for them, and they will enter at once into competition with our people in every field of labor. If you should extend to them the elective franchise, they must have absolutely the control of that State. There is but one word that prevents their being made citizens, the word "white" in our naturalization laws. Strike that out, and California will surrender to the Mongolian.

I have a pamphlet here which was recently sent to me, from which I will read a passage, which presents the subject as fully as any words of mine can illustrate it. It is as follows:

> By their coming as servile labor, they add nothing to our military strength, nothing to our material wealth, nothing to our political welfare, nothing to our moral improvement, nothing to our educational interests, nothing to our architectural beauty, nothing to our æsthetic taste, and no refining influence to our social intercourse, but directly to the contrary of all these, so that the only possible advantage of their presence is to cheapen the price of citizen labor. But universally to cheapen the price of an article is to injure the class of persons interested in its production; so to cheapen the price of citizen labor is to injure the whole laboring class, because labor is their capital. But as the price of labor and capital is always regulated in market according to supply and demand, an excess of servile labor will reduce the demand for citizen labor. Therefore to cheapen the labor of a citizen, by introducing a lower race of servile laborers, is to exclude the citizen, and often a whole family, for one servile laborer employed.

That presents the case precisely as it is.

There is another phase of this Chinese immigration, so called, to which I desire to call the attention of the Senate. I have stated that they do not come here in the character of immigrants, with wives and children and the surroundings of home; but we do have female immigration. They bring females under contracts for purposes too vile for me even to mention in this Chamber. Their persons are bound for a term of years, and young girls from fifteen to twenty years of age are brought to California, owned entirely by those who bring them. They are exposed in our cities with such charms as they possess, and throughout the whole mining region, in order to attract the passer-by into their dens of vice. This is called Chinese immigration, too. In a paper that I received from San Francisco yesterday, I find what is an ordinary thing with us; but perhaps it will be a surprise to the Senators here, unless they are familiar with this question, when I read it. It is as follows:

> CHINESE SLAVERY—AN INTERESTING EXAMPLE TO BE INVESTIGATED IN COURT.
> Last Thursday afternoon Officer Kearns was approached by a Chinaman, who informed him that a Chinese female was detained against her will in a Chinese bagnio in an alley off Jackson street, and that for more than thirty days she had not been permitted to leave the house. The officer reported the matter to the police headquarters, and upon receiving instructions he visited the premises described by the Chinaman, and found the female alluded to in a small room in the upper part of the house. He took her in charge, and at the same time arrested Tan Pe Sam, the keeper of the place, on a charge of keeping a house of ill-fame. Subsequently this charge was altered to false imprisonment.
> The woman taken from this house was conveyed to the Chinese mission, on Washington street, where she was, through an interpreter, questioned by Rev. O. Gibson, and the following is a report of the interview which took place:
> "What is your name?
> "Nan Lung. Formerly I was called Tia Ngan.
> "How old are you?
> "Twenty-two years old.
> "When did you come to San Francisco?
> "Year before last, the twelfth month. [That would be about January, 1872.]
> "Did you come here of your own free will?
> "No; I was sold and brought here.
> "Who sold you?
> "Some kidnappers seized me and brought me away by force, and a woman named Ah See sold me to Ah You for $150.
> "Who brought you to California?
> "Ah You.
> "What did Ah You do with you?
> "Sold me to Tan Pe Sam for $370.
> "How do you know that Tan Pe Sam paid $370 for you?
> "Because I received the money in my own hands.
> "What did you do with the money?
> "I handed it over to Ah Pat, who is Ah You's sister.
> "Why did you hand it to Ah Pat?
> "Because Ah You passed me over to Ah Pat to be sold."

That is to get rid of our laws. They have a way of doing these things among themselves. The girl receives the money, pays it over, and says "That is what I owe to you," in order to avoid the appearance of a sale of the person.

The account goes on:

> "About what time did Ah You or Ah Pat sell you to Tan Pe Sam?
> "Last Chinese year, second month, third day.
> "Where have you been since Ah You sold you?
> "Living with Tan Pe Sam."
> The woman then stated that in Tan Pe Sam's house she had been leading a life of shame against her will, but did so because she had been bought for that purpose, and had been forced to do it. After that the questioning was resumed:
> "While living with Tan Pe Sam, could you leave when you chose?
> "No; she would not permit me to leave.
> "Did you not go on the street sometimes?
> "Yes; but Tan Pe Sam always went with me.
> "Do you wish to go back to Tan Pe Sam?
> "No.
> "What do you wish to do?
> "I wish to marry Ah Yung."

She had a lover, and that is what exposed the whole matter in the courts; otherwise it would have been kept secret.

> The woman then produced a document, written in Chinese characters, of which the following is a translated copy.

I read this to show the nature of these contracts. Here is one relating to the females that are brought over, and those relating to the males are of a similar character. This contract is translated in these words:

> To assist a certain woman, Tai Ngan, the two parties speaking plainly, and agree that with her body Tai Ngan shall assist San So four years and a half. If sick fourteen days, no account shall be made of it; but if sick fifteen days, Tai Ngan shall serve one month additional. When the four years and a half have expired, Tai Ngan may choose her own man without any interference. That there may be proof of this agreement, two papers are written in witness.
> Twelfth Chinese year, second month, third day.
> TAI NGAN.

That is one of these contracts relating to the females which I happened to receive in a paper yesterday, and although with us they are very often exposed in the courts and these contracts brought out, I read this here, as it perhaps will better illustrate the character of this so-called Chinese immigration under the Burlingame treaty as we experience it in the State of California, and, as I say, being carried on in violation of the treaty itself, and contrary to the wishes of the Chinese government. It has none of the characteristics of immigration. It is nothing more nor less than the introduction of cooly labor—slavery in fact—under color of immigration.

It may be said, in answer to all this, why does not California legislate upon this subject? We have made efforts to suppress this kind of immigration, this gradual introduction of slavery in California, this bringing of females there for immoral purposes. We have passed laws intending to suppress it, but we were met with the objection, all such legislation is in contravention of the treaty with China; you are legislating on a subject that exclusively belongs to the Federal Government, attempting to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and in violation, too, of solemn treaty engagements. We, as a State, are powerless to administer any relief by local legislation, and if any remedy be administered it must come from the national Congress.

Sir, I am not in physical condition to-day to address the Senate, but perhaps on some future occasion, when it assumes some form of legislation, I may avail myself of some opportunity again to present this question, so important to us, for the further consideration of the Senate; but I desire at this time, as an initiative, to offer the following resolution in connection with the resolutions of the Legislature of California:

Resolved, That the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations be instructed to advise with his Excellency the President in regard to the expediency of opening negotiations with the Emperor of China, with a view to obtaining such modification or enlargement of the treaty with China, commonly known as the Burlingame treaty, as will check the importation into the United States of Chinese females for immoral purposes and of Chinese males as coolies, or for the purpose of fulfilling servile-labor engagements.

This is a resolution merely to inquire into the expediency, and I hope it will meet with no opposition on the part of any Senator.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution is not yet in order.

Mr. HAGER. I ask leave to submit it in connection with the resolutions of the Legislature of California.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from California asks unanimous consent to present at the present time a resolution out of order.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I suggest that the Senator wait until the morning business is through.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is an objection.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. INGALLS, it was Ordered, That the papers in the case of Martin V. Jackson be taken from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. STEWART. I am instructed by the Committee on Railroads to report back the bill (H. R. No. 1778) granting permission for a railway from the wharf of the Baltimore Steam Packet Company, at Old Point Comfort, Elizabeth City County, Virginia, to Mill Creek Bridge, in the same county, and ask that it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. I have looked through the bill and cannot see any objection to it; but still I do not think it is proper for the Committee on Railroads to interfere with military reservations. We therefore ask to be discharged, and that the bill be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. STEWART also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 35) granting aid to the Atlantic and Great Western Canal Company, reported adversely thereon, and moved its indefinite postponement; which was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the petition of Henry Woodson, late Company H, Fifth Regiment Missouri State Militia, praying to be allowed a pension, and the petition of Patsey Inlow, widow of Abraham Inlow, late Company F, Fifty-third Regiment Missouri Militia, praying to be allowed a pension, submitted adverse reports thereon; which were ordered to be printed, and the committee was discharged from the further consideration of the petitions.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1230) granting a pension to Elizabeth W. Prindle, guardian of the minor children of Joseph F. Doak, deceased, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1227) granting a pension to Eliza A. Maxham, reported it with an amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Jefferson A. French, late of the United States naval service, Mississippi squadron, praying for a pension, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 613) granting a pension to Jefferson A. French.

The bill was read and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, who were directed by a resolution of the Senate of January 22 to inquire into the expediency of suspending the expenditure of all appropriations for public buildings not yet commenced, and to cover such appropriations into the Treasury, submitted a report; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Texas, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2096) granting a pension to James Roach, reported it without amendment.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Texas. I am instructed by the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Timothy Page, of Niagara County, New York, praying for a pension, to report it adversely. This case has been twice or three times before Congress, and reported adversely upon. I therefore move the adoption of this report, and that the written report be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CHANDLER, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred a resolution of the Legislature of California, asking an appropriation for removing the wreck of the ship Patrician, and the rock known as the Noon Day rock, near the entrance to the harbor of San Francisco, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 614) to provide for the removal of the wreck of the ship Patrician, near the entrance to the harbor of San Francisco, California.

The bill was read and passed to a second reading; and the report was ordered to be printed.

EPISCOPAL PARISHES IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. JOHNSTON. The Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2422) to approve an act of the Legislative Assembly of the District of Columbia, relating to parishes of the Protestant Episcopal Church, have instructed me to report it back without amendment, and to ask for its present consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

It approves the act of the Legislative Assembly of the District of Columbia entitled "An act for the relief of parishes of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the District of Columbia," approved June 26, 1873, and repeals all acts now in force in the District of Columbia inconsistent therewith.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to have an explanation of this bill.

Mr. JOHNSTON. The State of Maryland, before this District was ceded to the United States, had some laws in regard to this church by which it was provided that nobody except those who lived inside the parish where the particular church was situated should vote in the vestry election. After the District was ceded to the United States, Congress, by a law passed in 1801, adopted that same provision in regard to this church; but it is found now to be a fact that more than four-fifths of the members of the church live outside of the respective parishes of the particular churches which they attend.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection. I thought it might relate to church property.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. STEWART. I desire to introduce a bill for increasing the pension of Mrs. General Sumner. There were two or three cases at the last session, standing precisely on the same footing. The Committee on Pensions reported adversely on all the cases; but one or two of the bills passed, and the chairman of that committee moved then, as Mrs. Sumner's case stood on the same ground as those that had already passed, to reconsider the report in her case, but he failed to succeed in his motion, and it went over. I now ask leave to introduce a bill and have it referred to the Committee on Pensions, that they may do justice in the matter.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to introduce a bill (S. No. 615) to increase the pension of Mrs. Hannah W. Sumner, widow of Major-General Edwin V. Sumner, who died March 21, 1863, while in command of the Department of the West; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. SPENCER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 616) relating to sales under deed of trust in the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. SPENCER. I introduce this bill by request. I wish to state that I have not examined the law that it proposes to amend, and consequently I know nothing about its merits. I move that it be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and printed.

The motion was agreed to.

IMPORTATION OF CHINESE.

Mr. HAGER submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Relations be instructed to advise with the President in regard to the expediency of opening negotiations with the Emperor of China, with a view to obtaining such modification or enlargement of the treaty with China, commonly known as the "Burlingame treaty," as will check the importation into the United States of Chinese females for immoral purposes, and of Chinese males as coolies, or for the purpose of fulfilling servile-labor engagements.

Mr. HAMLIN. I do not think that resolution has any business in this body whatever. Neither we, as a body, nor the committee, have anything to do with negotiating treaties. It seems to me that the voluminous papers which the Senator's colleague [Mr. SARGENT] presented to this body sometime ago and had referred to that committee have no connection with any action in this body upon the subjects embraced, save one, according to my recollection. There was one practical question of legislation which might arise under those papers, and it was considered whether the memorials should not be referred to another committee. With negotiating treaties this body has certainly nothing to do. We are simply a ratifying body; and all of the resolution which relates to the negotiations or change of treaties ought to be addressed to the President for his consideration; and if upon a due consideration of that subject the Executive shall deem it wise or proper to enter into any additional negotiation with the Chinese government he will do so; and when he shall submit the result of his action to us, we then shall consider it. But to direct the committee to inquire even into the expediency of any action in relation to negotiating a treaty, I think—I do not speak with precise certainty—is unprecedented. I believe no such precedent can be found in the history of the Government. I therefore object to the resolution, this morning at least, and let it go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made to the present consideration of the resolution.

NATIONAL-BANK CIRCULATION—LIMITATION OF DEBATE.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that the Senate take up the resolution that I offered day before yesterday in regard to the finance question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read.

Mr. SHERMAN. I propose to modify it to meet the changed condition of things.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be read as modified.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the bill (S. No. 432) to amend the act entitled "An act to provide for the redemption of 3 per cent. temporary-loan certificates and for an increase of national-bank notes," approved July 12, 1870, be made the special order of the day for Monday next at one o'clock; and that not exceeding two days shall be allowed for general debate; and after that, the debate shall be confined to speeches not exceeding ten minutes by each Senator on any pending proposition.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I move to amend by striking out "two days" and inserting "one day." I am satisfied that will be sufficient.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is a question for the Senate. If any Senators here desire to speak at length on the subject, I do not wish to cut them off. I would rather have it one day.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Say "not more than two days."

Mr. SHERMAN. Perhaps we can make it less than two days; and if so we will do it.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I will vary the amendment by saying "not more than two days."

Mr. SHERMAN. That is what it says now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be again reported.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution as modified.

Mr. BAYARD. Is that the bill on which the general question of finance has been and is being discussed?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. BAYARD. I trust, sir, that the proposition to restrict debate on this subject will not receive the favor of the Senate. The other day suggestions were made that time had been wasted, and the Senate was rather taken to task for having wasted public time respecting the discussion of this question. Sir, I regard this as utterly unjust, when you consider the sudden and dreadful collapse that occurred in the finances of this country last fall, and the circumstances under which we met here in December, and the fact that there is throughout the country a very great conflict of opinion, the surges of which are beating to and fro until this very hour, and the people have been, with an anxiety that never was exceeded, with an anxiety in this body that I do not think was ever exceeded, endeavoring to discover the proper issue for our relief. The debate on this subject has been earnest; its tone has been all that it should be. Men have differed most widely, but they have differed conscientiously; and no speech has been made, to my knowledge, in the Senate that has not been dictated by a high sense of public duty, without the least disposition to waste public time or to indulge in individual feeling.

Mr. President, I do not know what is to be the issue of the counsels of Congress on this subject; but I do know that seldom it is in the life of a man that he is called upon to act in regard to questions more pregnant with momentous results to the people, not only of this generation but of others also, than are involved in the proper decision of the questions embraced by this whole financial subject.

Sir, we may discuss measures that have been hinted at in the body; we may discuss measures that may be reported to the Senate by the Committee on Finance, and perhaps in all probability two days will be sufficient for their ample discussion, because that which has preceded has not been useless. Gentlemen have indicated their counsels by their speeches. They do understand the subject better from their own points of view, and I trust from points of view suggested by other persons. And therefore it is not probable that more than two days may be needed for the discussion of the measures already proposed. But who can tell what new measures may be thrown into this debate in the shape of amendments? Who can tell what new light may be sought to be thrown into the debate? Do you tell me that we shall confine ourselves to a ten-minute discussion of matters of this kind? No, sir; no. It may be that what we have discussed may be but the beginning of what we may be called upon to discuss hereafter. It may be that questions still more difficult to decide will be broached in the course of the discussion, which it would be madness and folly to attempt to consider under the restricted rule of debate.

I am most anxious that a result should be reached. There is something in uncertainty that unsettles every man's mind, and there is something of relief in a decision, whether that decision is in accordance with your own views or not. I think we all feel that. I think the country feels that. But, sir, we cannot serve the country better than by delaying a decision on this subject until that decision shall be founded upon a thorough knowledge of the principles of what we are discussing and the best method of applying them.

I do hope that there will be no attempt to fix a ten-minute rule of debate on amendments. We have had in the Senate before, agreements, after a long debate, that at a certain hour we should proceed to vote; but that has been held not to exclude amendments which might be offered up to that hour; and what has been the result? That amendments of an exceedingly obnoxious character to many members of the body have been forced through in silence, because debate was choked off under a rule which could not anticipate what the nature of the amendments to be offered or their effect might be.

If we had a fixed measure, if that measure alone was to be discussed, then we might agree to take the vote after two days' debate; and such a proposition might be reasonable. But we do not know what shape the measure will take; we do not know what amendments will be offered, and, under such circumstances, I should be most unwilling to see a restriction upon debate until we know the subjects to which that debate will relate.

Therefore, while I am very willing indeed that this bill should be taken up on Monday, and discussed on Monday and Tuesday, and until it is closed, until there shall be, to use the phrase so common to this body, "something done upon this subject," yet I trust that the Senate will agree with me when I move, as I now do, to strike out that portion of the proposed order which limits the debate to ten minutes upon amendments after the close of the general debate on Tuesday next.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired, the Senate resumes the consideration of the Army appropriation bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. I suggest to the Senator having charge of that bill whether it would not be better to settle this matter now. It will take but a few minutes, I imagine. I have nothing to say about it myself, but let us now fix the order of business for Monday; otherwise we may be engaged in a dispute about it then. I think Senators will see that we shall gain time by fixing the duration of the finance debate. This order is in pursuance of a custom. There are several precedents, I know, for I have offered similar resolutions myself. Undoubtedly the Senate can restrict debate. It is a question as to how far they ought to restrict debate. As a general rule, they ought not to do it; but they have done it in many cases, and there is no doubt about the power of the Senate to prescribe a rule.

Mr. BAYARD. We never, I think—I say it with due respect to the larger experience of my friend from Ohio—have fixed a limitation on debate, except on amendments touching money appropriation bills; and we all know by our experience that on those bills the time rarely was occupied.

Mr. SHERMAN. That observation will have to be extended to tax bills and revenue bills reported from the Committee on Finance, of which my friend is a member. There is no doubt about the power of the Senate to regulate the manner of disposing of its business. As to time, we have had three months; we have heard every ebb and flow of popular opinion on this subject, from all classes of people; and we have had the benefit of every light which can be thrown on the subject. If any Senator desires to express his views at length, there are two days reserved for him; and it seems to me that after those two days have expired, we may then approach the solution of this question on a ten-minute debate, without any danger of cutting off anybody.

Mr. BAYARD. Suppose you do not move the ten-minute rule until the end of the two days' debate, and then see how the question stands.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is a matter for the Senate. I simply wish to bring the question before the Senate to save time.

Mr. BAYARD. The Senator can move the adoption of this rule at that time quite as well as now.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. That applies after the two days.

Mr. BAYARD. I know; but it is on new amendments, of the character of which we have no knowledge at this time. I trust that restriction will not be adopted.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. If there is a disposition to vote on this order now, I will not interpose by calling for the Army appropriation bill; but if there is to be further debate, I give notice that I shall call for it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It may be laid aside informally, for the purpose of proceeding with this subject.

Mr. SCHURZ. I desire simply to make a suggestion to the chairman of the Committee on Finance. I think if he desires to have this finance question disposed of he will reach his object by simply making his bill the special order for Monday, with a general understanding that we shall continue the discussion of that bill until it is disposed of.

I agree perfectly with the Senator from Delaware when he says it is impossible for us to foresee what amendments may be thrown in which would make a ten-minute rule very injurious indeed. For instance, somebody may move something in connection with the $44,000,000 reserve, a thing which has not been discussed at all during this debate, and which will necessarily provoke very elaborate discussion—a discussion which cannot be confined to ten minutes. There are other subjects. I suggest to my friend from Ohio that his object will be reached completely if he insists on making his bill the special order for Monday, with a general understanding that it shall continue from day to day until disposed of.

Mr. LOGAN. That has been the understanding by agreement already.

Mr. SCHURZ. If that has been agreed to, I think this resolution is unnecessary.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will take as much as I can get now, and try to get the rest hereafter. I therefore will simply submit for the present the motion that the finance bill be made the special order for Monday; but I give notice to Senators that either during the two days I propose to allow for general debate, or at some time, I shall insist on a ten-minute debate or some abbreviated debate, because I know, without some such order as that, we shall not be able to dispose of the financial question in all its aspects, if we hope to dispose of it at all; and then I give further notice, so that Senators may not be taken unawares, that, so far as one man can, I intend to stand by the subject until it is disposed of by final action of the Senate, and I wish that action to be comprehensive, so as to embrace the whole subject-matter, so that we may not again be called upon to consider the general financial aspect.

I move now simply that the bill be made the special order for Monday.

Mr. ANTHONY. I hope the Senator will not withdraw his original resolution. I have never known a rule of this kind to be abused, and practically it is impossible to take any advantage of it. If amendments of an unexpected character are introduced, it is always in the power of any Senator under such a rule to speak as long as he chooses, because he can make a motion to indefinitely postpone the whole bill, and then he can speak as long as he pleases.

Mr. BAYARD. On the merits of the proposition?

Mr. ANTHONY. Certainly. A motion to indefinitely postpone opens the whole bill and every amendment that is offered to it.

Mr. BAYARD. The objection to that is that it is treating our own rules with disrespect. It is an evasion that the Senate ought not to make it necessary for a gentleman to resort to. If the Senate makes a rule, and I vote for it, I intend to keep it, and I would not care to beat the devil around the bush by making a motion of the character indicated by the Senator from Rhode Island, to postpone the question indefinitely, in order to get in my remarks, or to take up the time of the Senate by an enlarged discussion after it agreed to restrict debate. I think the question had better be allowed to rest in that broad sense of duty and honorable discretion which ought to govern every member of this body in the course of debate. I feel so much the importance and gravity of this subject, I feel so much the gravity of the results of the action of the Congress of the United States in respect to this question, that even if I anticipated the overthrow of those ideas which I conscientiously hold to be right, I would rather let the debate be prolonged until each man's sense of duty was satisfied, and let that be the proper gauge, than agree, on a question of this kind, to fix a limitation of ten minutes.

Mr. ANTHONY. It is not for me to insist on the original motion if the chairman of the Committee on Finance chooses to withdraw it; but I think there is no evasion and no "beating the devil around the bush" in making a motion to indefinitely postpone a bill if something is introduced that is unexpected, some amendment that was not anticipated. I think it perfectly fair and perfectly legitimate. But if we are to have no other amendments, if we are merely to discuss the same questions that have been discussed, certainly very fully, and very ably I think, and in very good temper on both sides, we can get through in ten-minute debate. However, I shall not press it if the Senator who has charge of the bill does not.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am trespassing now on the time of the Committee on Appropriations. I think we shall accomplish the same result by simply making the bill a special order for Monday; and I give due notice that the resolution being still pending I shall call it up hereafter, but not now.

Mr. ANTHONY. When the Senator says he means to press the bill, we do not understand that he means to "sit out" a bill of this kind, and make it a question of physical endurance.

Mr. SHERMAN. I mean to let the Senate adjourn at a reasonable hour, of course; but I mean to antagonize this currency bill against any proposition of any character I can conceive of now. That is my purpose, and I hope the Senate will stand by me in it.

Mr. HOWE. I want to say that I will stand by the Senator from Ohio in the effort which he promises to make next week. I would have stood by him in such an effort three months ago. I am very glad that he has made up his mind not to press the adoption of this rule at this time, not because I care a fig about its future operation, but it looks to me like a reflection on the past, which I do not think is justified. I do not want the country to be instructed, I do not want the country to suspect, that the Senate of the United States has actually been wandering about in the mazes of an endless debate since the 1st of December. This debate has been prolonged, I think, not because of any exigencies which arose out of the difficulties of the question. This Senate, as prolific as it is of talk, could have been exhausted long ago if we had kept the subject before the Senate. I doubt myself if it was wise to have kept it before the Senate. I do not think the honorable Senator from Ohio has tried to keep it before the Senate. I do not think I should have done so if I had been in his place. I am sure I should not if I had been there and been as sensible as he is. Therefore, I do not think there is anything in our past experience which proves the necessity for adopting this extreme rule at this time. Let us commence with this new purpose next Monday; if after abiding by that a short time we find that the Senate cannot be exhausted, then I will agree to go with the Senator from Ohio in the effort to suffocate or stifle the Senate.

Mr. CRAGIN. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Ohio, the chairman of the Committee on Finance, if he can give us any assurance that after the Finance Committee shall have made their report this whole subject of debate will not again be launched upon the Senate.

Mr. SHERMAN. I cannot.

Mr. CRAGIN. Then I would simply suggest, if there are any of the speaking gentlemen here who have not made a third, fourth, fifth, or sixth speech upon this subject, that they would graciously content themselves to make those speeches after the committee shall have made its report, and let us not use up all next week with this preliminary debate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio now moves that Senate bill No. 432 be made the special order for Monday next at one o'clock.

The motion was agreed to.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1009) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes, the pending question being on the amendment of Mr. STEVENSON, to insert additional sections relative to the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims in regard to certain specified classes of claims.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. STEWART. I took the floor yesterday, when the Senate was about to adjourn and gave way to a motion for an executive session, thinking that I would make some remarks on the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. STEVENSON;] but the Committee on Appropriations are very anxious to go on with the bill——

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. If the Senator will be so graceful as to yield the floor, I wish to submit a motion. After all that has been said on this subject, in view of the fact that this amendment is a bill which is before one of the standing committees of this body, under careful examination at the present time, which may come to this body under such circumstances that the whole question involved in it may be discussed—I say, considering these facts, if the Senator would yield to enable me to move to lay the amendment on the table, I think he would do a very good thing.

Mr. STEWART. I take it for granted the question will be again before the Senate, and I have some decided notions about it which I wish to express.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I would not make the suggestion if I did not conceive that the Senator would have ample opportunity to discuss the principles involved.

Mr. STEWART. There are not resources in the country to stand the demands that would be made under this kind of legislation. But I will not enlarge at this time. I give way.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. For the considerations I have stated, I move that the amendment lie on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine moves that the amendment offered by the Senator from Kentucky be laid on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is one reserved amendment of the Committee on Appropriations on page 2, line 34, to strike out at the end of the provision for the pay of the Army the following proviso:

Provided further, That nothing herein shall be construed to allow more than ten cents a mile for such transportation.

Mr. SHERMAN. It was upon my request that that matter was laid over; but I am willing to accept any proposition from the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. WEST] that will guard the Treasury from paying more than ten cents a mile except in certain cases, which he defined and spoke of, in sparsely settled countries, where the actual cost of travel is more than ten cents a mile. I am afraid that if this proviso is stricken out there will be a constant effort made to increase the cost of traveling by officers. That is the natural tendency, of course, at all times. Sometimes officers pay more than ten cents a mile when there is no occasion for it. I think, therefore, there ought to be a general maximum limit beyond which they cannot go, unless in defined cases, where a greater sum ought to be allowed. If the Senator from Louisiana, being more familiar with military affairs than I am, will draw such an amendment as to make a maximum ordinarily, and then define certain special cases where the accounting officers may allow officers traveling in remote regions, where the bare cost of traveling is higher than ten cents, I will vote with him. But there ought to be some general maximum limit to regulate and govern all cases except the exceptional ones, which can be defined in proper language.

Mr. WEST. I think the suggestion of the Senator from Ohio would incumber this bill with too much detail in connection with this particular proposition. I think we have to trust something to the discretion and the judgment and the intelligence of the officers of the Treasury whose duty it is to audit the accounts of Army officers for travel.

Now, I will state once more exactly the process that an officer undergoes who is paid mileage or actual traveling expenses. He is obliged to produce his vouchers, or to certify on honor (which is the custom in the Army) that he has spent so much money for steamboat travel, or for railroad fare, or for stage fare; and upon that condition and on that statement his account is audited, and the money is reimbursed to him. I submit to the Senate that under recent legislation in regard to the mileage of Senators we had to state our actual traveling expenses, and we were paid just what we certified that we had disbursed to bring us here to the capital. Then it would have been unjust, for instance to the Senator from Oregon, traveling from the extreme West, to have confined him to ten cents a mile if his actual expenses had exceeded ten cents. I forget his distance, but I think it is thirty-five hundred miles; the Senator can inform us what is the distance he travels.

Mr. KELLY. Four thousand miles.

Mr. WEST. Very well; if in coming here he had spent $500, and we had limited his allowance to ten cents a mile, he would have been out of pocket $100. So with an Army officer coming from Oregon; if it costs him $500 to come to the capital under orders, as it might under certain circumstances, on coming here and satisfying the Department that it actually cost him that money, and that he could not come here for less, under the stipulation of the Senator from Ohio he would actually lose $100 out of his pocket.

It is not to be supposed that any particular extravagance is to be engaged in or incurred by these officers in making their travels. They must actually represent on their certificate on honor, and they are responsible for that certificate under their commissions, that they have spent so much money; and if an officer comes forward and says, "I have spent fifteen cents a mile," in the name of conscience why not give it to him? I do not think that we can perfect the bill in any way that will meet the views of the Senator from Ohio. I think the interests of the Government are guarded and the interests of the officers also protected by the clause as the Committee on Appropriations have left it.

Mr. HAMLIN. It would seem to me very unwise to strike this provision from the bill; but it occurs to me that there might be an amendment made to the bill as it already stands which would cover the precise point that was made by the Senator from Ohio. I do not believe myself that there are many cases, I doubt if there are any, where the actual necessary expenses of traveling will exceed ten cents a mile. But concede that there are; then let the language of the bill remain as it is, and add to it, "except in such cases as it shall be proved to the accounting officers that the actual necessary expenses exceed the rate of ten cents per mile." Then you have a limitation which will meet the case that the Senator from Louisiana would provide for. If there are cases where the actual necessary expenses exceed ten cents a mile, that language would cover precisely such cases. There is no use in disguising the matter. If you leave it unlimited and all open, you will not find two gentlemen who will travel over the same route with the same expense. One will be more expensive than another. There should therefore, in my judgment, be a limitation.

Besides, I think the maximum now fixed by law at ten cents a mile will about double the actual expenses over the inhabited portions of the country where railroad facilities exist. So, taking it as a whole, even if there were no qualifying words, there would be no wrong, no error in the language of the bill if it were to remain as it is. But I would put in these qualifying words; and it seems to me if there are cases where more than that sum should be allowed it could be allowed on the furnishing of the items where the expenses were necessary. I would have the word "necessary"—"where the necessary expenses exceed ten cents a mile."

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. This would be perhaps the view of my colleague. The clause now reads:

Provided further, That nothing herein shall be construed to allow more than ten cents a mile for such transportation.

Then add:

Except in cases where a greater sum has been paid for actual traveling expenses.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. "Actual and necessary."

Mr. HAMLIN. Yes; "actual and necessary."

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Perhaps that would cover it.

Mr. WEST. Then the motion will be to non-concur in the amendment of the committee first.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) The question is on agreeing to the amendment to strike out the proviso.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I wish to ask the chairman of the committee a question for information.

Mr. HAMLIN. The precise vote is first to amend, because the amendment of the committee is to strike out; and you can perfect the words to be stricken out before the question is taken on striking out. Then the question would recur on concurring, and that could be voted down.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I ask if the construction of this proviso would not allow to every officer ten cents a mile for travel? Under this proviso could not the auditing officers allow every officer ten cents a mile?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. If he actually paid that much.

Mr. WEST. That is covered by line 31, as the Senator from Delaware will see by examining the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question will be first on the amendment moved by the Senator from Maine [Mr. MORRILL] to the proviso.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations, to strike out the proviso as amended.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. WEST. On consultation with the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. WRIGHT,] and also with the chairman of the committee, I move, at the commencement of line 123, on page 6, to insert the following words: "or upon any other conditions for the use of such roads;" so that the clause, if amended, will read:

Was constructed by the aid of a grant of public land, on the condition that such railroad should be a public highway for the use of the Government of the United States, free from toll or other charge, or upon any other conditions for the use of such roads for such transportation.

By that means all the land-grant roads will be brought under the operation of that clause.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment moved by the Senator from Louisiana.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

Mr. MERRIMON. I desire to offer now the amendment which I indicated yesterday.

Mr. SARGENT. Let the question be first taken on the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands the Senator from North Carolina to desire to reserve the amendment on page 7, line 154. If there be no other amendment indicated for reservation, the question will be on concurring in the other amendments.

The amendments were concurred in, with the exception indicated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment indicated by the Senator from North Carolina will now be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, struck out in line 154 "50," and inserted "30," so as to make the clause read:

For preservation of clothing and equipage from moth and mildew, $30,000.

Mr. MERRIMON. Now, I move to amend the amendment by striking out "$30,000," and inserting "$5,000;" and by adding to the clause:

And the Secretary of War is hereby directed to sell such Army clothing and other Army supplies as are not required for the use of the Army; and the gross proceeds of such sales shall be paid into the Treasury.

Mr. WEST. Is that question divisible?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is. There are two propositions.

Mr. WEST. Then, unless the Senator should be induced by what I shall say to withdraw the latter part of his amendment, I shall call for a division of the question; and I would ask the attention of the Senator from North Carolina to the fact that the Army appropriation bill of last year provided for precisely the same thing as the latter portion of his amendment prescribes now.

Mr. MERRIMON. I propose to make some remarks in support of the proposed amendment, and intended to advert to that very point. The clause of the law to which the Senator refers does not embrace as much as the proposed amendment.

Mr. WEST. Very well. I of course will give the Senator an opportunity, but I propose now to divide the question and take the sense of the Senate on the latter part of the amendment first, which I am entitled to do under the rules.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The proposition may be divided; and then the first question is on striking out "30," and inserting "5."

Mr. MERRIMON. It is upon the whole amendment that I desire to submit some remarks.

Mr. President, by the bill under consideration it is intended to make an appropriation of a fraction over $27,500,000. This is a very large sum of money, and accustomed as the American people are to extravagant expenditures in the administration of their Government, they will desire to know how and why so much money is expended for the support of an army in time of peace which in the aggregate does not now exceed thirty thousand men. I am not much accustomed to the practice in this Chamber, and the methods of passing bills of this magnitude through this body. My experience is short; but I am profoundly impressed with and astonished at the hasty and inconsiderate manner in which a bill appropriating so much money, affecting directly the people, is passed through the Senate.

The report of the committee is based simply upon estimates. What data there are to support such estimates does not appear to the Senate; and, judging from what we have seen and heard, it seems to me the committee themselves are not well or satisfactorily informed as to those data.

I suggested the other day that I thought we were in too great a hurry about the passage of this bill. I thought we ought to take more time, and that the Senate ought to be better informed in regard to it. Nevertheless we hurried on, and from that time to this I have not had much opportunity to look into the many items of appropriation; but I have troubled myself to look into this, the item of appropriation which I propose to amend, and it seems to me there is no adequate necessity for the appropriation provided by it, or, if for any at all, that the sum of $5,000 is sufficient to answer every practical purpose.

At the close of the late war the Government had on hand quartermaster stores amounting to tens of millions of dollars in value. Why that was so I have not been able to ascertain, but the fact is nevertheless true; and although large amounts of those stores were sold soon after the close of the war, yet as late as the 30th of December, 1872, the Quartermaster-General reported that there were woolen clothing and tents alone on hand equal in value to the amount of $23,435,821.27. Parts of these vast amounts of quartermaster stores have been sold from time to time. In the years 1869, 1870, and 1871, at two depots, Jeffersonville and Philadelphia, of these stores were sold goods to the value of $1,450,028.49. But there yet remain on hand vast amounts of these quartermaster stores, consisting of Army clothing, and a variety of goods out of which to make Army clothing, hats, caps, tents, and an innumerable variety of things, all of which are still kept at the expense of the Government—kept at the expense of the Government for storage, for packing, for protection in various ways, from moth and thieves. The expense annually incurred to protect this clothing is enormous, as I shall be able to show the Senate presently. Why these goods are not disposed of I have not been able to learn; and I should like to be informed by the gentleman who has this bill in charge, when I get through with what I have to say.

Notwithstanding these vast amounts of clothing and other stores were on hand, a new uniform was recently devised for the Army, and this clothing, and goods to make the same, that the Government now has in its possession, costing so much, and costing so much more annually for its care and keeping, the Government now has no practical use for at all. The Quartermaster-General in his report makes this allusion to it:

To supply the Army with the necessary clothing and equipage during the coming fiscal year, it is estimated that an appropriation of $2,000,000 will be required. The large quantities of clothing rendered surplus by the adoption of the new uniform will be sold under the law of March 3, 1873, at public auction. The clothing on hand at the Philadelphia depot will be disposed of at auction on the 2d of October, (to-day,) and all the obsolete clothing in possession of officers at the various posts, garrisons, depots, &c., in the United States, will be disposed of in like manner as required by law.

The gross proceeds of these sales will be covered into the Treasury of the United States.

The large quantity of unserviceable clothing in store at the depot at Jeffersonville, Indiana, will, under the orders of the Secretary of War, be kept in store till next year, in order to avoid throwing on the market at this time more property than can be disposed of with advantage to the Government.

It is expected that more money will be realized from these sales than will be required to supply the Army with the necessary clothing during the coming year.

In another place he says:

The stock of blankets, stockings, and boots and shoes left on hand at the close of the war has become exhausted, or unserviceable from long storage.

At another place he says:

The expenditures on account of the moth and mildew proof process of George A. Cowles & Co. during the fiscal year have been $350,000. This includes $200,000 appropriated for the current fiscal year, but made available for expenditure during last fiscal year. To prepare such articles of woolen and cotton fabrics on hand as have not yet been submitted to the process, an additional sum of $100,000 has been asked in the estimate for the coming fiscal year.

The Secretary of War, referring to this subject in his report, says:

The sale of a large quantity of clothing stored at the Western or Jeffersonville depot, on the Ohio, is deferred until next season.

He says further on:

The sum of $350,000, appropriated for the purpose by Congress, has been expended in treating the woolen and cotton material in store according to the above process, in order to render it proof against moth and mildew. To complete its application to all material which will need it during the next fiscal year will require the sum of $100,000, for which an estimate has been submitted.

Now, to give the Senate some general idea of the vast amount of goods on hand to supply an army of thirty thousand men, I beg to call attention to a few items of articles mentioned in the Quartermaster-General's report, which answer no practical purpose in the world, and only serve to put the Government to the expense of tens of thousands of dollars from year to year until such goods are sold, and until indeed they shall be so rotten and worthless that they will bring no money.

On the 30th day of June, 1873, the Government had on hand among the quartermaster stores 390,199 Army caps; 325,041 forage-caps; 337,425 ostrich feathers; 268,025 uniform coats; 395,751 uniform jackets; 226,416 trousers for footmen, 104,904 for mounted men; 326,129 flannel coats, lined; 345,807 unlined; 370,445 flannel shirts; 731,391 flannel drawers; 117,269 great-coats for cavalry, 256,791 for infantry; 126,957 woolen blankets; 406,696 rubber blankets; 270,155 poncho covers. On the same day the Government had 1,107,525 yards of dark blue flannel, three-fourths of a yard wide; of striped blue kersey, six-quarters wide, 660,078¼ yards.

I cite these items from the report referred to for the purpose of giving the Senate a general idea of the vast amount of clothing that is now on hand, and which answers no legitimate or useful purpose in the world. A new uniform has been devised, and is now used by the Army, and these goods cannot be consumed by the Army at all.

Mr. WEST. The Senator is mistaken; it is only a few of the goods that cannot be used.

Mr. MERRIMON. The Senator can show, when I get through, that I am mistaken, and how and to what extent I am mistaken. I confess my information is not as definite as I could desire, but I get my information from official data. I go by the report of the Secretary of War and the report of the Quartermaster-General, and I take it, their reports are correct; they ought to have correct information, and I presume they are quite as correct as the Senator.

The point I wish to make is that this vast surplus of goods, amounting in value to millions and tens of millions of dollars, ought to be sold, and the Government rid of them, without reference to how they have been accumulated, whether rightfully or wrongfully; and, further, I desire to urge upon the Senate that Congress ought not to appropriate money to apply this anti-moth process when the goods ought to be sold as they answer no practical purpose at this time. It seems to me that there ought to be kept on hand and in storage a very small quantity of quartermaster supplies for the Army. If only a reasonable quantity to answer the current wants of the Army is kept on hand, then, if this process is necessary at all, a very small application of it will answer every practical purpose.

There is another thing about the matter that I do not understand. I have shown that $350,000 have already been expended for the purpose of applying this anti-moth process to these quartermaster stores; and when these stores have already had it applied to them, I cannot understand how it is necessary that this large amount should be appropriated in order to reapply it. I should like to have information upon that point, if the Senator can give it.

But there is another view of the matter that I wish to present, and in all seriousness. It is manifest to my mind that the estimates made for this purpose, as well as for many other purposes mentioned in the bill, and upon which Congress is acting so hastily and making such large appropriations, are based upon the merest conjecture in the world. According to the first estimate, made out by the proper officer, $100,000 were demanded for the purpose of applying this anti-moth process. On the assembling of Congress in December it was suggested that the estimates must be revised and cut down. Why, sir, according to law and the duty of the officer, he ought not to have made a greater estimate when he first made his estimate than was really necessary. Were $100,000 necessary then? When Congress directed a revisal of these estimates, with a stroke of the pen he cut down the estimates to $50,000, and no explanation is given why $50,000 will answer the purpose. When the Senate Committee on Appropriations came to consider this matter, without any additional information so far as the Senate can see or I can understand, they said that $50,000 was too much and $30,000 was enough, and they cut down the appropriation to that sum. I cannot see any data upon which these estimates were made except the merest conjecture, and I do insist that while we are making these large appropriations, the data upon which we act ought not to be purely conjectural. The Senate ought to know what it is about; and therefore it is that I have felt constrained, not in any spirit of captiousness but simply to subserve the public good, to offer the amendment cutting down this appropriation to $5,000, and also to offer the additional amendment, requiring the Secretary of War to have all this vast accumulation of goods sold, so that the Government may be rid of it before it rots upon its hands, and will be worthless after an expenditure not only of $350,000, but of tens of thousands of dollars more, to preserve and get ready for sale articles which nobody will want in the end.

The most of these goods are not to go to the Army, because we have a new uniform, and they will not answer Army purposes hereafter.

The Senator from Louisiana called my attention to the fact that the last Congress provided for the sale of this property. I submit to the Senator that he is mistaken in that respect. I looked to the clause of the act he cites, and it does not embrace anything but made-up goods. I will read the section to which he referred. It is in the appropriation act for the benefit of the Army, passed at the last session of Congress, and reads as follows:

For purchase and manufacture of clothing, camp and garrison equipage, and for preserving and repacking stock of clothing, camp and garrison equipage, and materials on hand at the Schuylkill arsenal and other depots, $1,523,508.81: Provided—

And this is the material part of the section—

That when the new uniform is distributed to the troops, the clothing of the old style no longer to be issued, incapable of alteration, shall be sold by the Secretary of War, at public auction, after due public notice by advertisement; and the gross proceeds of such sales shall be covered into the Treasury.

Mr. WEST. If I do not interrupt the Senator, I wish to ask him what he proposes to sell under his amendment?

Mr. MERRIMON. All the surplus quartermaster stores that the Secretary of War shall determine are unnecessary for the purposes of the Government. There is a vast accumulation of a great variety of quartermaster stores that the Government has no manner of use for, which are on hand and kept at great expense; and I insist they should be sold before they ask other vast sums that never can be realized for them.

Mr. WEST. Where does the Senator get his authority for that statement?

Mr. MERRIMON. I get it from the report of the Secretary of War and from the report of the Quartermaster-General.

Mr. WEST. Will he be kind enough to quote it?

Mr. MERRIMON. I have already done so.

Mr. WEST. I have not heard it. Be kind enough to show where the Secretary of War or the Quartermaster-General says that he has got surplus quartermaster stores. Does the Senator know the distinction between quartermaster stores and clothing?

Mr. MERRIMON. I understand Army clothing is a part of the quartermaster stores.

Mr. WEST. No, sir; they are very distinct. If the Senator had had a little military service he would know the distinction.

Mr. MERRIMON. I am not a military man, but I have always understood that whether clothing belongs to the Quartermaster Department or not, it is for the use of the Army, and the Quartermaster has charge of it.

Mr. WEST. Does the Senator ask that clothing be sold? Is that what he wants done?

Mr. MERRIMON. I want all surplus stores sold.

Mr. WEST. There is nothing but clothing. You want clothing sold, do you?

Mr. MERRIMON. Yes.

Mr. WEST. Very well; I will answer that proposition.

Mr. MERRIMON. I want that sold; and I want more than clothing sold. There are vast quantities of cloth not manufactured, and other articles in great supply on hand, as the report shows.

Mr. WEST. But they can use that cloth; manufacture it into clothing.

Mr. MERRIMON. I understand not.

Mr. WEST. Then you are not informed correctly, sir.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Senators will please address the Chair.

Mr. MERRIMON. Now, sir, we are about to make an appropriation of this sort:

For purchase and manufacture of clothing, camp and garrison equipage, and for preserving and repacking stock of clothing, camp and garrison equipage, and materials on hand at the Schuylkill arsenal and other depots, $1,450,000.

I want to read this clause from the report of the Quartermaster-General in the face of that large appropriation. The Quartermaster-General says, on page 154:

It is expected that more money will be realized from these sales—

That is, the sales of this clothing—

than will be required to supply the Army with the necessary clothing during the coming year.

I take it that means something, or it means nothing. I presume that it means something; and if these large sums are to be realized, as the Quartermaster-General says sufficient to buy clothing for the Army next year, why should we appropriate this $1,400,000 to buy new clothing for the current year? I cannot understand it, nor do I believe the people will understand it. I trust the proposed amendment will prevail, and thus save $25,000, which otherwise will be worse than thrown away.

Mr. WEST. That is about the longest speech requesting information that I have heard in this Senate. I think the Senate will bear in mind that it is customary, when a Senator rises to address the Senate, for him to have some information to impart to it.

Now I want to respond to the proposition made by the Senator just at the conclusion of his remarks. He says that if the Quartermaster's Department is going to sell $2,000,000 worth of clothing the coming year, why do they want any money to buy clothing with? Is that the gentleman's proposition?

Mr. MERRIMON. That was a mere suggestion.

Mr. WEST. Well, sir, if the Senator had looked at the law he would have found that when the Quartermaster-General sells a dollar's worth of clothing he must put the money in the Treasury; he cannot use it to buy more clothing with; and that is plainly declared by the very act to which I called the Senator's attention. There is nothing, let me say here, for the Quartermaster's Department to sell to-day but clothing; and the Senator asks why they do not sell it. That is a proposition which has been perplexing the Senate and perplexing Congress for a considerable time, and they have ascertained why it is not sold. It is because if you flood the market with this clothing the result will be—what? You offer it to the soldier in preference. Then you have sold it to the merchant for one dollar when the Government charges the soldier five dollars for it. The Government cannot afford to proceed on any such proposition. The Government is gradually effectually reducing the quantity of clothing on hand. But the Senator speaks of it as something extraordinary that we should have such an amount on hand. Sir, there were extraordinary emergencies that required the accumulation of such an amount of clothing, and the Senator very well knows it. This is clothing that we had on hand when we emerged from this rebellion that necessitated its use, and it has been gradually used and applied by the Army. The stock has been and is being gradually reduced.

The Senator asks, if $350,000 has been applied to the preservation of this clothing from moth, why do we want any more money for that purpose? We want more money for the moth process to apply it to the new clothing that is coming out. He has spoken of the change of uniform. Does he know what that is? Is he informed on that subject? It is a mere immaterial change of uniform; it is a mere change of the facings of the coat, and a change in the hat and in the cap.

Mr. MERRIMON. May I ask a question?

Mr. WEST. Certainly.

Mr. MERRIMON. If the new uniform is made out of the goods on hand, why do you want to buy more goods?

Mr. WEST. Because there are many sizes that are made. How is clothing for the Army made up? Of different sizes—ones, twoes, threes, fours, fives; and if you get out of the sizes of ones and twos, the most usually worn, of course you must supply them. I should like to see the Senator dressed in a No. 1 coat. It would not fit him. That is the reason. We must have a supply of the various sizes.

The Senator lays down the proposition that this clothing ought to be sold. We show him that we are selling it and putting the money in the Treasury. Now he asserts that $5,000 is enough to preserve $1,450,000 worth of clothing, &c., from damage by moth and mildew. I submit that it is not adequate. The proposition is to expend $30,000 for the purpose. The Quartermaster-General says he ought to have $50,000; but we, according to the information we have, say he must get along with $30,000.

Mr. MERRIMON. May I ask the Senator upon what the committee based their estimate? The Quartermaster-General said at first that $100,000 were necessary. He afterward said, when he was directed to reduce the estimates, that $50,000 were necessary. The committee then said that $30,000 would do. I should like to know upon what data these three several estimates were made, and why they came down first from $100,000 to $50,000, and then from $50,000 to $30,000.

Mr. WEST. We never ask a Department when it reduces its estimate why it cuts it down; we are glad to have it do that; and if they would reduce all their estimates 50 per cent., we should never ask them a question about it.

Mr. MERRIMON. Then I would ask why the committee cut down the estimate from $50,000 to $30,000?

Mr. WEST. Because they could not afford to give any more.

Mr. MERRIMON. I do not think we can afford to give more than $5,000.

Mr. WEST. Well, I will submit that to the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the first branch of the amendment to the amendment moved by the Senator from North Carolina, to reduce the appropriation from $30,000 to $5,000.

Mr. MERRIMON. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. NORWOOD. I desire to ask the Senator from Louisiana, as a matter of information for myself, how much has been expended for the preservation of this clothing against moth by Congress. I think there was an appropriation at one time of $300,000; whether it ever went into effect I am not informed.

Mr. WEST. I will reply to the Senator by reading from the report of the Quartermaster-General, on page 121, of which he is furnished with a copy:

The sum of $350,000, appropriated for the purpose by Congress, has been expended in treating the woolen and cotton material in store according to the above process, in order to render it proof against moth and mildew.

I do not say whether I have favored that idea or not, but it has been done by an appropriation by Congress, and has been used.

Mr. NORWOOD. One other question. When was this appropriation first made, and how many years have appropriations been made for that purpose? Can the Senator tell us how much has been expended annually in this way?

Mr. WEST. I have the data here. My recollection is that $150,000 was appropriated one year, and $200,000 the year preceding. It is now reduced, so as to apply simply to the new material that is coming out.

Mr. NORWOOD. I understand, then, that none of this money is to be applied to the old material still on hand. Is that correct?

Mr. WEST. I do not understand that this $30,000 can be applied to the old material.

Mr. DAVIS. As a member of the Committee on Appropriations I examined, as far as was possible, into the question of the necessity of an appropriation to preserve Army clothing from moth, and why so large a sum as was first proposed, $50,000, should be appropriated. I was disposed to say that nothing ought to be appropriated; but after a good deal of information obtained from the Department, and learning the amount of clothing on hand and seeing the actual necessity of preserving it, I agreed that $30,000, probably, was not too great a sum. I have in committee endeavored to reduce all appropriations to the lowest possible sum; but I think we cannot subserve true economy by departing from the recommendation of the committee in this respect. I say this much in explanation of the vote I shall give on this question.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 12, nays 29; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bogy, Cooper, Dennis, Goldthwaite, Hager, Johnston, Kelly, McCreery, Merrimon, Norwood, Ransom, and Saulsbury—12.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Boreman, Buckingham, Cameron, Carpenter, Chandler, Conover, Cragin, Davis, Ferry of Michigan, Flanagan, Frelinghuysen, Hamilton of Texas, Hamlin, Harvey, Ingalls, Logan, Mitchell, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Oglesby, Pease, Ramsey, Sargent, Sherman, Spencer, Wadleigh, West, and Wright—29.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Allison, Bayard, Boutwell, Brownlow, Clayton, Conkling, Dorsey, Edmunds, Fenton, Ferry of Connecticut, Gilbert, Gordon, Hamilton of Maryland, Hitchcock, Howe, Jones, Lewis, Morrill of Maine, Patterson, Pratt, Robertson, Schurz, Scott, Sprague, Stevenson, Stewart, Stockton, Thurman, Tipton, and Windom—31.

So the first branch of the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now recurs on the second branch of the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina to the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. MERRIMON. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. WEST. I merely rise to call the attention of the Senate, before they vote on this proposition, to the fact that it is almost word for word the statute for last year as it stands, with this exception, that the Senator proposes to sell quartermasters' supplies, and it is a very well-known fact, as I am apprised, that the only surplus material now on hand is the clothing; and there is a process, dating back, I think, to 1828, by which all unsalable property can be sold by the Quartermaster's Department, and this legislation is mere surplusage.

Mr. MERRIMON. I have already referred to sundry articles on hand, reported by the Quartermaster-General, which, if I have common sense, I know not to be articles of clothing for soldiers or anybody else.

Mr. CARPENTER. I shall vote against this amendment, simply because I understand it has been the law for several years.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 12, nays 28; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bogy, Cooper, Dennis, Goldthwaite, Johnston, Kelly, McCreery, Merrimon, Norwood, Ransom, Saulsbury, and Stockton—12.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Boreman, Buckingham, Carpenter, Chandler, Conover, Ferry of Michigan, Flanagan, Frelinghuysen, Hamilton of Texas, Hamlin, Harvey, Hitchcock, Ingalls, Logan, Mitchell, Morrill of Vermont, Oglesby, Pease, Pratt, Ramsey, Sargent, Sherman, Spencer, Stevenson, Wadleigh, West, and Wright—28.

ABSENT—Messrs. So the second branch of the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole in line 154.

The amendment was concurred in.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Texas. I move to strike out the proviso commencing on line 159, page 7. It is in the appropriation for the contingencies of the Army generally. It says:

Provided, That none of the money hereby appropriated shall be expended, directly or indirectly, for any use not strictly necessary for and directly connected with the military service of the Government.

I submit to the Senator from Louisiana that that is rather a reflection on the Department. This proviso is attached to the general appropriation for Army contingencies. If it was attached to an appropriation for any particular department of the Army, I think it would be proper enough. Money appropriated for the Quartermaster's Department, for example, should not be diverted to any other service; but this is for the entire Army. After all the other necessities thought of have been supplied, here is an appropriation for the Army gener ally, and it says in effect that the Secretary of War shall not misapply the money. I think it is proper to strike it out. Undoubtedly, if an officer should misapply any of this money, without the proviso, he would be liable to a court-martial if he belonged to the Army The proviso does not restrain a man if he is not honest enough to apply the money properly. This does not amount to anything really.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Texas moves an amendment, which will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is moved to amend the bill by striking out the following proviso, commencing on page 7, line 159:

Provided, That none of the money hereby appropriated shall be expended, directly or indirectly, for any use not strictly necessary for and directly connected with the military service of the Government.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I understand my honorable friend to make this motion on the ground that the proviso is an implied reflection on the War Department.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Texas. I so understand it.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I do not think it susceptible of that inference, and I am sure the Department will not understand it so. If the Senator will reflect a moment on the character of the service that this $100,000 for contingencies provides for, he will see the necessity of defining in some general way the objects of the expenditure.

We provide for the Army, for everything we can, for all the service that is practicable, specifically; and yet, the Senator knows that in a service extending all over this country, and particularly in remote portions of the country, in sparsely settled portions, contingencies arise which leave it very much to discretion as to this whole amount of $100,000. It is simply to meet contingencies. What are these contingencies? He will agree, I fancy, with the committee that the contingencies here contemplated are strictly of a military character; and yet, how easy it is to depart from that; how easy it would be to put a construction upon this bill in a great variety of instances, by which this contingent fund might be used for something not strictly military. I could give numerous instances which I do not care to refer to, where I think it has been done, without reflecting upon the Department in any way whatever, because this contingent expenditure is not always under the immediate eye of the Department; the money is often expended necessarily in remote portions of the country. This, therefore, is simply prescribing a rule within which the contingent fund shall be expended, namely, only for what are strictly military uses. I hardly think that is an imputation.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Texas. It looks to me precisely like making an appropriation, and placing it under the supervision and control of the Secretary of the Senate for the purposes of the Senate contingent expenses, and then adding a proviso that he should not buy fast horses and buggies with the money. It is precisely of that nature, because it implies that if this proviso is not attached to it, the Secretary of War will apply the money to some other purpose than the use of the Army. That is what it says in plain language.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. BOREMAN in the chair.) The question is on the amendment moved by the Senator from Texas, to strike out the proviso.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. LOGAN. On page 1, from line 10 to line 13 inclusive, I move to strike out these words:

And no money appropriated by this act shall be paid for recruiting the Army beyond the number of twenty-five thousand enlisted men, including Indian scouts.

I desire to call the attention of the Senate for a moment to this provision. It is like many other provisions that creep into bills where they ought not to be found. I do not think it is proper legislation to legislate on every appropriation bill for the increase or reduction of the Army, or for the organization of the Army. Let us look at this clause. It is, first:

For expenses of recruiting and transportation of recruits, $105,000,

I want to call the attention of the Senator who has charge of the bill and the chairman of the committee to this point. It is first proposed to appropriate $105,000 "for the expenses of recruiting and transportation of recruits."

And then you provide in the same paragraph or item, that—

No money appropriated by this act shall be paid for recruiting the Army beyond the number of twenty-five thousand enlisted men, including Indian scouts.

Let us examine that for a moment. The Army to-day consists, I believe, of about twenty-seven thousand men, other than officers. This prohibition prohibits entirely any further recruiting in the Army. If you prohibit any further recruiting in the Army, as you do by this clause, beyond twenty-five thousand, and the Army is now beyond twenty-five thousand, why provide that $105,000 shall be appropriated for recruiting and the expenses of recruiting? I ask some one to explain to me how it is possible that that can be consistent in this bill?

Mr. WEST. If it will not interrupt the Senator, I will answer.

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly, I will hear the Senator's explanation.

Mr. WEST. By the cessation of recruiting down to twenty-five thousand a number of men will be discharged. The Army may run down to twenty-three thousand by deaths, desertions, discharges, and otherwise. Then, when you are down to twenty-three thousand, you have to use some of this money to recruit back to twenty-five thousand. That is the answer.

Mr. LOGAN. I presumed that was the object. But we have now a little over twenty-seven thousand men in the line, and it is not presumable that there will be over two thousand desertions and deaths in the next fiscal year in so small an army as this, without any war going on. This $105,000 is appropriated upon the express—I will not say understanding, for there cannot be any such understanding—but on the contingency that there will be desertions and deaths to the amount of two thousand and upward in the Army in the next year among the private soldiers, not the officers. Therefore this $105,000 is appropriated, not to be used to extend the Army beyond twenty-five thousand men. That is the first objection I have to it.

There is a second objection. I know it has got to be so nowadays that if any Senator or Representative opposes a proposition that is looking in the line of economy, he is accused at once of trying to create expenditures to embarrass the Government. I do not think I am trying to embarrass the Government when I say to the Senate now that my judgment is that any attempt to reduce the number of the private soldiers in the Army to-day attended with, not directly but indirectly, a disorganization of the Army. Let us see what is accomplished by it. You do not reduce the number of companies in the Army; you do not reduce the number of regiments in the Army; you do not reduce the number of officers in the Army. But what do you do? You leave the frame-work of the Army standing just precisely as it is. You leave each regiment with the intention that the regiment may have, perhaps, eight hundred or a thousand men, but you will allow it to be reduced down until you have merely the frame of a regiment—the officers, the sergeants, the corporals, but no men. It is not the men in the Army that is the expensive portion of the Army; it is not the private soldier that creates the great expense of the Army by any means. That constitutes the merest trifle so far as expense is concerned. The expense of an army is in its transportation, its clothing, its supplies of ammunition, of ordnance stores, &c., and the pay of officers, and not the mere pittance that is paid to the private soldiers.

Sometimes we get an economical streak on ourselves; and what do we do? We make a grand raid upon some Department, and discharge about twenty-five clerks, and think we have performed a great feat in the line of economy. In about four weeks after you have done that, by some resolution introduced into Congress calling upon some of these Departments for reports or evidence in some particular case, you have with that a resolution authorizing that Department to employ temporary clerks for the purpose of doing this duty, and thereupon they all go back again, and sometimes double the number that was discharged. That is the line of economy that is sometimes pursued here in Congress.

Then, again, you find that there must be economy in the Army. How does it commence? It commences by providing that persons shall not be enlisted as private soldiers. That is no economy. You do not reduce the expense of the Army by stopping recruiting, except the mere pittance that is paid to the soldier; and I can demonstrate it. Suppose you have thirty regiments. These thirty regiments are organized; you have a complete organization. You undertake to transport these thirty regiments from here to the Pacific coast. You make your contract for the transportation of your regiment, for the camp and garrison equipage, for all the equipage necessary and pertaining to the Army. Your camp and garrison equipage and everything that pertains to the Army is not reduced because you prevent recruiting. This recruiting applies to each company in the Army. Five recruits might be necessary for one company, three recruits might be necessary for another company, ten recruits might be necessary for another company, and so on; but because these few men might be required to make up the quota in each company, they are not sufficient to reduce the expense of the camp and garrison equipage and transportation. Hence your Army would cost you just the same precisely that it does to-day, except the mere pittance, as I stated, that you pay to the private soldier for his monthly allowance.

In my judgment this is not economy; in my judgment this is anything but economy; and I will show you why. We reduce the number of private soldiers by this bill to twenty-five thousand men. You leave the frame-work standing for thirty thousand men. The very next year an appropriation bill for the Army comes forward; what will be the result? You have either got to reduce the frame-work of the Army down to the twenty-five thousand men, or else you have got to appropriate to fill up the frame-work of the Army to its completion. If you appropriate the next fiscal year to fill up the frame-work of the Army, you only appropriate then, in addition to this amount, that which you fail to appropriate now; and there is no economy in that. It is merely putting off a short time on credit; and it does strike me at least as commencing at the wrong end of this system.

I once, as chairman of the Military Committee in the other House, introduced a bill for the reduction of the Army; but how did I do it? How did we reduce the Army then? We reduced the Army then down to what we considered the minimum that we should have in this country, down to a certain number of regiments; and we examined it very carefully. I know I spent a great deal of time in the examination of that question, and we put it down to the very lowest point that we believed the United States could stand in its present condition with an Army. How did we do it? Sir, we reduced officers as well as private soldiers. We consolidated regiments; we consolidated companies; we mustered the supernumerary officers out of the service; and in that way we got rid of the expensive portion of the Army. But this is commencing at the other end; it is getting rid of the least expensive portion of the Army, and leaving the most expensive portion untouched. If this is economy, I do not understand it. I do not care what any gentleman may say to the contrary, it is only a matter of opinion among us; but I do not believe to-day that our Army is one man more than it ought to be. In fact, if it was left to me—my judgment, of course, is nothing more than the judgment of any other man—I would fill the frame-work of the Army as it stands to-day up to the maximum, instead of reducing it. In that way I would keep the Army in such a condition that the unnecessary expense which attaches to an Army when it is reduced down to a mere fragment, while preserving the expensive part of its organization, would not be incurred every year.

Now let me say to the Senator from Louisiana—and well he knows this fact—that if you reduce the number of men, leaving the officers as they are, the result will be this: If a company, or two companies, are stationed at a fort in the East, and you require more men on the plains for the purpose of protecting the border settlements, and you remove these companies from the East to the West, you remove the officers and their baggage, and the sergeants and corporals, and a diminished number of the rank and file; and while the cost of transportation will not be appreciably decreased you will have companies so depleted that they will be of no service when you get them to the place where service is required.

I do not believe that anywhere in the world except here is any attempt ever made to reduce the mere men of the Army, unless the whole Army altogether is reduced in conformity with the number fixed as the standard. Our Army is not too big, and I am very sorry to see this attempt made now for a reduction of the private soldiers of the Army so as to leave us a mere open frame-work without any filling up to it whatever.

The first objection, as I said, is because this is an attempt to legislate for the reduction of the Army on an appropriation bill, and no such legislation ever ought to make its appearance. An appropriation bill ought to be kept strictly, in my judgment, applicable to that which pertains to appropriations. Why is that so? The Appropriation Committee's duty, in my judgment, is to provide ways and means to carry out the laws that are enacted by Congress. They are to find the ways and means; that is, they are to discover and to examine into the question, and thereby ascertain the amount of money that is necessary for the running of the machinery of the Government for the next fiscal year. But this idea of tacking on appropriation bills general legislation every year, without any reference to any other part of Congress, in my judgment is very detrimental to wise legislation and a very bad precedent.

For these reasons I move to strike out these three lines providing for a reduction of the Army.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President, the Senator's objection to legislation of a general character on an appropriation bill would have been much better taken had it been made in season. It is his duty, as the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, to inform himself of every act of legislation of the co-ordinate branch of Congress that affects the branch of service under his cognizance. He knew that this bill was here. It has been on our tables for six weeks. He knew that this proposition was in it; and he comes forward at the last moment, and objects to it now, when, if his motion was acceded to by the Senate, it would involve the recommittal of the bill and the expenditure of $3,000,000 more money.

Why does he talk about the frame-work of the Army? What is the proposition? It is to reduce the rank and file five thousand men, and thereby do—what? Anything in the way of entailing increased expense? He says we are to have then one hundred and fifty officers, or at the rate of three to every one hundred surplus, provided that every officer of the Army is in good health. That is all the surplus we have. Does the Senator want the Senate to believe that twenty-five thousand men are going to cost as much as thirty thousand men, and that this is no economy; that twenty-five thousand men will want as much subsistence, will want as much clothing, will want as much transportation, as thirty thousand? If he will examine the bill itself, he will find that in every one of these instances we have curtailed the appropriation. Here is the saving in this bill; here is where we have reduced four millions from the amount we appropriated last year. That is the saving, and that is the economy which is practiced in this case.

He says that it is preposterous to suppose that two thousand men will be required to be recruited into the Army of the United States next year. Does he know that ten thousand were recruited last year? Look at the report that lies on his table from the Adjutant-General, showing that nearly ten thousand men were recruited into the Army, of the United States last year; and if we reduce it one-sixth we may expect to recruit two or three thousand next year. Death, desertion, and discharge deplete the Army constantly; more particularly desertion. Here is the report on my table of the Adjutant-General's action, in which he shows that he recruited 9,981 men last year.

The Senator tells us that there will be no saving, when it is palpable before him here that we have made a saving, that we appropriated for this same service last year $31,796,000, and that by virtue of this reduction, made by the House of Representatives and ourselves, the present bill is $27,773,000, or $4,000,000 less than it was last year.

Now, speaking of the reduction, let us look at its effect. It is not a reduction of the Army; it is a reduction of the amount appropriated to the War Department to recruit men with. It operates a reduction of the Army, to be sure, but it is a reduction rendered necessary; it is a shrinkage of the rank and file of the Army according to the pecuniary resources that we have at our command.

He speaks of the number of men in the Army. What was it at the date of the Secretary's last report? Twenty-five thousand and seventy-three men; that was all the Secretary of War had at the date of his last report. How were they disposed of? Fifteen thousand eight hundred and eighty-eight of them in the Indian country; 2,230 at the forts on the sea-board and the lakes; 3,964 principally in Texas; and 2,991 in other States independent of Texas. Is not that protection enough? With twenty-five thousand men before, we have preserved the peace in this country; we have maintained our borders to a certain extent, and to a very efficient extent, against incursions by the Indians. There are the twenty-five thousand men disposed of last year. We only say to the Secretary of War "We do not want to increase the number next year; keep it down to this." That is the proposition; and I ask the Senate's earnest consideration to the amendment of the Senator from Illinois, with the assurance that if it carries, this bill must be recommitted to the Committee on Appropriations, and it must come back for your consideration with an increase of $3,000,000. That virtually will be the result. The Army was only twenty-five thousand last year. We say "Keep it there; do not increase it;" and by that means you can save $3,000,000 or $4,000,000.

Mr. LOGAN. I certainly did not expect to arouse the Senator from Louisiana to the extent that I have. He appeals to the Senate to know what I have been doing for the last five or six weeks, or whatever number of weeks it was, and says that I had not paid attention to this bill. Why, sir, this matter has been before no committee that I am on. I hope the Senator will not make such allusions as though I had not been doing my duty because I have not noticed what bills the Committee on Appropriations have before them. I noticed this clause in this bill. I saw it in the bill; and I intended to make the motion that I have made. That was all I could do. I am not on the Committee on Appropriations; I have nothing to do with their work. I have intended all the time to make this motion when I should have a chance to do so, for the very reasons that I have given to the Senate.

We are told that this will reduce the expenses $3,000,000. I did not say that this reduction would not reduce the expenses. I said no such thing; but I said it was commencing at that which did make the expense least, that is, with the private soldier; and that the economy of this bill was striking at that which was least expensive. That is what I said, and I say so still. I ask the Senator now to explain to me, what are you going to do with the surplus officers you leave? They are more expensive than the private soldiers. Do you propose to strike the private soldier out, and leave the frame-work of the Army stand without filling in? That is the objection I have to it.

Mr. WEST. We should have only one hundred and fifty extra officers, provided every officer in the Army is well and capable of doing his duty.

Mr. LOGAN. What do you propose to do with them?

Mr. WEST. We can detail some of them for the Pay Department.

Mr. LOGAN. We only want six there. What will you do with the rest? This only shows, when the Senator comes to state the facts, that this proposition is, what I said it was, commencing at the wrong end. You will have one hundred and fifty officers that you have no use for, and you prevent the recruiting of a few men whose pay is thirteen dollars a month. You leave officers who cost each, perhaps, as much as ten or twenty men in the Army. Now I do not want to strike at either. I do not want to strike out the officers. I do not think our Army is any too large. I would fill it up. I say this kind of economy is no economy at all, because the very next year you will agree to fill the Army up when this crisis has passed, and then you will appropriate the very amount of money that the Senator now speaks of to fill up with recruits that you now prohibit being put into the Army. You will find the Secretary of War at the very next session telling you that the frame-work of the Army has run down until he has many supernumerary and superfluous officers, and he must have men to fill up the Army.

Mr. CARPENTER. Mr. President, I do not propose to discuss the policy of reducing the Army. I am not on the Committee on Military Affairs, and I am no soldier to speak of. But I shall vote for this amendment for this reason: the most vicious kind of legislation, we all know, is that of ingrafting general provisions into an appropriation bill. I have been here now about five years, and I have never known a single session to pass in which I have not heard all the older Senators regret it, deplore it, condemn it; and yet it has been forced upon us at every session since I have been here, from the fact that the appropriation bills have passed at the heel of the session when everything was in a whirl, when there was no time for reconsideration by the Committee on Appropriations; and the evil confessed by everybody has been submitted to for that reason alone. Now, fortunately, (and for one I desire to thank the Committee on Appropriations for it,) this bill and another have been presented here early in the session. There is ample time now to set our face against this species of legislation, or to give it a complete indorsement and open it to the fullest extent hereafter. There is no more propriety in reorganizing the Army in an appropriation bill than there is the Navy; no more than there is in reorganizing the judicial system of the United States in an appropriation bill. It is well known to men familiar with the subject that our present judicial system has become entirely deficient and incapable of discharging the duties which the Government owes to suitors, and that we must have some enlargement of it, and some provision made for appeals. It would be just as appropriate for the Committee on the Judiciary to come in here with the bills before them, or bills which might properly be sent to that committee, and seek to ingraft them as amendments on this appropriation bill, as it is to put here the provision that is now in the bill for reducing the Army.

Now we have an opportunity to say here on this question whether we will countenance this legislation or whether we will disapprove it. This bill can go back to the Committee on Appropriations, and if it requires any revision it can be revised in twenty-four hours and can be brought back here and passed. And now let us either say that we will discountenance this kind of legislation, or let us have no more of this hypocrisy that I have listened to ever since I came here, that we are all opposed to any legislation in an appropriation bill except simply to appropriate money for purposes provided for by existing law.

It seems to me that that should be done. There is not a lawyer in the country who has been called upon to practice in the Federal courts who does not know that the most vicious provisions, the most ill-considered, the most improvident provisions of law, have been hurried into appropriation bills. Only a few years ago an appropriation bill contained a provision about witnesses testifying in the judicial courts, having no more relation to the appropriation bill than anything that you can conceive of.

Our Appropriation Committee is an eminently well qualified committee for the purposes for which it was created; but we have for the purposes which this part of the bill contemplates another committee organized and the members selected with reference to their fitness upon that subject, and I believe that committee is honored by the presence of the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. LOGAN. Not now.

Mr. CARPENTER. However that may be, the Committee on Military Affairs is entirely competent to discuss this matter, and to prepare any bill that is necessary to be prepared on the subject, and to that committee the matter should be left. If this Appropriation Committee is to usurp the province of the Committee on Military Affairs, is to reorganize the Army, let us go through and reorganize the courts. This is as good a place to do that as it is to do this thing; and the necessity for doing it is much greater than the necessity for reducing the Army. The mere fact that $3,000,000 is to be saved by not appropriating it proves nothing. If that is a good thing, without reference to its consequences, it would be a better thing to reduce it $5,000,000, better still to reduce it $10,000,000. If there is any merit whatever in the mere fact that you appropriate $3,000,000 less than you did last year, why do you not make it $10,000,000 less than last year? The answer would be that that cannot be done with proper regard to the service. The question comes back, whether this reduction has a proper regard to the service.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. That is the point.

Mr. CARPENTER. That question, I submit to my honorable friend, should be considered by the Committee on Military Affairs. Now, to my honorable friend from Maine, on a question of appropriation, I should yield implicit assent. If he proposed to open the Treasury to take out five, ten, fifteen, or twenty millions, I should follow him with the meekness of a disciple; but on a question of reducing the Army or increasing it, I would trust my friend from Illinois five times where I would him once. That is the theory on which our committees are organized. They are organized with reference to their fitness to discharge the duties assigned them; and I say that this reorganization of the Army is no duty that belongs to the Appropriation Committee.

Mr. WEST. Do you call this a reorganization of the Army?

Mr. CARPENTER. Certainly.

Mr. WEST. The organization affects the officers.

Mr. CARPENTER. I am learning tactics. I supposed that when the Army is changed in its basis, its number increased or diminished, that Army is reorganized. According to the Senator, if the entire line was abolished, and all the officers retained, that would not be a reorganization of the Army; but it would be an ill-organized army, according to my idea of what an army should be; but I will yield even that to my honorable friend from Louisiana, who is a soldier and an appropriating committee. [Laughter.]

Mr. WEST. I ask the Senator if he goes into action with one hundred men, and loses thirty in the fight, whether his force would then be reorganized or reduced?

Mr. LOGAN. It would be rather disorganized. I can tell the gentleman that. [Laughter.]

Mr. WEST. That is a different question.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Mr. President, the Senator from Illinois raises the question of the impropriety of considering the reduction of the Army on an appropriation bill. I think that is a very apposite remark to say the least of it. And the Senator from Wisconsin deprecates all general legislation upon an appropriation bill. I think that opinion is sound. I have always been very strenuously opposed to that; I think it is vicious in principle. But it turns out that in this particular case neither of those two things is attempted; and that, both gentlemen will allow me to say, is the infirmity of their statements.

This is an appropriation for the Army, for the military service of the country. Well, what do we find the military service of the country to have been the last fiscal year? We appropriated for thirty thousand men last year. We find that we paid only twenty-five thousand; that the military service, as a matter of fact, was only twenty-five thousand. Why, then, do we want to appropriate for thirty thousand this year? Unless we intend to make extra efforts to fill up the Army to thirty thousand, clearly we need not appropriate for more than twenty-five thousand.

Mr. LOGAN. Allow me to ask the Senator a question. This restriction prohibits the increase of a man above twenty-five thousand.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Certainly.

Mr. LOGAN. Therefore, it stops recruiting. Now, suppose it read, allowing it to be entirely proper, in this way: "for expenses of recruiting and transportation of recruits, $105,000," and stop right there; would there be any impropriety in that?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I do not see any.

Mr. LOGAN. Then you do not restrict the recruiting at all, except by the sum you appropriate; but you are restricting it by law here. This idea of restricting the Army in an appropriation bill, when it can be done just as well in another way, is something that I cannot agree to, upon principle or upon the question of right.

I will make another suggestion to the Senator so that he may respond to it. In my view, I do not desire the Secretary of War to increase the Army to thirty thousand men, or to recruit it up to thirty thousand men; it may not be necessary; but I do desire him to fill up the Army so as to keep it from being depleted, and to get the number of recruits that is absolutely necessary to keep up the organization to its proper standard, not, perhaps, to the maximum, but to the proper standard. That is the object I have.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The point on which I desire to address the Senate is this: that the Committee on Appropriations, having appropriated for twenty-five thousand men, appropriated for what they found the service to have actually been last year. With a law authorizing thirty thousand men, practically there were but twenty-five thousand in the service. Reasoning from that, it was believed that, with the demands of the service not greater this year than last year, twenty-five thousand men were all that would be necessary. Does my honorable friend mean to say that the demands of the service are greater than they were last year? Does he mean to say, from his own information and judgment, that he believes the same number of troops which answered the service last year will not answer this?

Mr. LOGAN. I will answer the Senator in this way, if he will allow me: If the Government of the United States does not require an Army beyond twenty-five thousand men, if you undertake to legislate on that basis, in God's name reduce it to twenty-five thousand, officers and all. Just cut it down, and I have nothing to say, if you think that proper. I object to the manner in which it is done. If you think there are but twenty-five thousand men necessary, cut your officers off with the men; but do not keep the frame-work of the Army, that is the most expensive, and not fill it up.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. It is not the duty of an appropriating committee to appropriate for a service beyond its actual demands, beyond the service that practically exists. Now, as a matter of fact, it was found that twenty-five thousand men was all the force you had last year, and it was believed by the other branch of Congress, evidently, that that is all the service needs. Now I take occasion to say that, acting upon what would have been the suggestion, doubtless, of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, the Committee on Appropriations, before they sanctioned this provision, put themselves in communication both with the General of the Army and with the Secretary of War, as to whether an appropriation of this kind would answer the demands of the service, and had their assent to the proposition.

Mr. LOGAN. Will the Senator allow me a word right there?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Certainly.

Mr. LOGAN. Doubtless the committee had their assent to it; and I could give the reason for that. The Secretary of War and the General of the Army are not going to get into a collision with the Appropriation Committee or with Congress. I will not say what their opinions may be, for I do not know; but if the chairman of the committee, as a private individual, will ask the Secretary of War whether he thinks this is a proper mode of managing the Army, I pledge you my honor that he will tell him no; that he requires more recruits to keep it up.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. If my honorable friend says he told him so I will believe it.

Mr. LOGAN. I am not saying what he told me; I only say that the mere fact of the General of the Army and the Secretary of War consenting to this does not prove what their opinions are by any means as to its propriety.

Mr. WEST. They made no objection.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. No objection comes from the Committee on Military Affairs, or from either of these heads of Departments, that I am aware of.

Mr. SARGENT. My recollection is that before the House committee—when this matter was under consideration—the General of the Army, the Adjutant-General, and several others, represented that this was destructive to the Army. That is my recollection. I know General Sheridan did so.

Mr. WEST. The Senator does not exactly state the fact correctly. The Committee on Military Affairs in the House were entertaining the reduction of the organization of the Army when those gentlemen appeared, and they objected to the reduction of the organization.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Now about the sufficiency of this service. It is evident enough on what basis the Committee on Appropriations in the House acted; and that was that twenty-five thousand men were found adequate last year, and twenty-five thousand would be this year. That was the idea precisely. My friend from Illinois says to us, "You ought not to judge of it; we (speaking of his committee) ought to judge of it." I would be most thankful if my honorable friend would advise us whether that is enough or not.

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator is very much mistaken. I did not say he ought not to judge of it.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Well, not in this way; the Appropriation Committee should not undertake to appropriate without having the service changed. My answer to that is that the service is changed practically. We appropriate for the practical demands of the service as they were last year, and what are believed to be the demands of the service this year. Does anybody assert that troops are wanted, or are likely to be wanted, in the South as they have been heretofore? Nobody expects it; nobody believes it. Where are they wanted? On the frontiers chiefly. Well, sir, to-day, if five thousand additional troops were wanted on the frontiers, they might be had from the harbor of New York and other easy and soft places about here, to the very great advantage of that community, in my judgment.

Mr. LOGAN. We have nothing but officers in the harbor of New York.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. You have a thousand men in the harbor of New York to-day.

Mr. SARGENT. Then the Senator is better informed than the reports of the Adjutant-General.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. If my friend will look at the debates in the House of Representatives on this very subject he will see that that fact was stated as gathered from the reports, and that five thousand men might be taken from the interior and transported elsewhere.

I hardly think that anybody will claim that the demands of the service are likely to be greater than twenty-five thousand men. I agree with my honorable friend from Illinois that it would not be a good thing to undertake to organize the Army through an appropriation committee. But that is not the question. The real question is, whether the appropriation committee have not a right to look at such a fact as was reported to them from the service last year, and as comes to us this year from the military departments of the Government, and say that, practically, the demands of the service being so and so, we make the appropriations accordingly. That is all there is of this question. Whether as a matter of fact the Army should be put at twenty-five thousand men is a question I would not undertake to judge of; but that is not this question. This appropriation means that as to this year we make an appropriation only sufficient to keep the Army at twenty-five thousand men, and the money shall not be used beyond that point. The whole question is open next year to any legislation which my honorable friend from Illinois, the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, may think it wise to propose.

Mr. LOGAN. So far as the Military Committee is concerned, I did not desire to get into a controversy about the duties of these committees, nor do I now; but when suggestions are made that the Military Committee or any other committee might take charge of a matter of this kind and examine into it, I will only say in reply that while I am chairman of the Military Committee I will never examine with a view to reporting a bill for the reduction of the Army when I do not believe a reduction of the Army ought to be made. Hence it is not necessary to report any such bill from the Military Committee with the views I entertain, unless the committee should differ with me, because I do not believe the Army is too large.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Allow me to ask whether the Senator believes now that the demands of the service require that the Army should be filled up to the full quota of thirty thousand men?

Mr. LOGAN. I will answer that by saying that there never has been an army in existence since the world began that was full up to the quota. That is an impossibility. You make the frame-work of an army, and you may fill it to-day, and to-morrow it will be depleted. That is the natural course of things connected with an army. I say the frame-work of an army of thirty thousand, in my judgment, is none too large for this country, and it ought to be kept as near to the quota as possible. Why?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Are twenty-five thousand men enough?

Mr. LOGAN. I do not think they are, for a good organization. The Senator seems to have misunderstood me. When I am speaking of the Army in this connection, I speak of the Army as an army efficient for service; and there is no man who ever had experience in an army who does not know that it is necessary to keep an army as near the maximum as possible to make it efficient. I will give the Senator an illustration. You appoint a man captain of a company. He has one hundred men; it is a beautiful, splendid company, of good men. Through disease, desertion, and the casualties of battle, his company runs down to about forty men. The captain pays no more attention to it, and it goes into the charge of a lieutenant. So it is with a regiment; so it is with every arm of the service; whenever you deplete a man's command until it is not of sufficient strength and magnitude to cause him to give it his entire attention, it is neglected. The army therefore becomes disorganized, so far as its drill and esprit de corps are concerned. That is the natural result always in an army; and for that reason I say that there ought to be no restriction on getting men to fill up the Army unless you restrict the frame-work of the Army. Now, if you will reduce the frame-work of the Army to twenty-five thousand, if your judgment is that the Army ought to be no more than that, you will have done justice to the whole Army; but by reducing the men of the Army, and prohibiting them from going beyond a certain standard of number, you do affect the efficiency of the whole Army; and there is no officer in the United States Army to-day who knows his duty but what will tell you so if you ask him. I know that is the fact from experience; and for that reason I have a pride in maintaining the efficiency of the Army; not because I am chairman of the Military Committee, but because I think I know something about military affairs—not so much as other men, but some little at least. I have a pride in whatever Army we may have, whether small or great, that it shall be efficient. I want to see the service effective; and I know from experience you cannot make it effective as long as you continue to deplete it by depleting its organization. When I say "organization," I do not mean what the Senator from Louisiana means. It applies to the whole machinery of the Army; everything in connection with it is part of its organization. It takes all of it together to make the whole. This is a depletion—a disorganization of the Army to that extent; and for this reason I do think that to strike these lines out would promote the efficiency of the Army. I do think it would be better, because then you have no legal restriction upon filling up the ranks of the Army.

Let me put a case to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations. Suppose, in depleting this Army to twenty-five thousand, the desertions happen to be from some particular command, some particular regiment, until that regiment becomes almost entirely exhausted. Then you cannot recruit any more; and what do you do with that regiment? You leave it there, like the skeleton of an animal, without anything but the skeleton of an organization.

Mr. WEST. Does not the Senator know that men can be transferred from regiment to regiment?

Mr. LOGAN. Yes, sir; certainly. I know that; but does not the Senator from Louisiana know that when you transfer from one depleted regiment to another you benefit neither, but injure both?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Allow me to ask one question.

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. How does the Senator account for the fact that, the law standing authorizing thirty thousand, it yet happened that during the last year we had but twenty-five thousand?

Mr. LOGAN. I can tell the Senator exactly how it happened. A great portion of our Army is stationed in the Indian country and in the mining regions; and there are so many inducements for desertions that we have had more desertions in the Army the past few years than we ever had before.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. So that, with an authorized Army of thirty thousand, it is only practicable to maintain really twenty-five thousand.

Mr. LOGAN. It was found that they could not maintain more than the actual number we had with the amount authorized to be appropriated for the purpose of recruiting. If this appropriation is made, and they do not maintain more than that, they cannot help it, but they ought not to be debarred from doing it if they can do it. I will say further to the Senator that if this appropriation is made in this way, and the evidence is that while the frame-work is thirty thousand you can keep but twenty-five thousand men, and Congress will not appropriate money enough to fill up the frame-work of the Army, then I shall take it as an instruction from the Congress of the United States to the committee that I am chairman of to provide for an army of that number, and then we will see where the balance of the Army goes.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Mr. President, I do not intend to procrastinate this debate at all. It is apparent, as a practical question, that the committee has appropriated for the demands of the service as it stands. My honorable friend from Illinois has stated a fact which I have no doubt is true of the service generally, that, with a nominal force by law of thirty thousand men, it is only practicable to keep about twenty-five thousand men in the field. Therefore the limitation here would not affect the real condition of the Army upon that assumption.

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator is mistaken about practically not keeping more than twenty-five thousand men. I say itis not practicable to keep the Army at the maximum; that it is an impossibility.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. But my honorable friend accounted for the fact of its being at twenty-five thousand men by its having been put higher and falling down to that point.

Mr. LOGAN. That is true; I stated the fact.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Assuming that, then it turns upon this practical question alone, whether this sum is sufficient to meet the actual demands of the service. That is all there is of it.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Texas. Mr. President, I concur with the Senator from Illinois and the Senator from Wisconsin in every word they have said on this subject. But there is another reason, not mentioned by either of those Senators, why this amendment should be adopted and the proviso stricken out. I will answer the question put by the Senator from Maine in regard to the sufficiency of the Army for the work it has to do. I do not think that the Army is of sufficient strength to-day to protect the frontiers of this country. Day after day and week after week we have reports of depredations coming from every portion of the frontier pretty nearly, all through Arizona and portions of California, Idaho, and Texas. In every quarter almost where there are any Indians at all there are more or less depredations committed. There has scarcely been a moon within the last seven years, on the frontiers in my State, that the people have not been depredated upon by Indians; it is almost an every-day occurrence on the frontier.

I do not complain of the Army. I think the Secretary of War and the commanding General of the Army have done all that they could do to protect the frontier; but the Army is insufficient, and I shall take occasion some of these days to call the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs to the question of the reorganization of the Army. We have twenty-five regiments of infantry; and I have been unable to ascertain upon what those men have been employed, or what they can do. Almost the only service that we require in this country now is mounted infantry or cavalry. An infantry regiment on foot cannot do any duty on the frontier except to keep camp. Our coast defenses have been occupied by artillery in the main. The infantry are quartered around, I do not know where. A great many of them are on the plains; and they keep camp on the frontier while the cavalry do the scouting. If the infantry was cut down to fifteen regiments, and the cavalry raised to fifteen regiments, the Army would be of better service, for the wants of my State at least, than it is to-day.

I wish to make a suggestion to the Senator from Maine in regard to the maximum of the Army as proposed in this appropriation bill. He thinks it should be put at twenty-five thousand men; but inasmuch as when the maximum was thirty thousand men it could only be kept practically at twenty-five thousand, it must follow that if we should make it twenty-five thousand we shall not keep it really above twenty thousand. Surely it will fall below twenty-five thousand men. As the Senator from Illinois remarked, we cannot keep the Army at the maximum; we are losing men every day.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. If my honorable friend will observe the language of the provision he will see that it makes no such limitation to twenty-five thousand men. It is that recruiting shall not go on beyond that point.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Texas. That makes a limit. We had a limit last year and we fell five thousand below that limit it seems. Now, I say that we shall probably fall as much below this year. If you say we shall not go beyond twenty-five thousand men, then I think it is likely we shall not have above twenty thousand effective men in the service. If we have forty regiments in service we shall have twenty thousand men in the field in actual service, fifty men to a company only. It is a mere skeleton, and the companies are inefficient; they cannot half do the duty that is required of them.

There has been a bill pending in the other House which I have been expecting to come here, providing for the reorganization of the Army. I expected to make some remarks upon that bill, because the people of my section of country have been bearing very patiently the calamities which have fallen upon them in the last seven or eight years. They have complained very little, but they are now about putting two thousand men in State service. I do not know whether the Government here will permit it or not, but the necessities of that people require them to do something; they are simply bleeding at every pore, and they are determined to protect themselves if they can do so, for the Government of the United States will not protect them, or has not done so up to this time.

Now, Mr. President, looking at the appropriation proposed for the civil service of the Government, for forty other schemes or propositions of one kind and another, it seems strange that when a bill comes here for the support of the Army, which is a meager support, and when it is a meager army for this great country, when it is too small, it is proposed to cut it down one-fifth. As the Senator from Illinois remarked, you may keep your forty skeleton regiments in service, but they do not amount to more than twenty effective regiments would amount to, whereas the expense is double; for I agree with him perfectly in regard to the expense. I say the amount you reduce is infinitesimal by cutting off five thousand men. The bulk of the expense is in the frame-work, the transportation, the officers, the equipping, and a thousand and one things that burden your regiments. These skeleton regiments will cost within a fraction as much money as full regiments, whether on the march or stationed, or wherever they may be. I do not think we shall save anything worth talking about by cutting off these five thousand men, when there are sections of the country that are not protected.

Mr. WEST. Which sections?

Mr. HAMILTON, of Texas. Arizona particularly. Possibly you will need these troops in other sections of the country worse than you do just now, but there the necessity is abiding; it has been there all the time; it is there to-day; and I do not look for any cessation of hostilities there until the Indians are confined on their reservations, or killed out. I hope the amendment will be adopted, and the clause stricken out.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President, the Senator who has just addressed the Senate assumes that the Army of the United States is not sufficient for the defense of the country. We have heard nothing of that kind from the President of the United States; we have heard nothing of that kind from the Secretary of War, or from the General of the Army. On the contrary, all their communications to us lead us to the conclusion that the number of men at their disposal during the past year has been adequate for the maintenance of the public tranquillity and for the protection of our Indian frontier.

The Senator says that it is to be taken for granted that when we authorize the enlistment of thirty thousand men we can only get twenty-five thousand; that we cannot get any more. That is not the case. There was not such an immediate necessity for those men as to stimulate the War Department to recruiting up to the full number. Now there will be. But virtually the result of this action by Congress will be to drive the non-combatants into the field, and that is the object of it. Take the report of the General of the Army. He tells us of four thousand men stationed, God knows where, and those are the men that we want to get at.

The Senator says that his State is not protected. He has one-sixth of the Army of the United States now on service in the State of Texas. Perhaps it is not as much as he would like to have; but, considering our pecuniary condition, can we with any propriety go on and increase these expenses? Let the Senator consider for a moment this suggestion in reference to the expenditures. Can we do anything as a body in the way of originating increased revenue? Have we not already intimations enough from the other end of the Capitol to lead us to conclude that we must get along with the amount of revenue already provided, and that we can look for no increase from that quarter? Consequently, as one co-ordinate branch of the Government, we are obliged to stand on the defensive in the way of curtailing our expenses.

When Senators tell us that there is no reduction in the expense of the Army when we reduce it five thousand men, certainly they do not tell us what is the fact, because what is the evidence of it in this bill? If they had studied it, they would see it. The amount estimated for by the War Department for the pay of the Army was $12,300,000. That is at thirty thousand men. We appropriate $11,400,000, and there is a saving right off in that one item of $900,000. I think $900,000 is some saving. Then, take the item of subsistence. They asked for $2,852,000 for the subsistence of thirty thousand men. We give them $2,419,000. There is a saving of $433,000, which, with the $900,000 that I have mentioned, makes $1,333,000. A million and a third saved in the mere matter of the pay and subsistence of five thousand men is no small matter. And so I could go on all through this bill; and I think it is a little thing for gentlemen to get up here and say that, when we have reduced our expenditures three millions in consequence of this reduction of five thousand men, it is no saving. For my part, it is palpable to me that by this proposition we clearly save $4,000,000; that is to say, we reduce the Army expenditures this year to $4,000,000 less than they were last.

Now, we know that it is customary, in speaking of the cost of the service in this country, to estimate $1,000 for every man in the service. That is what it costs, officers and all. At thirty thousand men you have $30,000,000, as we had last year. At twenty-five thousand men we have $27,000,000, because the reduction is not proportionate; but it is that reduction that is compelled by the circumstances which I have stated, that we must at this end of the Capitol save the money, for the other end will not give it to us.

If any Senator can controvert the proposition I have made, that in the expense of pay and subsistence we save $1,333,000, and in other instances up to the amount of $4,000,000, from what was appropriated last year, I will cheerfully vote with him to strike out this clause. Strike it out, and I warn the Senate that this bill must go back to the Committee on Appropriations, and we must come back here with an increased expenditure of nearly $3,000,000.

Sir, we can let this Army shrink to-day, and next year, when we have got the money, we can run it up to thirty thousand men. Cut down your regiments, as the Senator from Illinois proposes, and when will the Congress of the United States be willing again to raise the Army five thousand men? Not until you have another war, and the possibility of that seems remote enough. This is a shrinkage, under the circumstances, of necessity, for economy compels the Senate to make it. If you do not accede to it, you must go back and ask for more money.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, the amendment is simply, instead of letting the Army by deaths, desertions, expiration of term, and otherwise, go down to twenty-five thousand men, to keep it up to thirty thousand men. Instead of appropriating $27,000,000, as this bill does, it is going back and appropriating $30,000,000. The Secretary of War, I notice, in his testimony before the committee of the other House, uses just those words. He says if you make the Army twenty-five thousand, then about $25,000,000 or a little upward will supply it; if you make it thirty thousand, he must have $30,000,000. So the question is simply whether you will let the Army by its natural shrinkage be twenty-five thousand men, or whether you will put it up to thirty thousand men.

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator misunderstands the amendment entirely. The motion to strike out this clause does not propose to increase the recruiting five thousand men; it proposes no such thing. It only proposes to strike out the restriction which prohibits it from going beyond twenty-five thousand men. When you appropriate $105,000 for recruiting purposes, I do not think any man who knows anything about the expense of recruiting will suppose that there will be very many recruits under this proposition.

Now, there is one thing that I will state to the Senate that I did not before. With your appropriation of but $105,000, and the proviso that the Secretary of War shall not recruit above twenty-five thousand men, you will have your Army, as the Senator from Texas said, composed of about twenty thousand men; because if this $105,000 runs down as rapidly as it did last year, you have not appropriated money enough to keep the Army up to twenty-five thousand men. You cannot do it under this proposition; and at the same time, if you do not appropriate money enough, you still restrict the Army to twenty-five thousand men.

One other objection. This little clause, that you cannot go above twenty-five thousand men, goes before the country as a piece of economy, when it is a deception. You can hardly recruit anybody into the Army with $105,000 so as to keep the Army up to anything like its proper status. I am not asking you to appropriate any more money. I do not move to increase the appropriation; but I have moved to strike out the restriction, as improper in a bill of this kind and improper generally.

Mr. DAVIS. I ask the Senator from Illinois if the result of striking this out is not to let the Army remain as now fixed by law, at thirty thousand men? If, however, we retain the clause, it restricts the Army to twenty-five thousand men?

Mr. LOGAN. It restricts the number of enlisted men to twenty-five thousand. This proviso does not restrict the Army at all. It restricts the number of enlisted men, but it does not affect the Army so far as the frame-work of the Army is concerned. It does not reduce an officer of the Army.

Mr. DAVIS. Are not the men in the Army?

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly; but did you ever see an Army made up alone of privates?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. LOGAN.]

The question being put, a division was called for; and the ayes were 12 and the noes 18; no quorum voting.

Mr. WEST. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 18, nays 25; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Carpenter, Conover, Cragin, Flanagan, Hamilton of Texas, Hamlin, Harvey, Hitchcock, Howe, Ingalls, Logan, Morrill of Vermont, Pease, Ramsey, Sargent, Spencer, and Tipton—18.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Bogy, Boreman, Buckingham, Chandler, Cooper, Davis, Dennis, Goldthwaite, Hager, Johnston, Lewis, McCreery, Merrimon, Morrill of Maine, Norwood, Oglesby, Ransom, Saulsbury, Schurz, Scott, Stevenson, Stockton, West, and Wright—25.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Allison, Boutwell, Brownlow, Cameron, Clayton, Conkling, Dorsey, Edmunds, Fenton, Ferry of Connecticut, Ferry of Michigan, Frelinghuysen, Gilbert, Gordon, Hamilton of Maryland, Jones, Kelly, Mitchell, Morton, Patterson, Pratt, Robertson, Sherman, Sprague, Stewart, Thurman, Wadleigh, and Windom—29.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SPENCER. I offer the following amendment, to be inserted after line 131, on page 6, section 1:

Nor shall this restriction be construed as affecting settlements for services performed by any such railroad under contract with the Government prior to the passage of this act.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. If the Senator will allow me to make one remark, I will say that, if the Senate intends to adhere to its former vote, that amendment ought not to be made.

Mr. WEST. I will just say to the Senate that that amendment was considered in committee, not coming from the Senator from Alabama, but from another quarter, and the conclusion that the committee arrived at was that, inasmuch as this money is appropriated for the fiscal year to commence on the 1st of July, this clause cannot affect any service prior to that time.

Mr. SPENCER. Then what objection can there be to this amendment? I cannot conceive of any.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Alabama.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. LOGAN. I wish to offer an amendment. Inasmuch as the Senate have voted in the restriction that the Army shall not go beyond twenty-five thousand men, and inasmuch as that is done in the line of economy, though I opposed it because I did not think it was economy, we might as well, as we are on that line, make the economy go far enough to be effective. I move, therefore, to insert after the word "scouts," in line 13, on page 1, the following:

Provided, That the officers of the Army be reduced in the same ratio corresponding to the twenty-five thousand men provided in this bill, by muster out by the Secretary of War.

I move this amendment so as to make the frame-work of the Army correspond with the number of private soldiers in the Army. If gentlemen are in favor of economy, let us test the question.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Let us have the vote.

Mr. LOGAN. I ask for the yeas and nays on my amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. STOCKTON. I do not at this hour, when everybody wants to get to a vote, as I do myself—for I think there has been debate enough on this bill—rise for any other purpose than to explain very briefly the reason for the vote I shall cast. We have found by experience that we can neither improvise an army nor a navy. While we may not need over a certain number of men either in the Navy or in the Army, and while it may be economy to move at this time in the direction of reduction, I do not think it necessarily follows that persons who are in the service permanently as officers, who may have been educated by us at great expense and cost, should be forced to leave the service on account of a temporary economy, when their services may be required perhaps the next year. That is my reason for voting as I shall on this occasion.

Mr. LOGAN. I merely wish to say, in reply to the Senator from New Jersey, that if he had been here—I did not notice him, though perhaps he was here—when the discussion was going on in reference to the other question, I opposed the clause which I now move to amend, because it would produce disorganization and derangement of the Army. But I said that if the Senate passed the proposition to reduce the effective force of the Army to twenty-five thousand men, then I would take it as an instruction in the line of economy, and that the Senate meant to have an army of twenty-five thousand. If the Senate mean by their vote to reduce the Army to twenty-five thousand as a matter of economy, you certainly must reduce the officers in the same ratio; otherwise you have no economy. You have a set of supernumerary officers by reducing your Army in this way that are of no use on top of God's earth. You have no use for them in the world. Now if economy is what gentlemen mean, I ask you to make the Army complete at twenty-five thousand by mustering out the supernumerary officers.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Just one word now. The fitness of the honorable Senator's proposition and the propriety of it, so to speak, and its appositeness to what we have done, will be illustrated by a single statement. The clause in the bill is not a proposition to reduce the Army one man, as the Senator knows. It is simply a proposition not to furnish the means of recruiting beyond twenty-five thousand, where it stood last year. That is the proposition. It is no disorganization of the Army at all. Now the Senator says, the Senate having done that thing which he does not approve of, he will muster out of the service the officers who permanently belong to the Army; and he pretends not to see the distinction between mustering out officers and not recruiting the rank and file.

Mr. LOGAN. In reply to that, I will say that I do see the distinction, if there is any, and I will answer the Senator in this way: If you have no men at all, you need no officers. If you have no men to command, you certainly need no officers to command them. Then, if you have but twenty-five thousand men, you only need a corresponding number of officers to command the twenty-five thousand; not so many officers as you need for thirty thousand men.

According to the theory of this bill I am correct. I said that I did not think it was proper legislation to have it on this bill. I do not think so now. But the Senate has voted it on the bill in opposition to my urgent request to strike it out.

Now, you say you do not deplete the Army, but you provide that it shall not be increased beyond a certain number. That is fixing the Army at that number, and there is no other construction to be placed upon it. When you say the Army shall not be increased over twenty-five thousand men, you fix the maximum number of the Army so far as the soldiers are concerned; and it is just as right to fix it as far as the officers are concerned.

Further, the history of the Army in this country shows that after every war we have ever had the officers were mustered out with the soldiers. The officers of the regular Army were reduced in proportion to the number of men retained after the recent rebellion. So it was when the Army was mustered out after the war with England. The officers were mustered out in the same proportion with the men. In the reorganization after the late war we retained enough officers to command the Army up to its maximum of thirty thousand men. Now you provide that its maximum shall be twenty-five thousand; and according to the rule established by Congress five years ago when they made the maximum and mustered officers out to correspond with that maximum, the same thing should be done now. I do not want, as I said awhile ago, to muster anybody out, either man or officer, for I do not believe you have an army at all too large; but if you prevent the recruiting of the Army up to the maximum allowed by law and limit it to twenty-five thousand, as this bill does, it is unjust to keep officers of the Army doing nothing and drawing their pay, and they should be mustered out to correspond with the number of men.

Mr. WEST. I will only detain the Senate one moment to call their attention to what very great injustice this might do to the officers of the Army, and how much the War Department might be embarrassed if we were to adopt the amendment of the Senator from Illinois. With an Army of twenty-five thousand men last year, and an Army of twenty-five thousand men next year, why should not the number of officers be precisely the same? Take the text of the Senator's amendment, and you require the Secretary of War to muster these officers out. Whom will he muster out? Will he begin with the General of the Army and muster him out?

Mr. LOGAN. O, no.

Mr. WEST. There is no knowing where he will begin at. It leaves it entirely discretionary with the War Department to muster out officers who have rendered good and efficient service, and whose services in the future may be exceedingly valuable. If the amendment is to be adopted at all, it should be perfected. Now it would confer an exceedingly arbitrary and embarrassing power upon the Secretary of War, one that would work great injustice to men who have served their country in the field. I hope the Senate will reject the amendment.

Mr. LOGAN. I will perfect the amendment to agree with the proposition of the Senator. Let the Clerk insert——

Mr. WEST. I made no proposition.

Mr. LOGAN. I will carry out your theory. Just insert "the Secretary of War shall consolidate the regiments down to twenty-five and muster out the supernumerary officers." I guess that will correspond with the Senator's view, and then the Secretary of War will have to muster out the supernumeraries after consolidation. That was the language of the bill that mustered them out four years ago.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator had better step to the desk and put his amendment in writing as he desires it to stand.

The amendment having been prepared, was read, as follows:

Provided, That the Secretary of War shall consolidate the regiments to twenty-five, and muster out the supernumerary regimental officers after consolidation, after an examination before a board of officers, to be appointed for that purpose by him.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 18, nays 27; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bogy, Carpenter, Goldthwaite, Hamilton of Texas, Hamlin, Hitchcock, Howe, Johnston, Lewis, Logan, McCreery, Norwood, Oglesby, Pease, Pratt, Schurz, Spencer, and Tipton—18.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Anthony, Bayard, Boreman, Buckingham, Cooper, Cragin, Davis, Dennis, Flanagan, Frelinghuysen, Ingalls, Merrimon, Mitchell, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Ramsey, Sargent, Scott, Sherman, Stevenson, Stewart, Stockton, Thurman, West, Windom, and Wright—27.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Boutwell, Brownlow, Cameron, Chandler, Clayton, Conkling, Conover, Dorsey, Edmunds, Fenton, Ferry of Connecticut, Ferry of Michigan, Gilbert, Gordon, Hager, Hamilton of Maryland, Harvey, Jones, Kelly, Morton, Patterson, Ransom, Robertson, Saulsbury, Sprague, and Wadleigh—27.

So the amendment was rejected.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

SEMINOLE ANNUITIES.

The Senate proceeded to consider its amendment to the bill (H. R. No. 1923) authorizing the payment of annuities into the treasury of the Seminole tribe of Indians, disagreed to by the House of Representatives.

On motion of Mr. BUCKINGHAM, it was

Resolved, That the Senate insist upon its amendment to the said bill, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, and agree to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Ordered, That the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the President pro tempore.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore appointed Mr. BUCKINGHAM, Mr. INGALLS, and Mr. STEVENSON.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolution; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

An act (H. R. No. 1015) to authorize the President to accept, for citizens of the United States, the jurisdiction of certain tribunals in the Ottoman dominions and Egypt, established, or to be established, under the authority of the Sublime Porte and of the government of Egypt;

An act (H. R. No. 1956) for the relief of Willard Davis;

A bill (H. R. No. 1213) for the relief of Willard Howe, of Massachusetts;

A bill (H. R. No. 2225) to amend an act entitled "An act to prevent the extermination of fur-bearing animals in Alaska," approved July 1, 1870;

A bill (H. R. No. 1756) to amend the act entitled "An act to withdraw from settlement and sale a certain section of land in Wyoming Territory," approved May 23, 1872;

A bill (H. R. No. 476) to establish bonded warehouses for the storing and cleansing the rice intended for exportation;

A bill (H. R. No. 1576) for the relief of Reuel B. Fuller, of Wilton, Maine;

A bill (H. R. No. 215) to exempt George M. Richard, of Pittston, in the State of Pennsylvania, from the payment of $881.29 for postage-stamps stolen from his office while postmaster;

A bill (S. No. 360) making an appropriation for a topographical survey of the Capitol grounds, and plans for improving the same;

A bill (H. R. No. 2228) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to change the name of the propeller William M. Tweed, of Buffalo;

A bill (H. R. No. 1223) for the relief of L. S. Campbell;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 52) explanatory of resolution approved January 31, 1868, entitled "A resolution limiting contracts for stationery and other supplies in the Executive Departments to one year;" and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 29) authorizing the Secretary of War to detail medical officers of the Army to inquire into and report upon the causes of epidemic cholera.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

On motion of Mr. SARGENT, it was Ordered, That when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

COMMITTEE SERVICE.

Mr. SARGENT. I move that the President pro tempore have power to fill the vacancies upon the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. WEST. I hope that proposition will lie over to-day.

Mr. SARGENT. I submit the motion.

Mr. WEST subsequently said: I wish to withdraw an objection to the resolution about filling vacancies on certain committees. There was a resolution offered by the Senator from California that the Chair have power to fill certain vacancies. I withdraw the objection which I made to its consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from California moves that the Chair be authorized to fill the vacancy upon the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and also upon the Committee on Education and Labor, occasioned by the death of Mr. Sumner.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 2423) explanatory of an act entitled "An act to provide for the creation of corporations in the District of Columbia by general law," in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

CLERK TO A COMMITTEE.

Mr. WRIGHT. I submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment be allowed a clerk, to date from the organization of said committee, and to be paid only during the sessions of the Senate.

Mr. DAVIS. I do not understand that.

Mr. WRIGHT. I will state to the Senator from West Virginia that the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment is a standing committee, and, as was supposed, by the rules of the Senate was entitled to a clerk, but it seems that the practice of the Senate is to require a formal resolution to that effect, where a new committee is raised.

Mr. DAVIS. Have you had a clerk?

Mr. WRIGHT. We have had a clerk all the time.

Mr. DAVIS. Has he been paid?

Mr. WRIGHT. That is just the trouble, that he cannot be paid for want of this resolution

The resolution was agreed to.

FORTIFICATION APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. DAVIS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 1037, known as the fortification appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 1037) making appropriations for the construction, preservation, and repair of certain fortifications and other works of defense, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. DAVIS. This bill appropriates for all sea-coast purposes of fortification $904,000 for the next fiscal year. The appropriation for the current fiscal year was $1,847,000. The original estimate at this session, submitted by the Chief of Engineers, was $3,376,000, and the revised estimate of that officer was $1,407,500.

It will be observed that this bill appropriates less than half as much money for the present fiscal year as was appropriated for the last, and $503,500 less than the revised estimate of the Chief of Engineers. For the last twenty years the regular appropriation for the sea-coast has been more on an average than that made by this bill.

The largest guns in use previous to 1862 were of 10-inch bore, using a shot weighing about 128 pounds. In 1862 the 15-inch gun was first used. They weigh 25 tons. They throw a ball weighing 450 pounds, and require 100 pounds of powder to a shot, and can be fired every three or four minutes.

In a recent test one of this class of guns sent a ball into an ordinary earth-bank 40 feet—sand is usually used in fortifications; a ball will go about half the distance into sand.

Since the use of the 15-inch guns nearly all the forts on the sea-coast have been, or ought to be, much enlarged and strengthened.

There are now two 20-inch guns in use, one at Fortress Monroe and the other near New York. The 20-inch gun weighs 55 tons, throws a ball weighing 1,100 pounds, and uses 200 pounds of powder at a shot. This is the most powerful and largest gun used.

The embankments and walls of the present fortifications, owing to the large guns that are now in use, have to be materially improved and made heavier.

There are 95 forts on our sea-coast, 25 of which are specially provided for by this bill; consequently there are 70 for which there is no appropriation whatever in this bill. There is, however, a contingent fund of about $100,000 in this bill, about which some questions may be asked. That contingent fund is for the care of the 70 forts now on the sea-coast, for which there is no specific appropriation made in this bill.

The committee, after carefully considering the bill, think no amendment ought to be made, and report it just as it came from the House.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I believe the Senator from Nebraska is very anxious to have an amendment to the bill, and has stepped to his committee-room, I think, for it.

Mr. DAVIS. My attention has been called to the fact that the bill as read names no particular year for which the appropriation is made. Of course it is for the fiscal year commencing July 1, next, and I supposed the bill specified that. If it does not, I move to amend it by inserting after the word "defense," in line 6, the words "for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I offer the following amendment; to be inserted after line 10:

For the construction of a post on the North Fork of Loup River, in Nebraska, $50,000.

I send to the Chair a letter from the Secretary of War, which explains the necessity for this appropriation.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT, WASHINGTON CITY, March 3, 1874.

SIR: In reply to yours of the 2d instant, suggesting the necessity of the establishment of a permanent military post on the North Branch of the Loup River, for the protection of the settlements of Northwestern Nebraska, I beg to invite your attention to the following extract from the annual report of Brigadier-General E. O. C. Ord, commanding the Department of the Platte:

"I have again to call attention to the exposed condition of Nebraska, north of the Union Pacific Railroad, and extending from the Missouri River for three hundred miles westward, in which there is not a single military station. This country is as rich as any other portion of Nebraska, but the fear of Indians has retarded its settlement. It has been subject to frequent raids from the Sioux of Spotted Tail's, and now from Red Cloud's, reservation. When, on a recent visit East of the first-named chief, he did me the honor to call, with his lieutenants and concubines, at my office, I called his attention to a raid which some of what were called his people had just committed on the peaceable Baptist and Danish settlers on the Loup. He replied in quite a haughty manner that 'he had not come here to be talked to in that way.' As I had no power to control his movements or make him, or the people whom he claimed to rule, respect the property of the white settlers, the touching upon facts put an end to further conversation.

"I think a post should be established somewhere about midway on a line drawn from Fort Randall, on the Missouri River, to Fort McPherson, on the Platte. It need not cost to exceed $50,000, and, under the sense of security which it would give to settlers, the rapid increase of a tax-paying population would soon repay the outlay."

I would say further that I have not had time, since the receipt of your letter, to obtain reports from the General and Lieutenant-General of the Army upon this subject, but I have no doubt, from former observations made by them, that there is an actual necessity for the establishment of a post in that country.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

W. W. BELKNAP,
Secretary of War.

Hon. P. W. HITCHCOCK,
United States Senate.

Mr. DAVIS. This is not the appropriate bill for this item, even if the appropriation proposed by the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska ought to be made. This is the fortification bill, and no appropriation should go on it except for fortifications on the sea-coast. I suppose there never has been such a thing as an appropriation made for a post on a river in the interior in the fortification bill. That, probably, should go on the river and harbor bill, or on the Army bill, or some other bill, but certainly not on this. Under the instructions of the committee and my own judgment I shall have to resist the amendment. Besides, the sum proposed is double the amount which in my judgment ought to be appropriated, if anything. I hope, therefore, the amendment will not be added to the bill.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. As to the propriety of this amendment upon this bill, I have to state that the amendment itself has been submitted to the Military Committee and approved by them, and it was then referred to the Committee on Appropriations. At the suggestion of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations the amendment was moved to this bill. I know of no rule of the Senate which requires that the appropriations in this bill should be made strictly and exclusively for fortifications on the sea-coast.

I suppose the Senate has a right to consider the proposition on its merits; and from the recommendation of the general commanding the department, from the recommendation of the Secretary of War, and the recommendation of the Committee on Military Affairs of the Senate, and from my own knowledge of the facts, I believe that the amendment is a very important and a very desirable one. As to the amount, all I have to say is that the Secretary of War recommends the amount named, and believes that a less amount would be insufficient.

Mr. DAVIS. I did not understand the letter read from the Secretary of War, unless there be some other, as specially recommending this appropriation. I am told that the General of the Army has not made any such request. I hardly think this proposition should be adopted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORWOOD. Before the vote is taken I wish to inquire whether this measure is recommended by the Secretary of War or by the commanding general. That would control my vote.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It is recommended by the commanding general, by the General of the Army, and by the Secretary of War.

Mr. SHERMAN. The trouble with this amendment is, in the first place, that it does not come from the Military Committee, and in the next place this bill is purely a bill for fortifications and sea defenses. I never have known it to go beyond the protection of the present system of fortifications and building new fortifications. I know military posts are established in the West out of the appropriation made for the Quartermaster's Department or from the appropriations for the pay of the Army. Soldiers are used and employed to build up ordinary posts.

Mr. WEST. We have stopped that by a provision of law which prohibits the Secretary of War from doing it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I was not aware of that.

Again, as a matter of course, a permanent post like Fort Leavenworth ought to be only established after full investigation and careful examination by engineering and other officers, and on the recommendation of the Military Committee. It seems to me my friend from Nebraska has not got his proposition on the right bill; and then I think there is no sufficient information here to justify us in establishing a permanent military post. Transient posts are made day by day by the Army, without any special appropriation, out of the regular appropriations for the Quartermaster's Department and other general appropriations for the Army.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not know that the examination has been made that the Senator suggests by an engineer officer; but this matter was referred to the Military Committee. I do not know that that would have any influence here; but it was agreed to on the recommendation of General Ord, who is in command of that department.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the Senator had recommended this from the Military Committee as an amendment to the Army bill, I know no reason why it should not go there.

Mr. LOGAN. We did not recommend it as an amendment to any particular bill, but agreed to it and referred it to the Committee on Appropriations for them to put it on such bill as they saw proper, and they did not see proper to put it on any.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. My honorable friend is not correct. The amendment itself said it was to go on this particular bill.

Mr. LOGAN. How do you mean?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The amendment is proposed to this particular bill as coming from the Military Committee.

Mr. LOGAN. I only stated that the amendment was not reported by the Appropriation Committee to any bill.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. No; but the amendment came from the Committee on Military Affairs, to be proposed to this particular bill.

Mr. LOGAN. Very well; I have nothing to say about that. I only stated that it was referred to the Appropriation Committee, and does not appear to come back from that committee as an amendment to any bill.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The Committee on Appropriations did not adopt it; they did not reject it; but the Committee on Military Affairs having considered it, the Committee on Appropriations not having the business before them, concluded on the whole to allow it to be moved in the Senate without their recommendation, on the recommendation of the Committee on Military Affairs. That is exactly the way it stands now. If the Committee on Military Affairs have examined it and are satisfied that it is the proper thing to do, I do not propose to oppose it. I hardly think it is allowable on this bill. It is designed undoubtedly for the regular Army appropriation bill, but inadvertently the Senator from Nebraska did not take the proper precautions to bring it within the rule on that bill, so that he finally fell back on this bill; and that explains the whole difficulty about it.

Mr. WEST. Having had occasion, as the Senate very well knows, to scrutinize the expenditures of the military establishment of the country quite critically within the last few days, I ask the Senate's consideration to what I shall say in favor of this expenditure. With reference to the informality of its proffer, I will add that it was informally, or contrary to usage, offered to the fortification bill, but in the Committee on Appropriations it was committed to myself as having charge of the Army bill, where it properly belonged, to investigate the subject as to whether we ought to spend this money and to so report, or report the reverse to the committee. I did do so. I examined the question and satisfied myself, and I hope I shall satisfy the Senate, that we ought to expend this money, and I so reported to the committee; but the committee were engaged on other matters of too much importance to induce them to consider this, and consequently it went over and could not be brought in under the rule. There is that much of informality about it here.

Now, with reference to the actual merits of the case, General Sherman, the general commanding the Army, is particularly enthusiastic on this subject. He says that if he only had $50,000 to devote to the promotion of tranquillity on the frontier, he would put it right there at that spot, where it will benefit the country fourfold in two years.

Furthermore, it has been said that there has been no formal examination of the site. Hence the amendment does not definitely fix the site. That site is discretionary with the Secretary of War on the advice of the General of the Army, and the General of the Army differed from the Senator from Nebraska, and proposed to put the post at a more remote locality.

Now, if the Senate can waive this question of informality, and if it is good policy to spend the money there, they have my voucher that, so far as I have examined it, I do not know any better place to put $50,000 than right there.

Mr. LOGAN. In reference to the examination of the committee, I said, irrespective of the effect it might have on the adoption of this amendment, that this amendment was agreed to by the Military Committee, and then referred to the Appropriation Committee regularly, with the recommendation of the Military Committee. They were never inquired of as to what they based their recommendation on; but I can state it, so far as I am concerned. I know General Ord very well; I served in the Army with him; I have known him a long time. I do not believe General Ord would make a recommendation of anything on earth that he did not honestly believe was correct and proper, and for the benefit of the service. On these papers I concluded (because I could not go through and examine the details, and had no other evidence) that it was a proper thing to be done; and for that reason it was recommended, and for none other.

Mr. TIPTON. I shall not prolong this discussion; but there is no question at all about the propriety of this act; and nothing can be done by Congress that would do as much to encourage peaceful, quiet, constant immigration to that region of the country as the establishment of this post.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will move, or it can be done by general consent, that the Army bill be reconsidered with a view to have this amendment put there, conceiving it to be proper from the statement made. I do not think it would be wise to set the example of putting appropriations for these interior posts on the fortification bill, but if that is in order, as it can be done in a moment, I move to reconsider the vote on the passage of the Army appropriation bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio moves to reconsider the vote by which the Army appropriation bill was passed.

Mr. WEST. I do not know how I can consent to that. If the Senator will guarantee that we shall not open any of the vexed questions——

Mr. SHERMAN. O, no!

Mr. WEST. Then it is understood it opens nothing else. ["Agreed."]

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion to reconsider.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. Let the previous votes be regarded as reconsidered also, and the bill open before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Army appropriation bill will be regarded as on its third reading and open to amendment.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Now I move to amend the Army appropriation bill by adding to the first section:

For the construction of a post on the North Fork of Loup River, in Nebraska, $50,000.

Mr. DAVIS. I move to strike out $50,000 and insert $30,000. From the information I got it is not to be a permanent fort, to remain there for all time; and it is within a State which is being settled up. I think efficiency would be served as well by $30,000 as $50,000, while economy would be served by the smaller appropriation. I have made some inquiry about it.

Mr. LOGAN. It is not presumable that the Secretary of War will expend more money than is necessary for this purpose. I do not want any one to take my judgment in reference to a matter of this kind, because there are others more conversant with it than I am myself; but I do not believe you can establish a post, for the purpose of maintaining troops at it, that will be of any consequence, for less than $50,000.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I will say to my colleague on the committee, [Mr. DAVIS,] with permission of the Senator from Illinois, that I have seen a dispatch from the Secretary of War within a few minutes, saying that nothing less than $50,000 should be appropriated.

Mr. SARGENT. One hundred thousand dollars is ordinarily the amount for such an object.

Mr. LOGAN. And sometimes more. I know enough about such things to say that I do not believe any post can be established for less money than that, which will amount to anything and be of any benefit to troops.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. If I were going to suggest an amendment, it would be that it should be limited to $50,000.

Mr. DAVIS. Seeing the telegram from the Secretary of War, saying that $50,000 is as low as it ought to be, I withdraw the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from West Virginia withdraws his amendment to the amendment.

Mr. SARGENT. This ought to come in after line 223, on page 10 of the Army bill.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Say "a sum not exceeding $50,000."

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. That would not help it, allow me to state. It might come back unless you limited it. If the object is to limit the expense, then you must have language to that effect.

Mr. SARGENT. "That a greater amount than herein appropriated shall not be expended for such purpose."

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Very well.

Mr. STEVENSON. Is there any estimate or any recommendation from the War Department for this fortification?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It has been stated by Senators that the Secretary of War and the General of the Army recommend this appropriation.

Mr. SARGENT. There is a letter here from the Secretary of War.

Mr. STEVENSON. Why was it not estimated for? I ask if there is any estimate for it. Is there any authentic estimate of what this fort is going to cost? I am opposed to undertaking it unless I know that there has been an estimate, because all these appropriations begin in this way. The point of my inquiry is, has there been any estimate made of the cost of this fortification?

Mr. LOGAN. It is not a fortification, nor is it a fort; it is only a post; and the $50,000 appropriated is merely for the purpose of such necessary accommodations at that place as are needed.

Mr. DAVIS. I move to amend, by providing that when completed the cost shall not exceed $50,000.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from West Virginia moves to amend the amendment.

Mr. SHERMAN. My own judgment is that these posts are established as a matter of course, without a special appropriation. I always supposed they were made out of the appropriations for quartermaster and other supplies.

Mr. SARGENT. They were until a certain time, when we prohibited it by law.

Mr. SHERMAN. I know when I was connected with the appropriation bills those items were understood to include this.

Mr. LOGAN. That was true; but it has been stopped by law, and it now requires a special appropriation to establish a military post.

Mr. SARGENT. I would suggest this amendment to add to the clause:

Provided, That the cost of such post shall not exceed the sum hereby appropriated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This amendment will be considered as agreed to; and the question is on the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska as amended.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1037) making appropriations for the construction, preservation, and repair of certain fortifications and other works of defense.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended, by adding the words "for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875."

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 2423) explanatory of the act entitled "An act to provide for the creation of corporations in the District of Columbia by general law" was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. SCOTT. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After nine minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at four o'clock and forty-six minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, March 20, 1874.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HYDE. I rise for the purpose of calling up the contested-election case of Sloan vs. Rawls, from the first district of Georgia.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I would like to inquire if that case will take up any time?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it will occupy the time until the business of the District of Columbia comes up at two o'clock.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I hope the morning hour will not be crowded out; we have not had a morning hour for private bills for two weeks, I believe.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman having charge of this contested-election case has been struggling for a hearing for five weeks.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I understand very well that it is a privileged question; but I appeal to the gentleman not to press it now, on the ground that this is private-bill day.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is under the impression that private bills receive more attention in proportion than any other class of business, and the House can better afford to take up this question on private-bill day than on any other. For that reason the Chair recognized the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. HYDE.]

Mr. DAWES. Mr. Speaker, I am instructed by the Committee on Ways and Means to give notice to the House that on Monday I will ask, in the name of the committee, the privilege of bringing before the House for consideration what is generally called the $400,000,000 bill, with an understanding that amendments proposing to reduce the amount will be admitted. I shall myself introduce an amendment to limit the amount to $356,000,000; but any amendment proposing to reduce the amount below $400,000,000, I am instructed by the committee to say, they will permit to be offered to the bill, if the House will allow them to bring it up for action on Monday.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman the condition of business on Monday. At the close of the morning hour the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] from the Committee on Commerce, has a bill pending with reference to the Louisville and Portland Canal. The gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. BROMBERG,] from the same committee, has a bill in relation to infectious diseases. After those matters have been disposed of, the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Massachusetts.

ELECTION CONTEST—SLOAN vs. RAWLS.

Mr. HYDE. I now call for the reading of the resolution submitted by the Committee on Elections.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Hon. Morgan Rawls is not entitled to a seat in this House as a Representative from the first congressional district of Georgia, in the Forty-third Congress.

Resolved, That Hon. Andrew Sloan is entitled to a seat in this House as a Representative from the first congressional district of Georgia, in the Forty-third Congress.

Mr. SPEER. Is not the resolution reported by the minority of the committee pending as a substitute for that?

The SPEAKER. It is, and will be first voted upon. It is printed in connection with the report.

The resolution reported by the minority of the committee was as follows:

Resolved, That Hon. Morgan Rawls, the sitting member, was duly elected, and is entitled to the seat occupied by him in this House as the Representative from the first district of Georgia in the Forty-third Congress.

Mr. HYDE. Mr. Speaker, the question to which I desire to call the attention of the House this morning is one of the most important which, under a republican form of government, can come before the House; for what question can be of greater moment or importance than the right of a numerous constituency to representation in the law-making body? As a member of the Committee on Elections, I feel that the duties which I have to perform are strictly judicial, and I try to discharge those duties with judicial fairness and impartiality. And, sir, I am willing to accord to my colleagues on the committee the same spirit of fairness and impartiality which I claim for myself. It is, sir, a matter of regret to me that we have in this case two reports; a majority report, unanimously republican, and a minority report unanimously democratic. I shall not animadvert upon the motives of gentlemen in regard to these reports, but confine myself strictly to the facts in the case, and I say that upon the facts, as they are proved in the record, which is now before the House, I rest this case with the utmost confidence to the decision of the House.

The notice and the answer in this case covered a large number of specifications. There are in the notice thirty-seven specifications and charges, and in the answer of the sitting member there are seventeen. These two series of charges and countercharges contain a summary of nearly all the political villainy which has grown up under republican institutions in any country; but I am happy to state that only a small part of these has been proved by the record, and yet we have over four hundred pages of printed matter.

Now I desire particularly to call the attention of the House to the minority report, which covers twenty-four pages of closely printed matter. In this minority report they take up and discuss fifteen different topics. They discuss them in a manner which would lead the members of this House, or any person, without examining the testimony, to suppose that they were examining questions and discussing points in regard to which they were in conflict with the majority of the committee. Yet, strange as it may seem, out of these fifteen points which are made by the minority of the committee in their report, only five are in conflict with the points made by the majority of the committee. As a specimen of the accuracy and judicial fairness of this minority report, I wish to call the attention of the House to what they say upon page 20 of the printed report. Speaking of Liberty Hill precinct—and that portion of their report covers some four printed pages—they use this language:

> The undersigned were amazed at the effrontery of the contestant's demand. They are still more amazed at the action of the majority of the committee in response to this demand, by which action all but 9 of the 60 votes are counted for the contestant, these 9 votes being excluded for the sole reason that the witnesses were not named in the notice to take depositions. But they cannot believe that the House will perpetrate a wrong so flagrant as either to set aside the official returns of this precinct or to count 51 of these votes for the contestant.

Now, sir, not a single word of this statement which the minority of the committee make is founded upon the majority report; no such language is contained in that report.

Mr. SPEER. Will the gentleman yield to me for an inquiry?

Mr. HYDE. Certainly.

Mr. SPEER. Did not the majority report, as read before the committee, count these votes? And was not that portion of the report stricken out without the knowledge of the minority and after the minority report was read?

Mr. HYDE. There was no majority report except the one that was made; there never could be but one majority report in the same case. Any proposition that any member may have made, which was not finally made a part of the majority report, has nothing to do with this case. Certainly the minority ought not to speak of it as a part of the majority report when it never was any part of it.

Mr. SPEER. Was it not a part of the majority report as read to the committee?

Mr. HYDE. There were different views read to the committee upon this point. But the majority report is the report that was finally agreed to by the majority of the committee. That report was agreed upon in the presence of the gentlemen who drew this minority report, in the presence of every member of the minority of the committee. And I say the statement is not founded upon any fact whatever.

Mr. SPEER. The gentleman is in error about that entirely.

Mr. HYDE. I pass from the consideration of this point to many other mistakes equally glaring in the minority report which has been presented for the consideration of this House. Before I do that, however, I wish to call the attention of the House to the returns and to the solid basis upon which we place this case. On page 362 of the record of this case you will find what are certified by the secretary of state of Georgia as the regular returns of this election, upon which the proclamation and certificate of the governor were based. By those returns Mr. Rawls has 8,319 votes, and Mr. Sloan 6,979 votes, making a majority for Mr. Rawls, as he claims, of 1,340 votes. That was the majority for Mr. Rawls by the returns, which his friends regarded as regular. That majority was obtained only by rejecting a larger number of votes honestly and fairly cast for Mr. Sloan.

In the next place, I desire to call the attention of the House to another report certified by the secretary of state of Georgia, and to be found on page 278 of this record. By that return, certified to under the seal of the secretary of state, Mr. Sloan has 8,350 votes, and Mr. Rawls 8,338, making a majority for Mr. Sloan of 12 votes upon the returns as they are certified to and on file in the office of the secretary of state of Georgia. Now, sir, take the returns as they are certified and on file in the office of the secretary of state, and we find that Mr. Sloan is elected by a majority of 12 votes.

I desire to call the attention of the House to the three particulars in which these two certificates of the secretary of state differ. The last certificate has an addition of three items which were not contained in the former, and by which Mr. Sloan is found to have had a majority of votes. The first is an error of 38 votes, in consolidating the vote of Burke County. I need not go into the particulars of this return, because there is no controversy between the majority and the minority of the committee in regard to it. All are agreed that those 38 votes were omitted by mistake. They were the votes of Bark Camp precinct, in Burke County, where Mr. Sloan received 38 votes, and they by mistake were not consolidated. As there is no conflict between the two reports upon that point, I need not spend further time in discussing it.

The next item is the vote of Bailey's Mills precinct, in Camden County. As is admitted upon both sides, and conclusively shown by the evidence, the only reason why these votes were not consolidated with the county returns was because the return of that precinct was not received until a few hours after the returns had been consolidated and sent to the secretary of state. They were perfectly regular, and ought to have been consolidated; and both the minority and the majority of the committee agree that the votes should be counted.

The next point to which I wish to call attention is the matter of the three country precincts of Chatham County. This is one of the chief points upon which the two reports differ. It is an important point in determining the question of who is elected from this congressional district. The only question in regard to the validity of these votes is in regard to the validity of these three voting precincts. The contestant claims that they were legal precincts, and that the election was legally and fairly held there, without fraud or interference of any kind. The sitting member claims that those precincts had been abolished; that therefore the votes there given could not be counted. There is no evidence whatever to show that the election was not fairly and honorably conducted; and there is the most abundant proof that such was the fact, that the election was in every respect legal and fair, provided the election precincts were legal precincts.

Now, sir, the whole question in regard to the legality of these precincts rests upon the order by which they were established. By the laws of Georgia the ordinary of the county has power, except in the county seat, to establish voting precincts; and by an order, which is printed on page 174 of the record, the ordinary of Chatham County established these precincts in 1868, in the following order:

It being necessary that election precincts should be established in the county in order to facilitate the election to be held on the 3d day of November next, it is therefore ordered that election precincts be, and they are hereby, established at Cherokee Hill, &c.

Now, sir, it is claimed by the sitting member that the forepart of this order—the preamble, the whereas, you may say, to the order—limits the establishment of precincts to the election of 1868, and that after that they were abolished.

It being necessary that election precincts should be established in the county, in order to facilitate the election to be held, &c.

Now, a majority of the committee claim that those words were simply a preamble, describing and stating the reason for present action, but that they did not have, and could not have, the effect of abolishing those precincts on the 4th day of November, 1868, or one day after the election; that they are still valid precincts, or would be if they had not been abolished by this same ordinary a month after the election in 1872. I desire to call the attention of the House particularly to the action of this ordinary; for this man, who is now a political friend of the sitting member, comes before the parties who took this testimony, and declares it was his intention when he established these precincts to have them only applicable to the election of 1868.

Now, sir, certainly we cannot permit the testimony of a judge, taken five years after he has made his record, to vary or destroy the record of a court of justice. And, sir, I think that the action of this same ordinary, in abolishing these precincts a month after the election in 1872, shows conclusively that he had no confidence himself in his own opinion thus solemnly expressed in his testimony.

I therefore hold, sir, that the election precincts were perfectly legal, and that the election in these precincts, as is proven by the testimony of King S. Thomas, on page 55, Avery Smith, on page 57, and James Porter, on page 58, was conducted honorably and fairly. The returns were regular in every particular, and there is no reason in the world why they should not be counted.

But the gentlemen who represent the minority in this case claim (and this was an afterthought) that these precincts were abolished by the Legislature in the act of 1870. Now, sir, the Legislature of that State did in 1870 pass a special election law for a particular election; but by every term and provision of that law it was made applicable only to the election of 1870; and, more than that, in 1871 it was repealed.

But notwithstanding all that, I desire to call the attention of the House to the extraordinary statements made here by the minority of this committee. On page 38 of the report, after arguing that these election precincts were abolished by the act of 1870, they use the following language:

It is plain that the previous statutory provisions authorizing the existence of precincts like these under consideration were in conflict with the provisions of this act, which tolerate precincts only in incorporated and organized cities and towns. These provisions were, therefore, not merely suspended for the occasion of the election of 1870, but were absolutely repealed.

Now I would like to know from the sitting member, and from the minority of the committee, what becomes of the 76 other voting precincts in that district which are not in incorporated cities and towns? Why, sir, they claim that by this act every precinct except those in incorporated cities and towns was abolished. They prove too much. They have not seen the effect of this broad doctrine which they have laid down here. Why, sir, I have had an estimate made of the number of voting precincts in that district, and they are estimated at 114, while the incorporated towns number, as estimated, 38; so that there would be left 76 voting precincts, which, according to the argument of the minority of the committee, are illegal. Now, why do not the minority go into that question and throw out these 76 other precincts, as well as the 3 in Chatham County? I think the minority of the committee have overstepped the bounds of reason. They have proved too much, which is one of the best ways of showing the absurdity and folly of their argument.

But, sir, they further call attention to certain orders made by the ordinary of that county in relation to holding the election. One of these orders, dated 1870, and which was made under this special election law, to which I have called attention, and therefore could not apply to any other election, has, it is claimed, the effect of showing the intention of the authorities in that county—the idea and the understanding that these precincts were abolished. Why, sir, what is the language of that order?

ELECTION PRECINCT, December 16, 1870.

To the Voters of Chatham County:

You are respectfully notified that there will be but two ballot-boxes to receive your votes at the ensuing election, to be held on the 20th, 21st, and 22d instants, and that both boxes will be at the court-house in Savannah. Voters residing within the city limits are requested to vote in the box at President-street entrance to court-house, (north side.) Voters residing in Chatham County, outside of the city limits, will please vote at box on York-street entrance to court-house, (south side.)

HENRY S. WETMORE,
Ordinary Chatham County.

The language in this order is construed by the minority of the committee to reach forward to all time. The "ensuing election," to be held on certain specified days, means, in the opinion of the minority, that the order reaches forward to all elections. Notwithstanding that in the order which I quoted a few moments ago the words, "it being necessary to provide means for holding the election in 1868," are construed by the minority as limited to a particular and special election, the words of the order I have just cited are construed to extend through all time. Such is the reasoning by which the minority of the committee attempt to sustain their report.

They say also that these election precincts were "stealthily exhumed." They seem to wish to have it understood by the House that nobody knew any election was to be held at these precincts; that they were "stealthily exhumed" by the contestant and his friends. Now, sir, there were over 1,200 voters who voted at these precincts. More than that, the supervisors of the election were appointed for every one of them by the United States judge for the southern district of Georgia, days before the election. Yet the minority of the committee would undertake to make members of this House believe there was some fraud here; that these precincts had been "stealthily exhumed" by the contestant and his friends on the eve of the election, in order to cast votes for the contestant. I say their language is not upheld by evidence—not sustained in any particular by the evidence or the facts in the case.

They say further, on page 34 of the report, that the election officers not only acted at precincts where they did not reside, but also voted at precincts where they did not reside. Now, Mr. Speaker, such is the law of Georgia. An elector can vote in any precinct in the county where he lives. They are enrolled; a poll list is made out; they are registered, and these poll lists are furnished to every precinct; and any man who is a voter in any county in Georgia has a right to choose what precinct he will vote in. There is nothing illegal about it, nothing wrong in it whatever. It is not only legal, but customary.

In conclusion, therefore, upon this part of the case, I say there is most abundant evidence, not only showing the legality of the returns of these precincts, but also showing that the election was in all respects fairly and honorably conducted.

Another precinct in which there is an issue between these two reports is the precinct of Lawtonville, in Burke County. I desire briefly to call the attention of the House to the facts in that case. It is not necessary to go into a long detail of the evidence. The facts in the case are simply these: that the election was held fairly and honorably; was participated in by both parties; and there was no trouble whatever until they came to count the votes. What then took place? Every one of the election officers was a democrat. Both the judges and the clerk were democrats. They commenced counting the votes, but when they found that Mr. Sloan, the republican candidate, had a greater number of votes than Mr. Rawls, they stopped counting, and refused to make out and forward the returns. That is the whole difficulty in this case. They refused to make out the returns, all of them being democrats, because Mr. Sloan had a majority of the votes cast. This statement is borne out by the proof. It is amply sustained by the evidence in the case.

One democratic judge, however, and one democratic clerk remained and went on with the count, and when completed the result was 189 for Mr. Sloan and 113 for Mr. Rawls.

Now, what does the minority of the committee say in regard to this? On page 21 of their report they say there is no testimony as to the actual vote, except that of one Stanley Young, the United States supervisor. I call the attention of the House to the proof. You may call it testimony or whatever else you please. Turn to the report of the testimony on page 130, and you will find the report made by the supervisors of the precinct appointed by the United States judge. One of these supervisors was appointed for the republican party, and the other for the democratic party, as the law required. In their returns they both certify that the vote was as the majority of the committee count it. It will be there seen by the supervisors' report that the vote is given as follows: The republican vote, 189; the democratic vote, 113. It is signed not only by Dr. Young, who was the republican supervisor, but it is also signed by Judge Carswell, who was the democratic supervisor.

But what further proof is there of the correctness of this vote, which the minority of the committee refuse to count? This report is sworn to by Mr. Young, on page 124 of the record. He swears to the correctness of that report, and that the vote was as counted. There is also exhibit B, the certificate of the clerk of the superior court of the county, and of John H. Perkins, in which this vote is stated exactly as it is in all these other papers to which I have referred; and the correctness of this exhibit is also sworn to by this democratic judge. When asked the question, he testifies, on page 89 of this report, that he is a democrat to the core; and yet he swears that he counted these votes, and that the count is correct.

The minority of this committee try to make this House believe, on page 23 of their report, that threats and intimidations were used to make these judges perform their duties and return these votes according to law. Well, now, I desire to call the attention of the House, if any member pleases to look at it, to the testimony on that point which is found in this printed record, and in which it will be shown that the only threats or intimidations that were used were merely telling them that they ought to make the return as the law required, and that they would be subject to the penalties of the law if they did not do it. I wish, sir, that such threats and intimidations were ever made to officers who neglect or fail to discharge their duties—threats and intimidations which only hold up to them the consequences of a willful and corrupt and partisan violation of the law, which tell them that they shall be prosecuted according as they have violated the law. I think such threats and intimidations as this ought ever to be made and to be encouraged.

The minority say further, on page 23 of their report:

> It will be a sad day for the purity of elections and the honor of our country when the rights of a Representative in Congress shall be dependent upon one so regardless of even the forms of the law, and so insensible to the obligations of his oath.

I think, sir, it will be a sadder day for the purity of elections when we can have the officers, the judges, and the clerks all of one political party, and when they refuse to make a return of the election for the sole reason that their party is defeated at the polls.

Now, sir, the next point made in the majority report is in relation to Liberty Hill. They did not change this vote at all. They left it precisely as the sitting member claims that it should be. They do not give the contestant anything which he claims in that precinct; and yet five pages of the report are taken up with a rehearsal of the testimony of colored men and animadverting on the action of the majority of the committee, when they have done no such thing as stated by the minority in their report.

The next precinct to which I desire to call attention is the precinct of Jeffersonton, in Camden County. At this precinct Mr. Sloan received 205 votes. The only question in regard to the vote of this precinct is, not whether it was fairly and impartially conducted—there is no claim that such was not the case—but in regard to the legality of the precinct. And, sir, upon that question the law is so clear and convincing that there cannot be, in my judgment, the possibility of a doubt in regard to it. And yet the minority take issue with us upon that question. The precinct of Jeffersonton, or Jefferson, as it is sometimes called, was established by an act of the Legislature of Georgia, approved December 21, 1821; and that act has never been repealed. That is as much as need to be said in regard to the legality of that precinct.

But, sir, there is another question connected with it to which it is perhaps well to call attention. The ordinary of the county, who had authority to abolish precincts in any place, except where they were at the court-house, did, in 1868, undertake to abolish this precinct. But it was then the court-house of the county, and, by section 1312 of the code of Georgia, the ordinary has no power to abolish a precinct which was at the court-house or county seat; so that his order was absolutely void. And that is the only question there is in regard to this. It is true that the court-house was afterward removed, a law authorizing its removal having been passed. But, sir, this order being void at the time it was made, and the precinct having been established by an act of the Legislature, which is unrepealed, I claim that there is no question in regard to its validity. It is true that the minority of the committee referred to a report made in the Legislature of Georgia in regard to the election in this very precinct, which was held in October, before the November election in 1872, for members of the Legislature. Well, sir, I have that report here. It is very short, and it is a very interesting document. But I do not propose to take time to read it. I will merely state that it shows that a Legislature in which the majority was overwhelmingly democratic threw out this precinct in order to give a democrat his seat in the Georgia Legislature, and send a republican home, who, they stated themselves in their report, had a majority of the legal votes in his district. That is the fact to which the majority of the committee refer. It may be very good authority for my friends who make the minority report, but it is very poor authority for me, and I do not propose to follow it in this or in any other case.

I next desire to call the attention of the House to the returns for Bullock County. And to show the House how liberal the majority of the committee have been with the sitting member and with his claim, I will state that in the county of Bullock he was allowed the vote of every precinct but one. According to the returns 568 votes were cast for Rawls, and not a single vote for Sloan, the republican candidate. The majority of the committee has allowed this whole return except one precinct return, in regard to which it does not show, a single part or syllable of it, from what county or precinct it was made, or where the election was held, or in what district of Georgia it was held. I say, sir, that we have allowed the returns of this county; and yet, sir, what are the facts? I desire to call the attention of the House to the facts in regard to this Bullock County return. And I say at the outset that there could not be conceived a case where every provision which the law makes for the purity of elections had been more completely violated than it was in the case of Bullock County. Why, sir, what was done with the returns? As soon as the precinct returns were made they were sent to the county seat, and not a single one of them was ever delivered into the hands of one of those officers whom the law designates as the parties to receive and consolidate them. But, on the other hand, they were every one delivered to a man by the name of Sorrier, a lawyer, who lived at the county seat, a partisan of the sitting member, who took those returns and poll-books and ballot-boxes and ballots, every paper and every ballot appertaining to that election, into his exclusive control, and so kept them for about two weeks after the election, and he never turned over those papers, never turned over the copies of the returns or the poll-lists or ballots to the clerk of the superior court of that county, as required by law, and nobody knows what has become of the ballots. It is supposed that he destroyed them; but anyhow they were in his possession, and have never come out of it. That man made up this return and signed the names of the managers of the election to it; and yet they swear that they never saw the return and never signed it, and some of them swear that they never authorized him to sign it, and did not know anything about its being made. He kept the returns in his possession until the returns from the other counties in the district had all been sent forward and had been received at the office of the secretary of state, and then he put in this return: 568 votes for Mr. Rawls, and not a single vote for the contestant in this case.

I may say here that the majority of the committee, desiring to show all fairness to Mr. Rawls in this case, desired not to throw out a single vote, unless it was absolutely required by law that they should do it; but if you count every vote that has been returned to the office of the secretary of state Mr. Sloan is elected, or if you go into particulars, if you take the evidence and exclude votes upon strict technicalities and questions of law, then also Mr. Sloan would be elected by a very much larger majority. Yet, strange as it may seem, the minority in their report complain of the action of the majority, because they do not count the votes of all the precincts—because there is one precinct in this county which they do not count.

Well now, sir, what is the fact in regard to that precinct? On page 39 of part second of this printed record will be found the return from the precinct which was rejected by the majority of the committee. If you examine the returns you will see that it is a return of the State of Georgia, but it does not say of what county or precinct. There is not a single syllable in it, or in the oath or certificate, or anything else, which shows what district of Georgia it was made from; and I say that, after rejecting, as we must reject, this consolidated return, which was made by a man who had no authority whatever to make it, and who had no connection whatever with the election—after rejecting that as wholly inadmissible, we certainly cannot count a precinct return which does not show from what county it comes; and yet, sir, we are charged by the minority of the committee with unfair discriminations against the sitting member. Why, sir, here is some of their language:

> The undersigned cannot concur in the conclusion of the majority of the committee, to reject the returns of the forty-fifth district of Bullock County, which gives Mr. Rawls 75 majority, and at the same time accept the returns of one of the precincts of Camden County, giving Mr. Sloan a majority of 205, and also the returns of Bryan County, giving Mr. Sloan a majority of 72.

Sir, there is a broad difference between this return and the return of Bryan County; and I wish to call attention to the fact that the minority of the committee, in copying that return into their records, omit the certificate of the secretary of state which was attached to that return, while on the page before, in speaking of the return from Camden County, they give that certificate, because in the former case the certificate of the secretary of state does not say anything about where the return came from; but in the one in regard to Bryan County it does, and for some reasons, best known, perhaps, to the gentlemen themselves, they have omitted it. But I call attention to it, and I call attention to the further fact that there is not a syllable of evidence impeaching the correctness of this Bryan County return. There was no complaint made by the sitting member against it, no testimony against it, and how could the majority of the committee arbitrarily throw out a return which, although it may not be perfectly regular on its face, is certified by the secretary of state, as the return from that county, and is not complained of by Mr. Rawls, and not proved to be incorrect by him in any particular. I say there is a difference between these cases which they cite here in an attempt to show that the majority of the committee has used unjust discrimination. Turn to page 25 of their report and there you find the Bullock County precinct return. That return was rejected by the majority of the committee, because there is not a word, there is not anything in the return itself, or in the testimony, to show what county it was from.

Now, sir, there are many questions connected with the vote in the city of Savannah to which, if I had time, I should be glad to call the attention of the House; and I do desire to call the attention to one point in regard to that vote. They undertook there, for the purpose of evading the statute of the United States called the enforcement law, or for some other purpose best known to themselves, to establish four voting places in one precinct. The laws of Georgia require that there shall be only one voting place in a militia district; and yet, if you will turn to page 278 of the printed record, you will find a plan of the court-house in which they established four different ballot-boxes at one precinct, with four complete and distinct sets of officers of the election.

Now for this precinct, under the law of the United States, two supervisors of the election had been appointed. In the report of one of said supervisors which we give here in the report of the majority of the committee, one of them states that it was impossible for him to superintend more than one of those ballot-boxes. I believe that such an evasion and violation of the law would justify the committee in throwing out the entire vote of the city of Savannah. But the committee have done no such thing. Although Mr. Rawls received a large majority there, although the election was there so conducted that the supervisors could inspect only one of the four ballot-boxes, although an attempt was made to have the whole county, some parts of which I am informed were twenty-three miles from the court-house, vote at this one precinct, where every obstruction in the way of objecting to the votes of colored men, requiring them to be sworn that they had paid their taxes, and everything of that kind was resorted to before their votes were received, yet the committee have disregarded all these irregularities and have counted the entire vote in favor of Mr. Rawls.

Mr. Speaker, as my time has about expired, I will, in conclusion, only call the attention of the House to the recapitulation of the vote on pages 12 and 13 of the majority report as printed. It will there be seen that, counting the votes actually on file in the office of the secretary of state, and to which he has certified, Mr. Sloan had a majority of 12 votes. But adding the votes of the other precincts, which I think I have clearly shown Mr. Sloan is entitled to, he has a majority of 136 votes. I say that the committee has been liberal to Mr. Rawls; they have not rejected at least 700 or 800 votes which, if you were to give a strict construction to the law, they would be required to reject from his vote; and I say candidly I should vote to reject them if it were necessary to the decision of this case. I believe that this majority of only 136 for Mr. Sloan has been reduced to that number by counting several hundred votes for the sitting member which, according to the law and according to a fair construction of the rules of evidence, he is not entitled to, and would not receive if this question was to be tried in any court of justice. But as it was not necessary, as it made no difference in the result, as Mr. Sloan is elected even if you count all those votes, in order to avoid the possibility of complaint on the part of the sitting member and of his friends, the committee have counted them all, and yet Mr. Sloan is elected by a majority of 136 votes.

Mr. SPEER. I do not propose, Mr. Speaker, in the remarks which I shall submit to the House, to go over all the controverted points in this volume of testimony, and in the arguments of counsel which were made to the committee; nor, perhaps, shall I refer to all the points touched by the reports of the majority and the minority of the committee. I shall discuss chiefly those questions which of themselves are decisive of the case.

Sir, it surely is not the duty or the province of this House to elect Representatives to Congress; that is the duty of the people. But it has of late years become the custom or the practice for the House to elect those whom the people have defeated. Hence for the last several years Congress has been flooded with contested-election cases. And the case before us is so fruitful of indications from beginning to end of the contestant's faith that this custom would be followed in his case, that no gentleman who will read over carefully the evidence can come to any other conclusion than that this contestant had made up his mind long before the election to contest it in the event of his defeat at the polls. His friends, both before and after the election, boasted defiantly that Sloan would get his seat. That kind of boasting is spread over the testimony from one end to the other; and perhaps their prophecy is to ripen into the fulfillment of possession and enjoyment by the action of this body to-day.

I do not propose to reply at much length to that portion of the argument of the gentleman who preceded me which complains of the report of the minority. It is true that we were amazed at the effrontery of the contestant in asking the committee to throw out 105 votes for the sitting member, on the ground, as he alleged, that certain colored persons who could not read or write had voted for him, and their votes were not counted. He called some sixty of these colored persons, only two or three of whom could read and write, several of whom swore that they voted for both the contestant and contestee, and for Grant and Greeley, and that the only way they knew how they voted was that they got their tickets from Tom, Dick, or Harry. Strange to say, the majority, when their report was first drawn and read to the committee, counted the votes of these witnesses for the contestant, in addition to the votes given him by the election returns. With the understanding that they were to be counted in the report as submitted to the House, the minority of the committee expressed their amazement at the effrontery of the contestant's demand, and their additional amazement that the committee should heed that demand and count those votes.

And now, after that report was so read to the committee, counting those additional votes for the contestant, and when that count has since been stricken out without the knowledge of the minority, and we have left our arguments against the counting of those votes in the minority report, my friend from the majority comes into the House to-day and lectures the minority for making an argument against the counting of those very votes which he had counted in the majority report as he read it to the committee, and which he only struck out after he heard the minority report read, and which we did not know were stricken out and were not counted until his report was printed.

With what kind of countenance can a member of the committee come here and lecture the minority for constructing an argument against his, without knowledge that he had yielded to the force of our argument, until after the reports were printed? We find that for some reason he has omitted that branch of his report; and then he criticises us for not omitting that branch of ours. We would have omitted it if we had known the argument had been so effectual upon the minds of the majority as to compel them to strike out that part of their report. It is true that this branch of the report of the minority had more virtue in it than we anticipated. We did not know that it would have so much efficacy as to induce the withdrawal of those 35 or 40 additional votes that were counted for the contestant. As the count of those votes has been withdrawn by the majority, there is now no contest here as to Liberty precinct, Burke County. We say those votes should not be counted, and the majority do not count them. They are not, then, in controversy; and the gentleman's reference to this precinct only shows how reluctantly he was compelled to part with the child of his early love.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I propose to show that, in any view that can be taken of this case, no gentleman who regards the law of the case and the obligation which he has taken as a member of the House, can vote to seat the contestant. Taking as a basis the majority report itself, giving them every doubtful precinct, giving the contestant every vote that rests upon controverted evidence, I propose to show, as a question of law, that beyond peradventure the sitting member is entitled to his seat.

The return as originally made, elected the sitting member by a majority of 1,340 votes. The majority report holds that the contestant was elected by a majority of 136. There is an error of 9 votes, which I think my friend will agree with me has been made by the majority in favor of Sloan. It is not material whether those 9 votes be counted or not, because the result, in my view of the case, will be the same. But Scotland precinct, in Emanuel County, gave Sloan 19 votes and Rawls 10 votes; giving Sloan a majority of 9. In that precinct the officers were not sworn, and the return is signed by only two managers instead of three, as the law requires. The law of Georgia requires a copy of the oath of the election officers to be transmitted with the ballots and the poll-lists. In this case there was no such oath transmitted, and no such oath taken, so far as the evidence shows; and the election was not held by the three officers, as required by law. Hence those 9 votes should not be counted as a part of the majority of Mr. Sloan, and so I understood the majority report to concede, as it was read in the committee. That would reduce the majority of Mr. Sloan, according to the reasoning of the majority of the committee, to 127. Starting, then, either with 136, as the report makes it, or with 127, as we say it ought to be, and as the majority of the committee will, I think, admit—starting either with 136 or 127 majority for Mr. Sloan, upon their own basis let us see now what becomes of the case.

The minority say that Jeffersonton precinct, in Camden County, should not be counted. We submit to this House, as a plain proposition of law, that Jeffersonton precinct was not a legal voting place, under the plain letter of the statute of Georgia—a statute well understood and recognized, and enforced by the action of the house of representatives of the Georgia Legislature in 1863, in an election contest arising upon and determined by the result of this poll. If that be so, the votes cast there, or alleged to have been cast there, are of no more legal validity than if they had been cast in a barn, or a pig-sty, or a sheep-pen. In the first place, what is the law, and then what is the evidence as applicable to the question? The section of the Georgia code which bears upon this point is section 1312; which reads as follows:

SEC. 1312. Such election shall be held at the court-houses of the respective counties, and, if no court-house, at some place within the limits of the county site, and at the several election precincts thereof, if any, established or to be established. Said precincts must not exceed one in each militia district. Such precincts are established, changed, or abolished by the justices of the inferior court, descriptions of which must be entered on their minutes at the time.

Now, Jeffersonton had been the county site of Camden County. It had been the place where the courts sat to administer justice. Under the law of Georgia it was the place to hold the elections; it was the county site. It is true a republican ordinary—in 1868, I believe—made an order abolishing it as an election precinct; but the law having established the county site as an election precinct, the order of the ordinary abolishing it was void. He had authority to establish election precincts outside of the county site; but as the law established the county site as a precinct, the act of the ordinary could not abolish it. The republicans wanted to abolish that precinct in 1868; but the order, I say, was void, because Jeffersonton, being the county site, was established by law as a voting place. But afterward, the Legislature of Georgia passed an act submitting to the people the question whether Jeffersonton should remain the county site of Camden County. If a majority voted in favor of it, it was to continue the county site; if a majority voted against it, the county site was to be removed.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. Will my colleague permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. SPEER. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. Do you claim that Jeffersonton became an election precinct by being the county seat?

Mr. SPEER. It was established as an election precinct many years ago by act of assembly. I maintain this: it was an election precinct under the revised code, if at all, by virtue of having been the county seat.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. It was established as the county seat in 1820 or 1821.

Mr. SPEER. Yes, sir.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. By a specific act of the Legislature, which has never been repealed, either directly or by implication.

Mr. SPEER. I thought you wanted to ask me a question.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. I ask you that question, whether you claim it was an election precinct by virtue of its being the county seat? If so, your argument is legitimate; but if the election precinct existed by act of the Legislature, then you have to do away with the act of the Legislature.

Mr. SPEER. The interruption by my friend is not at all offensive. I am glad to have it. I claim this, that by the code of Georgia every county seat was made an election precinct. Jeffersonton, being the county seat, became, under the terms of the code, an election precinct.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. It was before.

Mr. SPEER. I say it was even before the war, and it was continued then under the code of Georgia, adopted after the war, as an election district; but I maintain that, it never having been established since the adoption of the code of Georgia as a precinct, otherwise than as it was made a precinct by the code, being the county seat, the moment the county seat was removed from Jeffersonton it ceased to be a voting precinct. It will not be pretended that the adoption of the code of Georgia, providing the time, place, and manner of holding elections throughout the entire State; providing how, when, and where election precincts should be established, did not repeal the act of the Legislature upon this subject of 1820. The Legislature of Georgia covered all these questions and all these subjects in the code adopted since the war. Now, if I am correct, then Jeffersonton was a voting precinct under the law, because, and only because, it was a county seat. Then if it ceased to be the county seat, it ceased to be a lawful voting precinct. That proposition is as clear, it seems to me, as the sun at noonday.

I say, then, that the Georgia Legislature passed a law submitting the question to the people of Camden County whether Jeffersonton should continue to be the county seat. They voted that it should not; and on page 47 of the testimony taken by the contestant himself it is proved that at the time this election for Congress was held, in 1872, it was not the place where the courts were held.

Joseph Shepard, sworn by the contestant, page 47 of the testimony, testifies:

> Cross-question. Where was the court-house of Camden County at the day of election, and did you preside at the court-house in holding the election?
> Answer. The county site is in Saint Mary's. There is no court-house building there. The town furnishes a house for court purposes. I presided at the town hall, which is used by the ordinary in holding his courts.

Here the evidence shows that in pursuance of the law authorizing a vote upon the question of removing the county seat it had been removed, and the several courts of that county, in the year 1872, when this election was held, were held at Saint Mary's.

What is the proposition of the majority of the committee? They maintain, in substance, that the act of the ordinary in abolishing the precinct was void, and that because the people had not torn down the court-house Jefferson continued to be the county seat for voting purposes.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. O, no; my colleague misstates the position of the majority of the committee.

Mr. SPEER. If the gentleman has any question to submit, I will yield to him.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. I hope my colleague on the committee will not misstate the views of the majority. They predicate their finding upon the fact that there was an election precinct at Jeffersonton, under the act of 1820, and under that alone. That elections have been held at that precinct from that time to this fall is not questioned.

Mr. SPEER. The chairman of the committee is a good lawyer, and an honest one. Let me put to him a question in good faith. Do you say that the code of Georgia did not repeal that act of 1820? Answer yes or no.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. I am surprised the gentleman asserts it.

Mr. SPEER. Answer yes or no.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. I say no; there is not a vestige of logic to sustain any proposition like it.

Mr. SPEER. Very well; then there is simply a difference of opinion. I do not understand the conclusion of the majority to be placed solely on that ground. It refers to the act of 1821, and speaks of the repeal of statutes by construction, but also refers to the act of the ordinary as being void, and claims that the election was held in good faith.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. If the gentleman will permit me, I will read the act of the Legislature of Georgia making this a voting district.

Mr. SPEER. The gentleman can read it at the conclusion of my remarks.

Now, I affirm that the report of the majority of the committee can rest alone upon the position, as I view it, that Jeffersonton continued the county seat of Camden County as long as one log of the court-house rested upon another. If a fire burned the court-house down, it would cease to be a county seat. If a tornado should blow it down, it would cease to be a county seat. But as long as it stands, until time shall have wasted it away, it shall be a voting place.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him once more?

Mr. SPEER. Certainly; I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. The majority report, on page 8, says that this precinct was designated and made a voting district by an act of the Legislature of Georgia, approved December 21, 1821. That is the ground on which the majority put it, and none other.

Mr. SPEER. Well, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me almost useless labor, in the time I have, to argue to this House that that act of 1821 has been repealed. But I am surprised that the chairman of the committee should venture to state here, or anywhere, his opinion that that law is still in force. I am amazed that any lawyer would presume to give such an opinion, that that act of the Assembly of Georgia is in force, when the legislation of Congress for years recognized Georgia as a Territory, without organization or laws; when its whole government had been overthrown, and when the party in power treated the State as a prostrate and dependent province. And no gentleman was firmer, I presume, in the advocacy of the reconstruction policy of Congress than the present chairman of the Committee on Elections. When the State was helplessly under the control of Congress, without representation here, and ruled by Federal bayonets, no one on the other side of the House ever whispered that the laws of Georgia, enacted before the war, were still in force. And when the State had been thoroughly reconstructed, and had been permitted to resume her place in the Union, recognizing the new order of things, her Legislature passed a general election law—embracing the whole State—establishing certain places as voting precincts, and providing how any others needed should be established. And yet in the face of these facts, for the purpose of turning out a democrat and putting in a republican here, the gentleman will disregard his record for the past ten years, and insist that a local statute of Georgia, passed in 1821, survives the war; survives the reconstruction measures of Congress, and the subsequent legislation of Georgia providing complete and ample machinery for all elections, establishing places of voting throughout the State.

To exhume this local statute from the ashes of the war, and attempt to vitalize it in this House to-day, may suit the tastes and purposes of the majority of the committee, but the desperate necessity for the performance is all that can be urged in its defense.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. My colleague's political friends always recognized it as an election precinct until a colored man got to be elected there to the Legislature.

Mr. SPEER. If that is true, it is not in the evidence, and is unknown to me. And as it is not in the evidence, and is not claimed to be, it is certainly improper for the chairman to make such a statement on this floor. I see by the evidence that it was abolished as a voting precinct by a republican ordinary in 1868.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. Elections were held there afterward.

Mr. SPEER. Precisely so. Still the evidence shows that the gentleman's party abolished it as a voting precinct.

Now I submit to this House, in view of the law of the case, in view of the undisputed fact that the county seat was not at Jeffersonton, but at Saint Mary's, that the courts were held at Saint Mary's, that no courts were held that year at Jeffersonton, with what degree of fairness can any gentleman on this floor, with a knowledge of the facts, admit the vote of Jefferson precinct?

Why, sir, this very question arose in the Legislature of Georgia, in a contest for a seat in the house of representatives in 1873, between two gentlemen claiming to have been elected the month before this election for Congress. The question was whether the vote cast at Jeffersonton should or should not be counted; and I hold in my hand the journal of the house of representatives of the Georgia Legislature, showing the action of the house on that subject, and I ask the Clerk to read it.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Your committee, to whom was referred the contested-election case from the county of Camden, beg leave to report, that we have carefully examined the law and evidence, and find from the testimony that there were polled 595 votes for a representative in the most numerous branch in the General Assembly, on the 2d day of October, 1872; that Henry L. Hillyer received 306 of said votes, and Ray Tompkins received 289 votes. Your committee further ascertained that there were votes cast at two precincts in the same militia districts, to wit: Jeffersonton and Satilla Mills; and we are of opinion that the votes cast at Jeffersonton precinct were illegal, because the evidence shows that no such precinct existed by law and that the election at that precinct was null and void, because it was not held at the proper place, according to paragraph 1362 of Irwin's Revised Code.

The number of votes cast at that precinct for Hillyer was 180, for Ray Tompkins 24; which will leave the result as follows: For Hillyer, 180, 126—306; for Ray Tompkins 24, 265—289; leaving a majority for Tompkins of 139.

Your committee, therefore, recommend that Mr. Ray Tompkins, the duly elected representative from said county according to law, be permitted to retain his seat as a member of the General Assembly.

R. W. PHILLIPS, Chairman.

On motion of Mr. Phillips, the rules were suspended, and the foregoing report adopted.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. My colleague permits me to correct a statement I made a few moments ago, speaking from my recollection of the case. I find now that I was in error in stating that a colored man was elected in this precinct. It was a man alleged to be a carpet-bagger.

Mr. SPEER. I am always willing to yield to have justice done to a colored man as against a carpet-bagger.

Now, if the House agree with me that Jeffersonton precinct was not a legal voting place, then give this contestant every vote the committee give him, and he is beaten by 78. So that whether this House shall seat him or not, even if they follow the majority on matters of fact, depends on whether they regard this as a legal voting place. That will determine this case. While there is a volume of testimony here embracing a large number of pages, and while the arguments before the committee have been very elaborate, yet, conceding to the contestant every disputed question of fact, it all comes down here to the question whether the House shall count the votes cast at Jeffersonton.

It seems to me that those gentlemen who will take the time to look at the law with reference to this one precinct can come to no other conclusion than that at the election of 1872 there was no authority to hold an election at Jeffersonton. Saint Mary's at that time was the county seat, and an election was held there on the same day for the election of Congressmen. All those persons who wished to vote and had a legal right to vote could go to Saint Mary's and vote. It was the place established by law; an election was regularly held there, and in the teeth of the law, and of the knowledge of the voters there of what the law was, it was an act of defiance of the law on their part to go to a place not authorized for that purpose and hold an election. It is a singular fact, too, that the vote of that precinct was unanimous for Sloan; 205 votes are returned for Sloan and none for Rawls. It is a singular circumstance that this election held at an unauthorized place returns 205 votes for the contestant and not a single vote for the contestee, when at the election held the month before the democratic candidate for assembly received 24 votes.

Mr. CESSNA. I desire my colleague's permission to ask a question or two, right at this point, in regard to this matter.

Mr. SPEER. Very well.

Mr. CESSNA. Does my colleague found his argument on the belief, as a member of the committee, after having investigated the subject, that there were not 205 honest voters who honestly and fairly cast votes at that precinct for the contestant? Does he believe that as a matter of fact, without reference to the legality or illegality of the poll?

Mr. SPEER. What is your other question?

Mr. CESSNA. My second question is this: What was the political complexion of the committee of the Georgia Legislature which made the report that he has had read; and did not that question take shape in the Legislature of Georgia just as this question has taken shape in the Committee on Elections of this House? I ask these questions for information and not for the purpose of embarrassing the gentleman.

Mr. SPEER. I will answer the questions in the reverse order in which they have been put. The last question has been put by my colleague, I have no doubt, because he believes that election committees always decide contested cases as he did when he was on the Committee on Elections of this House, in favor of their own party. That is the only reason I can conceive of why he should ask such a question.

Mr. CESSNA. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I did not hear that remark.

Mr. SPEER. I cannot yield for further interruption.

Mr. CESSNA. I simply ask the gentleman to repeat his remark in regard to the Committee on Elections.

Mr. SPEER. I say that the only reason I can give for my colleague asking the last question is, that he believes that the committee on elections in the Legislature of Georgia decide cases as he did when he was on the Committee on Elections in this House, in favor of his own party.

Mr. CESSNA. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. SPEER. I have not time to yield further. I will answer your second question, and then proceed with my argument.

Mr. CESSNA. No; but the gentleman has no right to state what is not true as a matter of fact, and then refuse to allow a contradiction.

Mr. RANDALL. Will my colleague state when, as a member of the Committee on Elections, he reported otherwise than in favor of his own party?

Mr. CESSNA. In quite a number of cases.

Mr. SPEER. I do not want to do my colleague injustice, but as he volunteered an irrelevant question, I take occasion to add that if there is anything on this earth for which he is distinguished it is for the most unrelenting partisanship. If he shall ever rise to the dignity of being just to a political adversary I will be glad to state it, the first knowledge I have of the fact.

Now, as to the other question. Whether the votes cast at this precinct were cast by legal voters or not, I cannot say, because that question, as far as I recollect, was not raised before the committee, and was not considered by the committee. There was no testimony taken by the contestee in reference to this poll. He relied upon the legal proposition that Jeffersonton precinct was not a legal voting place; and, relying upon that, he did not go into the question of the character of the voters or the manner in which the election there was held. But the fact that all the votes cast were for the contestant seems to me to throw suspicion on the fairness of the election, when in the previous month 24 democratic votes were polled.

Now, if the House agrees with me in reference to this precinct, the contestee was elected by 78 votes, giving to the contestant every vote that the majority claim for him, and giving him the advantage of every irregularity alleged in the whole district from beginning to end.

But what further is there in this case? The majority of the committee throw out 75 votes in Bullock County. Why? Because they say that the return of the forty-fifth district of Bullock County does not show at what precinct the votes were cast; and yet they count two returns, this very Jeffersonton return and the Bryan County return, which are subject to the same objection, equally unsupported by the evidence for lack of which they rejected 75 votes in Bullock County.

What is the fact as to Bullock County? It is true that as to one precinct the election officers, when they came to fill up the return, forgot to write in the name of the county. The return was legally made and legally signed, but the election officers forgot to write in the name of the county. The certificate was headed, "State of Georgia, —— County." That was all that was deficient—the name of the county.

Now, what further? It is proved by two of the managers of that election that they held the election, and that it was properly held. I ask the Clerk to read from the testimony of two of the managers of that election, examined by the contestant, showing that it was properly held.

The Clerk read as follows:

JOHN GREEN sworn:

Question. Did you act as manager of the election in Bullock County, held on the 5th of November last, for presidential electors and member of the Forty-third Congress; and, if so, at what precinct?

Answer. I did, at the forty-fifth militia district, known as the Club-House, in the capacity of notary public and ex officio justice of the peace. Hiram Franklin and John Jones presided with me.

JOHN G. JONES sworn:

Question. Did you, as one of the managers, bring to the court-house the returns of the election held at the forty-fifth district precinct in this county on the 5th day of November last for presidential electors and member of Congress; and, if so, what did you do with them?

Answer. As one of the managers at that precinct, I brought the returns to the court-house. I returned them to B. J. Sims the morning after the election. I know nothing more about them.

Mr. SPEER. Now it appears from that testimony of two of the officers who made the precinct return, and whose names are signed to it, that they held the election in that precinct, and that it was regularly and fairly held. Yet the committee reject this vote because, in making their certificates, the officers omitted to put in the name of the county. I suppose the certificates were furnished by the officers of the different counties with printed headings, and the election officers ought to have written in the blank the name of the county, which they omitted. And in the face of this testimony, that that precinct election was fairly held, and that the precinct returns on file in the office of the secretary of state were regularly signed by the officers authorized by law to hold the election, yet simply because the name of the county is omitted, the committee throw out the returns. Yet they count the Jeffersonton precinct and the Bryan County return, which give majorities for the contestant, when there is no evidence from any quarter as to how the elections were there held, and when the certificates in both cases are defective. There is nothing in the proof to show the time of the Bryan County election, or the place of the consolidation of the returns. Nor is there anything to show the place of the Jeffersonton election, so far as the certificate to the return is concerned.

Why, then, that discrimination? Why count the two in favor of the contestant and reject the others against him, if the committee wished to be fair? Upon every principle of fairness and justice this forty-fifth district of Bullock County should be counted. If the vote is not right and honest, why did not the contestant attack it? He urges nothing against the legality of the vote itself; simply that it was not technically legally returned. He calls not a single witness to assail the honesty of the vote, to show that the election was not properly held at the proper place and the proper day. But because the certificate itself is defective in the omission of the word "Camden," 75 votes are taken from Mr. Rawls. Yet in the face of similar defects in other returns they count nearly 300 votes for Mr. Sloan. I hold that the forty-fifth district of Bullock County should be counted, and that would increase the majority for the sitting member, upon the basis of the report of the majority itself, to 153 votes.

Then we come to the Lawtonville precinct in Burke County. That vote was not returned at all by the election officers. A return was made by the United States supervisors of election of 189 votes for Sloan and 113 for Rawls, giving 76 majority to Sloan; and the committee count that return. It was not in the consolidation; it was not returned by the election officers. They expressly refused to return it, because two of them swear that after an absence of a few minutes in the afternoon from the election room, on their return they found the ballots thrown out of the boxes on the floor, lying loose on the floor mixed with other ballots, and one of the supervisors by the name of Young, (Young by name, but old in fraud,) a friend of the contestant, aided by some other parties there, was assorting them and counting them. Young said that the ballots as assorted and counted there did not agree with the tally-list; that they tried to make them agree and they could not. Those election officers who had been absent but fifteen or twenty minutes from the room refused to have anything to do with the election. This man Young, who had emptied the ballots out, was busy assorting the tickets, which he had no legal right to handle at all. He had one of the election officers arrested afterward, and told the other that it would be to his (Young's) interest to have the vote as he counted it returned, and that Sloan would go to Congress anyhow.

Here is the testimony:

H. L. PERKINS sworn:

Question. Where do you reside?

Answer. In the sixty-first district of Burke County, Georgia.

Q. Did you attend an election or any voting place in the aforesaid county on the 5th day of November, 1872, when presidential electors, and Morgan Rawls and Andrew Sloan, candidates for Congress, were voted for?

A. I attended the election. I do not know whether it was on the 5th day of November or not. I think it was, though. I attended the election at Lawtonville, in the sixty-first district.

Q. Who were the managers at that place of the election?

A. John H. Perkins, William Warnock, and myself.

Q. Did you make up a return of said election, certify to the same, and send it forward for consolidation with the other precinct returns of Burke County?

A. I did not.

Q. Did the managers at the aforesaid precinct make up, certify to, and send forward a return of said election?

A. We did not.

(Counsel for contestant objects on the ground that the witness cannot know whether other managers besides himself made up, certified, and sent up such return.)

Q. Why did not the managers make up, certify to, and send forward a return of that election?

A. The reason I did not sign it was because the ballot-boxes were emptied during my absence. The same reasons were assigned by William Warnock for not so doing.

Q. When was the ballot-box emptied, and where were the purported ballots when you returned, that caused you to refuse to make up, certify to, and send forward a return?

A. The ballot-boxes were emptied on the floor of the room, and when I saw the p rported ballots they were lying loose on the floor. The voting was done in the same room I saw the ballots lying.

Q. Did you authorize any person to empty said ballot-box and turn the ballots out loosely upon the floor?

A. I did not.

Q. Who was in the room and near the ballots lying loose on the floor when you returned?

A. Doctor Young and Judge Carswell, who were the supervisors; George Warnock, who was a clerk, and John H. Perkins, who was a manager, were around the purported ballots lying on the floor.

Q. What did Dr. Young have to do with said election?

A. He was supervisor for the republican party.

Q. Did Dr. Young handle the ballot-box, or the loose ballots on the floor?

A. He did handle the loose ballots; he said he was assorting them.

Q. Was Dr. Young handling these ballots when you returned and found said ballots loose on the floor?

A. He was.

Q. Were there not many loose ballots lying around the room where said election was held that had not been polled?

A. There were some. I do not know how many.

Q. Did any party attempt, on or after the day of said election, to induce you to make up and certify to a return of said election?

A. They did.

Q. Please state the name of said party.

A. Dr. Young.

Q. What did Dr. Young say to you?

(Counsel for contestant objects to witness stating anything that occurred between himself and Dr. Young unless contestant was present at the time.)

A. Dr. Young sent for me to come to see him. I came. He said it would be much better for me to sign up those papers as a manager of said election, as it would save me a great deal of trouble, for by signing them and getting John Perkins to sign them would put an end to any future trouble; that Sloan would go to Congress anyhow. He said that I would have to go to Savannah, and be put to a great deal of trouble and expense in February, at the next sitting of the United States court. He also used the argument to induce me to sign said papers, that Sloan was a superior man to Rawls, and that Sloan would go to Congress any way, and it would be best to sign up without any trouble; that he (Young) would get Judge Carswell to sign up also; and that if John Perkins and myself would sign, it would not make any difference whether William Warnock did or not. He said that it would be to his interest for me to sign the papers.

Q. Were any of the managers of the aforesaid precinct election arrested? If so, when, and by whom?

A. William Warnock was arrested by Deputy Marshal Smith. It was after the election in November, I think.

Q. How long after said election was it when Warnock was arrested?

A. Not more than three weeks, I think, after said election.

Q. Had Warnock been arrested when Young endeavored to get you to certify to this precinct election?

A. He had.

Q. Who represented Mr. Andrew Sloan here in this neighborhood since the election in endeavoring to get you to sign and certify to the aforesaid election return, and getting up witnesses to be used in this contest?

A. Dr. Young has been representing Mr. Sloan by trying to get me to sign those papers. And I hear that he has been getting up witnesses for Sloan among the negroes at night at their club meetings, and other places, I suppose.

(Counsel for contestant objects to witness stating what he has heard.)

Q. Are you well acquainted with Dr. Young, in this neighborhood, and with the people of this neighborhood?

(Counsel for contestant objects upon the ground that the matter inquired about has no connection with this case.)

A. I have known Dr. Young intimately for fourteen years. I was raised here, and I know all the people in this neighborhood.

Q. What political party received the majority of the votes polled at the Lawtonville precinct, in the sixty-first district, in Burke County, when the aforesaid election was held, at the October election just preceding the election held for presidential electors and Congressmen?

A. The democratic party—I mean the candidates of the democratic party—received the majority of votes.

Q. How has the majority of the votes polled at said precinct been in the last several elections, politically?

A. Democratic.

(Counsel for contestant objects to the last two questions and answers upon the grounds that there is better evidence of the facts stated. The election returns themselves, of the several elections named, constitute the proper evidence on this point.)

Q. Was there a large number of democratic electors present and voted at the election at the aforesaid precinct on the 5th day of November, 1872?

A. There was a large number of men there who voted. They belonged to the democratic party.

Q. Who was known as the democratic candidate for Congress, at that election?

A. Morgan Rawls.

Q. Why did you not make up, certify to, and send forward to the court-house, for consolidation with the other precinct returns of Burke County, the ballots polled at that precinct, or the result of the election at said precinct?

A. Because in the evening after the voting was closed we had a recess. Two of the managers left the room, leaving the boxes in charge of the third manager until we returned. When I returned I found the ballots out of the boxes and on the floor, in such a condition that I could not certify to the number or for whom they were cast, the boxes having been opened and the ballots taken out in the absence of H. L. Perkins and myself, two of the managers.

Q. Were there any loose election tickets lying around that had not been polled by any elector at that election?

A. There were a few; I don't think very many.

Q. Did you make an effort, when you returned and found the ballot-boxes emptied on the floor, to verify the list of voters; and what did that effort show?

A. I did not. Mr. John H. Perkins, one of the managers, and Dr. Young, one of the supervisors, said they could not make them agree; that there were seven ballots short, or over, I disremember which.

Q. How long were you and H. L. Perkins absent from the room during this recess, when these ballot-boxes were emptied upon the floor?

A. I think it was about fifteen or twenty minutes; it might have been longer, or not so long; it was a short time.

Q. Before leaving the room, in attempting to tally any of the ballots, did you call out to the clerks, Wheeler and Wilson, and Grover and Baker, for the purpose of having tallies made thereof?

A. I did not.

Q. Did you upon leaving the room remark that you would not return, or say that you were tired and were going home, and did not care to count out republican tickets?

A. I did not.

Q. Did H. L. Perkins make any such remark?

A. Not in my hearing. We left the room together.

Q. Did you return to the room for the purpose of completing said election; and would you have carried out that intention had it not been for finding the ballot-boxes emptied and the ballots scattered on the floor?

A. I did return for that purpose, and would have done it, had it not been for that cause.

Q. Did you ever state to Dr. Young that a report he made of said election, as supervisor, was correct?

A. I did not, and did not know that he had made one, only from hearsay.

In view of these facts and the character of Young, and of the further fact that in October, 1872, but one month before this election, Smith, democrat, for governor, had 139, and Walker, republican, only 41 votes at this precinct, and that it had always been democratic, the pretended majority for Sloan, of 76, is covered with suspicion and should be rejected.

That would take off 76 votes from the majority report, and would leave the majority for the sitting member 229.

Now a word or two about the three outlying precincts in Chatham County, which were established by the ordinary as voting places in 1868, for the presidential election of that year. There had been no election held there from 1868 to 1872. In the mean time a governor had been elected, members of the Legislature had been elected, and county officers had been elected, and no man, woman, or child in Chatham County had thought of going to one of those places to vote until this congressional election in 1872.

Here is the order by which they were established as precincts for the election of 1868, by a republican ordinary, the officer authorized to do so under the code of Georgia:

OCTOBER 22, 1868.

It being necessary that election precincts should be established in the county, in order to facilitate the election to be held on the 3d day of November next, it is therefore ordered, that election precincts be, and they are hereby, established at Cherokee Hill, in the eighth militia district, embracing the whole of said district; at Chapman's house, in the seventh militia district, embracing the whole of said district; and on the Isle of Hope, embracing the whole of the fifth and sixth militia districts.

HENRY S. WETMORE,
Ordinary of Chatham County.

The universal understanding of the people of all parties was that these precincts were established for the one election only, and such was the purpose of the ordinary, as he swears, thus:

Question. What legal precincts did you recognize as places of voting on the 5th day of November, 1872, when a member of the Forty-third Congress was voted for in Chatham County?

(Counsel for contestant objects to the question, on the ground that the recognition of witness in the premises has nothing to do with the issue in the case.)

Answer. My opinion is, and was at the date referred to, that there were no legal election precincts in Chatham County at election referred to; that the only legal polling place was at the court-house, in Chatham County.

Q. Were you appealed to or requested, on or before the 5th day of November, 1872, to establish election precincts outside the limits of the city of Savannah, in Chatham County; and, if so, by whom, and to what political party did those appealing or requesting belong?

(Counsel for contestant objects to the question, on the ground that it is not in rebuttal nor in support of any allegation contained in contestee's allegations.)

A. The day preceding the election in question I was asked by Mr. J. E. Bryant, whom I understood to be a committee for this purpose, to establish the same election precincts in Chatham County as were established for the presidential election of 1868. Hearsay makes Mr. J. E. Bryant a republican.

Q. When you speak of the precincts established for the presidential election in 1868, in Chatham County, do you mean that they were only established for that election?

(Counsel for contestant makes same objection as to the previous question.)

A. As ordinary of Chatham County, I inherited the powers of the old inferior court, which, among other things, had the authority to establish or abolish election precincts, conformably to the code of Georgia, in certain forms. Pursuant to this authority, and in accordance with the law, I established several election precincts in Chatham County for the election to be held for President in 1868. It was my intention, when I established these precincts, to have them in force only for the election referred to.

Cross-question. Does it not require an order of the court of ordinary to abolish a precinct once established by an order of the same?

A. If precincts are established without any limitation as to their use I would say an order would have been made to abolish them.

Cross-question. Would you state what words, if any, in the order 22d October, 1868, constitute the limitation that would abolish the precinct in question without an order?

A. It is my opinion, and it was my intention, that the following words, "being necessary that election precincts should be established in the county to facilitate the elections to be held on the 3d day of November next," being the first part of the order of October 22, 1868, should limit the establishment of election precincts in Chatham County for the day recited in the order only.

Cross-question. Does the order itself state that the precinct shall exist for that day only?

A. That is a matter of interpretation of meaning. I think that the abolishment is a fair inference, at least from the context of the order, and so treated it for four years; and to the best of my knowledge and belief it was so treated for four years.

Cross-question. What necessity, if any, existed at the time of the passage of the order for the establishment of precincts in the county, that did not exist at subsequent elections of a similar character?

A. In 1868 it seemed to me at least proper to try the experiment of new polling places, then not existing in the county; the managers of some of these polling places reported violence and intimidation shown them; and regarding these precincts established only for the presidential election of 1868, I afterward concluded it better to have the elections held only at the court-house, under the eye of the sheriff and his deputies, so that, if possible, peace and good order could be preserved.

It will be seen from the above testimony that, on the day preceding this election, Mr. Bryant, the friend of Sloan, asked the ordinary to re-establish these precincts, and he refused. It is thus shown that the contestant himself, a lawyer residing in Savannah, knew these places were not legal voting precincts.

But how and by whom were these elections held? The following testimony shows:

KING S. THOMAS sworn:

Question. What office did you hold in Chatham County on the 5th day of November last?

Answer. I was justice of the peace.

Q. In that capacity did you act as manager of an election on that day for presidential electors and member of Congress, and where?

A. I did, at Isle of Hope, Chatham County.

Q. Who were the other managers of that election?

A. Joseph Sneed and Lewis Bennett, freeholders.

Cross-question. Where did you and the other persons who attempted to hold an election at the so-called precincts reside at the time of said election?

A. Lewis Bennett and myself resided in the city of Savannah, and Joseph Sneed at White Bluff, in the sixth district. Lewis J. Moody resided in the seventh district, at Chapman's house. John A. Staley resided in the city of Savannah; Depont C. Rice resided in the city of Savannah; Isaac Seeley resided in the city of Savannah; James Porter resided in the city of Savannah; Avery Smith resided in the city of Savannah. The names of the clerks at the Isle of Hope were John H. Deveaux, who resided in Savannah, Isaac Beckett, who resided in Savannah, and William Cantwell, who resided in Savannah. Charles O. Fisher resided in Savannah; John J. Newton resided in Savannah. I was mistaken about William Cantwell being a clerk at Isle of Hope; he was at one of the other precincts; do not know which. Those are the only clerks whose names I know.

Cross-question. Did you and the other managers of the election, and clerks at said election, held at the so-called precinct at Isle of Hope, cast votes for presidential electors, and member of the Forty-third Congress?

A. I and the other managers and clerks, except one, voted at that election. I voted for Andrew Sloan. To the best of my knowledge the managers and clerks were all republicans.

AVERY SMITH sworn:

Question. Were you manager of an election at Cherokee Hill, in Chatham County, for presidential electors and member of Congress on the 5th day of November last? If so, who else were managers, and in what capacity did you act as such?

Answer. I was. Mr. Isaac Seely and John A. Staley were the others who acted with me. We all acted in the capacity of freeholders.

Cross-question. Where did you and the other managers at the precinct where you presided, and the clerks, reside at the time of said election?

A. They all resided in the city of Savannah.

Cross-question. Did you and the managers and the clerks at the so-called precinct vote for members of Congress and for presidential electors at that place?

A. I voted, and to the best of my knowledge, the other managers voted. I do not know for whom they voted. I voted for Andrew Sloan.

Cross-question. Was said election held in any house, or where was it held? Did you have a ballot-box, and from whom did you obtain it?

A. It was not in a house. Two of the managers having the ballot-box in charge sat in a buggy. One of them received the ballots from the voters and sang out the name to the clerks, at the same time numbering the ballot and passing the same to the other manager, who put it in the ballot-box. The clerks were in a carriage near by the buggy, I do not know from whom the ballot-box was obtained.

JAMES PORTER sworn:

Question. Did you act as manager at the election for presidential electors and Congress on the 5th day of November last? If so, where and in what capacity, and who were your fellow-managers?

Answer. I did act as a manager at Chapman's house, in Chatham County, as a freeholder. L. C. Rice, a freeholder, and L. J. Moody, a justice of the peace, presided with me.

Cross-examined:

Cross-question. Where was your residence and the residence of the other managers, and of the clerks, who presided with you at said precincts on the day of said election?

Answer. My residence and that of my fellow-manager, Mr. Rice, and the clerks, was at Savannah, Chatham County. There were three clerks. Lewis J. Moody, justice of the peace, who presided at said election, resided at the 6-mile post on the Ogeechee road.

Cross-question. Did you and the other managers, and the clerks at said precinct, vote on the day of said election at said precinct?

A. I did, and presume they did; cannot say positively.

A day or two before the election, without the knowledge of Mr. Rawls, the sitting member, they had the United States judge of that district appoint supervisors for these three precincts in Chatham County. Those supervisors drove out and went through the form of holding an election. Look at the vote. At Cherokee Hill 386 votes for Mr. Sloan, and none for Mr. Rawls; at Isle of Hope 253 votes for Mr. Sloan, and none for Mr. Rawls.

Mr. SENER. Did the United States judge appoint supervisors on only one side, politically?

Mr. SPEER. We allege that they were on but one side; at least none of them voted for the democratic candidate.

At Chapman's house 600 votes are returned for Mr. Sloan and 2 for Mr. Rawls. Thus, in an aggregate vote of 1,241 in those three precincts, Mr. Rawls receives but 2 votes. If supervisors had been appointed by the judge in good faith, one of them at least at each poll should have been a democrat; and that would have given the sitting member at least one vote in the precinct.

Mr. SENER. Is there any testimony to show whether there is any allegation that any of the supervisors were democrats?

Mr. SPEER. It was the duty of the judge under the law to appoint one from each party, but as he was evidently a friend of Sloan he doubtless appointed his friends. I think one of the appointees did not act.

But how were these elections held? Not by residents of the precinct; not by voters who lived there; they were held by vagabonds and scalawags from the city of Savannah, who drove out to these places in buggies on the day of the election and pretended to hold an election. At Cherokee Hill the election officers sat in a buggy in the highway. The clerks sat in another buggy; and there they allege they received 386 votes for Sloan, and not one for Rawls. They drove back to the city of Savannah in the afternoon evidently proud of their day's work.

Now, can it be seriously pretended that the ordinary, in establishing these precincts in 1868 for the purpose of the presidential election of that year, intended to establish as a permanent voting place a point on the highway, where there was no building of any kind, neither house, nor barn, nor pig-sty; not even a tree or stump to mark the spot. The people understood these precincts to be established solely and only for the one election; and the brilliant idea of resurrecting them in 1872 originated with the contestant, as a happy but novel means of securing a seat in Congress.

To show that he himself knew that they were not legal voting precincts, Mr. Bryant, representing him, understood by the ordinary to be his agent, the committee appointed by the contestant's friends, applied the day before the election to have them re-established; and the ordinary, a republican, refused to comply with his request. In the face of that fact, against the common understanding of the people, without the knowledge of the contestee and his friends that any person meditated an election at those precincts, agents and hirelings of the contestant rode out to these places on the day of election in buggies, held pretended elections in the highway and returned 1,239 votes for the contestant and 2 for the contestee. Mr. Rawls believes and alleges that these pretended elections were held for the purpose of enabling persons to vote who had paid no tax, and were otherwise disqualified, and who would not have been permitted to vote at any place where there were challengers or where the officers were honest.

When they were enacting a fraud of this character and magnitude they might have made clean work of it and given the whole vote to the contestant. It seems almost a pity to mar the beauty of these returns by destroying the harmonious completeness of a solid vote; but these gentlemen seem suddenly to have been seized with some compunctions of conscience and to have given Rawls 2 votes out of 1,241 to relieve their honest souls! It might as well have been a clean, clear sheet. If the purpose of these fellows was, as avowed in the district, to put Sloan in, they ought to have made the vote solid and claimed credit for the audacity of the fraud.

The gentleman who preceded me dwelt at some length on the fact that Bullock County gave Sloan a unanimous vote; but he forgot to state that the county has voted unanimously for the democratic ticket for several years, and that while Sloan is a stranger there Rawls was born in it, and his parents before him, and that he is well known to its people.

But it is not necessary to dispose of the question as to the legality or illegality of these precincts in the view which I take of this case. Starting with the majority given by the report of the majority of the committee, I have endeavored to demonstrate that upon law and justice, and reason and authority, and every principle of common fairness, the sitting member is entitled to his seat.

There are other questions in the case, but I have not time to go over them.

The learned gentleman who preceded me said, "If it had been necessary to throw out the vote of the city of Savannah, where between 5,000 and 6,000 votes were cast, and Rawls had over 700 majority, he would reject it." Necessary for what? Necessary to further justice, or necessary to seat the contestant? If the vote of Savannah was illegal, the majority should have thrown it out, let it defeat or elect whom it might.

The justice of a vote, and its right to be counted, can never depend upon the result, as to whom it shall elect or whom it shall defeat. Yet, from the beginning to the end of this case, there appears to have been but one object on the part of some of the majority; and that is, the unseating of one man and the seating of another. The votes cast in Liberty Hill precinct are not counted now. They were counted in the report as originally drawn and as read before the committee; but they are not counted now, because it seems, under the language of the gentleman who has just preceded me, it was not necessary to count them in order to seat his friend.

In any just view of this case, Rawls is elected; and, in the judgment of the minority of the committee, his majority is 1,466. If the contestant be seated, his friend Dr. Young will become a prophet, and Lawtonville should go into history.

Having now, as I understand, twenty minutes of my time left, I will yield to the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. BLOUNT.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has only twelve minutes left.

Mr. SPEER. If I have only twelve minutes left, I presume the gentleman from Georgia does not wish to proceed under that limitation.

Mr. BLOUNT. No, sir.

Mr. SPEER. The gentleman from Georgia proposes to go over the case somewhat more fully than I have done; and I prefer that the other side should now take their hour and let the gentleman from Georgia follow. I will yield to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. LAMAR] if he desires.

Mr. HYDE. I call the previous question.

Mr. SPEER. I trust that will not be done.

Mr. LAMAR. I hope the debate will not be limited in this way.

Mr. SPEER. The sitting member desires to be heard, especially hrough his colleague from Georgia, [Mr. BLOUNT.] We understood that there should be the amplest opportunity to discuss the case. I appeal to the fairness of members on both sides.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. How long does my colleague on the committee desire?

Mr. SPEER. About an hour. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] wishes to go over the whole case. I trust the justice of the House will not close discussion at this hour. It was not expected on this side by the sitting member and his friends. They have given attention to the case, and of course wish to be heard.

Mr. HYDE. So far as I am personally concerned, do not care if this discussion runs a month. But there is pressure of other business, and I am satisfied the House does not desire to take up much more time with this particular case. And that is the reason why I have moved the previous question.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. Will not my colleague be satisfied with forty-five minutes?

The SPEAKER. The hour of two o'clock having arrived, and this being the third Friday in the month, the Committee on the District of Columbia is entitled to the floor. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HALE,] chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. HALE, of New York, rose.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. I understand, if my colleague will permit me, we can compromise this matter by allowing the other side to take forty-five minutes, and at the end of that time we will demand the previous question, which will allow us an hour to close debate.

Mr. HALE, of New York. That will leave but little opportunity for the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. We will only take up an hour and forty-five minutes.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I think we ought not to do it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York is entitled to the floor. The Chair has always ruled that at the hour of two o'clock, on the third Friday of the month, the Committee on the District of Columbia is absolutely entitled to the floor.

Mr. HALE, of New York. If the House will assign to us equivalent time on another day, we may agree to allow this election case to go on. If the House is in session to-morrow, we will take to-morrow.

Mr. LAMAR. I suggest, then, that to-morrow be assigned to the Committee on the District of Columbia for its business.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. There are six or seven contested-election cases pending before the Committee on Elections, not reported. Within three or four days three cases will be reported, one being the Louisiana case, which will be of some magnitude. It seems to me, therefore, no obstruction should be put in the way of expediting the business of the Committee on Elections. I ask the House to go through with this case to-day or to-morrow.

Mr. MYERS. Has anything been assigned for to-morrow?

The SPEAKER. There has not.

Mr. SPEER. Let the business of the District of Columbia go on to-day, and we can finish this contested-election case to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has endeavored to impress the fact upon the House that following the regular order more surely tends to harmony and to the advancement of public business than any other mode. If the regular order is followed to-day the Committee on the District of Columbia has the floor on the business of that committee. If any portion of the day be remaining after that business has been concluded this election case will again come up; but if the Committee on the District of Columbia exhausts the day, then this case will come up to-morrow as the unfinished business.

Mr. SPEER. That will do.

PACIFIC MAIL STEAMSHIP COMPANY.

Mr. LUTTRELL, by unanimous consent, presented concurrent resolutions of the Legislature of the State of California, requesting Congress to oppose any further subsidy to the Pacific Mail Steamship Company; which were referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

SUBSIDIES TO CORPORATIONS.

Mr. LUTTRELL also, by unanimous consent, presented concurrent resolutions of the Legislature of the State of California, opposing any further grant of lands or subsidies to corporations or railroad companies, and to restore certain lands to the public domain; which were referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

PAYMENT OF DISTRICT SCHOOL-TEACHERS.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I yield to my colleague on the committee from Iowa, [Mr. COTTON.]

Mr. COTTON. Mr. Speaker, the House adopted a resolution directing the Committee on the District of Columbia to report a bill compelling the payment of arrears of teachers' wages. The committee find no way to accomplish this purpose, except by reporting a bill for an appropriation directly by Congress, the funds of the District being exhausted. I am therefore directed to report to the House, in pursuance of that order, a bill (H. R. No. 2550) making an appropriation for the payment of teachers in the public schools in the District of Columbia.

The bill was read a first and second time.

The bill provides that the sum of $97,740.50 be, and the same is thereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the payment of teachers in the public schools in the District of Columbia, from the 1st day of September, 1873, to the 1st day of March, 1874; and that the money which may be paid under the act shall be regarded as an advancement made by the United States to said District, to be deducted from money which Congress may hereafter appropriate for the reimbursement to the District of any expenditure. The money appropriated in the bill to be disbursed under the supervision of the Commissioner of Education.

Mr. RUSK. I make the point of order that, as the bill makes an appropriation of money, it must have its first consideration in the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. COTTON. I suppose the point of order is good.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I desire to ask the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. RUSK] whether as this committee will be entitled to precedence in the Committee of the Whole to-day, if the House shall go into the Committee of the Whole, he will not consent that the bill shall be considered in the House, rather than insist on its being referred to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. RUSK. I should prefer having the bill considered in the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The point of order is well taken, and the bill goes to the Committee of the Whole.

CORPORATIONS IN THE DISTRICT.

Mr. ELDREDGE, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 2423) explanatory of the act entitled "An act to provide for the creation of corporations in the District of Columbia by general law."

The bill was read. It provides that the fourth section of the act entitled "An act to provide for the creation of corporations in the District of Columbia by general law" shall be construed to authorize any corporation formed in pursuance of the provisions of said act, for the purpose of carrying on marketing, to locate and construct a suitable building or buildings wherever they may deem it expedient, with the necessary stalls, stands, and appurtenances, and to use and occupy the same as a public market, and for such other purposes as may be determined by such corporation, and to let out such stalls, stands, or other portions of such buildings, and to collect rents therefor, and generally to manage the same for their interests; provided, that the government of the District of Columbia shall at all times have power to make and enforce such regulations with regard to such market and the management thereof as, in their judgment, the convenience, health, and safety of the community may require.

Mr. ELDREDGE. There is a report accompanying the bill, but I believe I will not detain the House by asking the Clerk to read it. The object of the bill is simply to make certain what I think myself is now contained in the law. Congress has provided a general corporation act for the District of Columbia.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I desire to raise the point of order now if it applies to this bill. I do not know whether it applies or not without asking the question of the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. ELDREDGE. If the gentleman will ask his question, I will endeavor to answer it.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I see that the bill authorizes the corporation to locate market-houses wherever they see fit. Does that authorize their location on public lands?

Mr. ELDREDGE. No, sir. If the gentleman had waited a moment he would have perceived from the explanation I was about to make that there is nothing in the bill which would authorize that.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. If I had waited a moment I would have lost my right to raise the point of order.

Mr. ELDREDGE. The gentleman can reserve his point of order and allow me to state the object of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is satisfied that the point of order does not apply to this bill. It makes no appropriation of public property in any form.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Under this general act of incorporation, the parties engaged in this enterprise proceeded to organize and file their papers in the registry of the District of Columbia, as they are required by the general act of incorporation to do. But on submitting the case to their lawyer, he raised a doubt as to whether the act authorized the organization and incorporation of market companies. The only object of this bill is to make the general law broad enough to comprehend within its scope such cases as this.

The original act for the creation of corporations does now use expressly the term "markets;" and yet the technical question is raised whether it is sufficiently comprehensive to allow them to go on and build the markets and rent the stalls and collect the rents. This company have already organized under the act, and this is simply to make this general act of incorporation broad enough to comprehend the rights and powers and objects they desire. It is only an amendment to the general act of incorporation, and to remove a doubt. I had no doubt myself that the act was broad enough, and did include markets. But the question was raised, and this is simply to remove all doubts, that the company may go on and build the markets and exercise the powers they are authorized to exercise under this general act of incorporation.

If there are no questions to be asked, and no one desires to make any remarks upon it, I will call the previous question.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Before the previous question is called, I desire to inquire of the gentleman from Wisconsin, what latitude, in his judgment, this gives to this corporation as to the location of sites for market buildings or stalls?

Mr. ELDREDGE. It gives no latitude whatever. It simply allows the company to organize under the general law; and that has all the limitations and guards that I apprehend the gentleman from Vermont, or any other person, would desire to have in an act of incorporation.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. The phraseology to which I desire to call the gentleman's attention is this: The bill says:

That the fourth section of the act entitled "An act to provide for the creation of corporations in the District of Columbia by general law" shall be construed to authorize any corporation formed in pursuance of the provisions of said act, for the purpose of carrying on marketing, to locate and construct a suitable building or buildings wherever they may deem it expedient.

Mr. POTTER. It ought to read, "on the lands of such corporation."

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. The language of the bill does not so specify.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Of course they cannot locate their building on the lands of anybody else.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. The point I make is this: that the language is broad enough in its terms to authorize the company to locate on any public lands in this city.

Mr. ELDREDGE. O, no; it would not authorize them to take the house of the gentleman from Vermont, or to locate in my domicile.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. My objection is that the language of the bill authorizes the location on the public grounds anywhere in this city. It seems to give the right to this corporation to locate where they please.

Mr. ELDREDGE. There is no provision in the general appropriation act authorizing the exercise of the power of eminent domain by any corporation.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I am either quite dull or I fail to make myself understood. This bill provides in terms that the former act shall be construed as giving power to this company to locate their building wherever they may deem it expedient. Now the Government owns in the District of Columbia public grounds which Congress has control over, and this bill is broad enough in its terms to authorize this corporation, if they see fit, to select some portion of the public grounds on which they will locate one of their market buildings. I only desire that the bill shall be explicit in its provisions, so as to prevent that.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I have no objection to any amendment which may be suggested limiting the bill in that regard; but there is no such power, and no such thing need be apprehended. In fact the articles of incorporation of this company are made out, and, as far as they can be, they are incorporated. It is the Northern Liberty Market, and its place is fixed. This bill is only intended to make certain their right to be incorporated under the former act.

Mr. POTTER. I move to amend by inserting after the word "construct" the words "on the grounds of such corporation;" so that it will read:

Shall be construed to authorize any corporation formed in pursuance of the provisions of said act, for the purpose of carrying on marketing, to locate and construct on the grounds of such corporation a suitable building or buildings, &c.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I have no objection to that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I desire to make another suggestion in regard to this bill.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I will hear the gentleman.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. It seems to me that the bill as it is drawn is open to another objection. The bill provides that any corporation formed, in pursuance of the general corporation law, for the purpose of carrying on marketing, may locate its building wherever it pleases, and construct it, provided that the government of the District shall have power to make such regulations in regard to the market and its management as they shall see fit. Now, I do not understand that it is the policy of any of our cities of considerable size, or of any cities of considerable size anywhere, to permit the proprietors of a market-house to put that market-house where they choose. The site of a public market is a very important matter to the public. It is a place to which large quantities of provisions are carried.

Mr. ELDREDGE. The gentleman need not argue the question. If he has an amendment which will accomplish his purpose, I will hear that amendment. We can see what the gentleman's argument is.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. It may be that some gentlemen of the House are not quite so bright as to be able to see my argument before I make it.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Perhaps some of them may not be bright enough to see it when you get through.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. That is very possible. But I will, at any rate, take the liberty of finishing my sentence, if the gentleman from Wisconsin will permit me to do it.

Mr. ELDREDGE. If the gentleman will submit his amendment I will take it into consideration at once. I do not want to hear his argument. I want to save time, if I can. We have a great deal of other important business to do.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I believe I have the floor.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood the gentleman from Wisconsin to yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I will yield to the gentleman to offer an amendment, and will hear it read.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. The site of a market is a place where——

Mr. ELDREDGE. I do not yield for a speech; I will allow the gentleman to offer an amendment.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I do not understand that it is the right of the gentleman from Wisconsin to deprive me of the floor after having yielded it to me.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin is entitled to the floor.

Mr. ELDREDGE. For once in my life, I believe I have the floor now. It is a very strange thing for a gentleman on this side of the House to have the floor; it is a little odd, certainly. If the gentleman has an amendment I will be glad to have it read; but I wish to save time.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I desire to state to the House in a single sentence——

Mr. ELDREDGE. I cannot yield for a speech.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I desire to state to the House, in a single sentence, the purpose for which the amendment is proposed. It may be unnecessary for me to offer it; I do not know whether——

Mr. ELDREDGE. I repeat that I do not yield to the gentleman for a speech.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Then I ask the House to vote down the previous question. There may be other defects in the bill.

Mr. ELDREDGE. If the gentleman desires to offer an amendment to cure any defect in the bill I will be glad to have him do so.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I propose to do it under the rules of the House, if at all, and not at the will of any particular member who may be so arrogant as to suppose that he is entitled to govern the House.

Mr. ELDREDGE. There is no arrogance about it. I want to hear the gentleman's amendment. If there is any defect in the bill I shall be very glad to have it corrected. I yield to the gentleman for that purpose.

[Cries of "Regular order."]

The SPEAKER. The regular order is proceeding, and the gentleman from Wisconsin has the floor.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I am waiting for the gentleman from Massachusetts to offer his amendment, which I see he is drawing up.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I will try to offer it after the House has dealt with the motion for the previous question.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Very well; then I call the previous question.

The question was taken on seconding the previous question; and upon a division there were—ayes 54, noes 48; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. ELDREDGE and Mr. G. F. HOAR were appointed.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I wish the gentleman would present his amendment and not take up the time of the House by requiring a vote by tellers.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I only desire to present my point with the view of learning whether an amendment is necessary.

Mr. ELDREDGE. If the gentleman has any question to ask I will answer it.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. All I desire is to accomplish that.

Mr. ELDREDGE. How much time does the gentleman want for that purpose?

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Three minutes.

Mr. ELDREDGE. The gentleman shall have that, and I will add two minutes more.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. It seems to me, that in regard to the choice of a site for a market-house, the authorities of the District of Columbia should be entitled to a hearing. It is a very important public question, even if they owned the ground, where a market-house should be situated. What I desire to ask the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ELDREDGE] is, whether he understands that this bill has reserved the necessity of obtaining the assent of the District government to the selection of the spot where the market-house is to be established. If not, does he object to so amend the bill as to secure that?

Mr. ELDREDGE. I understand that the proviso of this bill reserves to the District government entire control over the subject, puts it entirely and absolutely in their hands, so that a market-house cannot be built if they forbid it. And if the bill does not accomplish that purpose, I would be very glad to have the gentleman prepare an amendment that will accomplish it.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Then I move to amend, by inserting after the word "expedient," in line 9 of the printed bill, the words "the spot to be approved by the government of the District of Columbia."

Mr. ELDREDGE. Does the gentleman want the "spot" approved, or the location of the market-house approved?

Mr. G. F. HOAR. We have already said they may locate and construct a market-house wherever they may deem it expedient. The word "site" or "location" may be used in preference to "spot." I will say "the location of the market-house to be approved by the government of the District of Columbia."

Mr. ELDREDGE. I would rather that, instead of saying "the government of the District of Columbia," the gentleman would indicate some particular officer; because the government, as a government, may not be able to agree. I do not know exactly what "government of the District of Columbia" means.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. That term is used in the bill itself, and that is the reason I employed the term. I supposed the gentleman knew what it meant.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Suppose the gentleman should say "the governor of the District?"

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I have no objection. I used the word "government" because that is in the bill itself.

Mr. ELDREDGE. If the House is in favor of the amendment, I have no objection to it.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I move to amend by inserting after the word "expedient" the words "the location thereof to be approved by the governor of the District of Columbia."

Mr. ELDREDGE. I am content with that, if the House is satisfied with it. Of course I have no right to accept it, but I think there is no objection to it.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I now call for the previous question upon the bill as amended.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

Mr. ELDREDGE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. DARRALL, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 215) to exempt George M. Richard, of Pittston, in the State of Pennsylvania, from the payment of $881.29 for postage-stamps stolen from his office while postmaster;

An act (H. R. No. 476) to establish bonded warehouses for the storing and cleansing of rice intended for exportation;

An act (H. R. No. 1213) for the relief of Willard Howe, of Massachusetts;

An act (H. R. No. 1576) for the relief of Reuel B. Fuller, of Wilton, Maine;

An act (H. R. No. 1756) to amend the act entitled "An act to withdraw from settlement and sale a certain section of land in Wyoming Territory," approved May 23, 1872; and

An act (H. R. No. 2225) to amend the act entitled "An act to prevent the extermination of fur-bearing animals in Alaska," approved July 1, 1870.

GOLD PANIC.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask consent of the House to have printed in the RECORD a letter from Hon. John Bigelow, of New York, making some explanations of matters contained in the gold-panic report of 1870, which he thinks requires some explanation on his part. The financial editor of the New York Times was a witness before the Committee on Banking and Currency, and gave some evidence relating to an editorial published in the Times, and referring to the gold panic. That editorial was prepared by persons not connected with the Times office, and it was sent to Mr. Bigelow with the request that it be published. There was nothing in the evidence before the committee that indicated that Mr. Bigelow was in any way cognizant of the purpose of those who prepared the article, nor was there anything in the report of the committee which in any way reflected upon Mr. Bigelow. I do not think it at all necessary for his vindication that this letter should be published. But he has requested it, and I take pleasure in communicating his request to the House, and asking that his letter be printed in the RECORD.

No objection was made. The letter is as follows:

54 WEST TWENTY-FIFTH STREET,
New York, March 5, 1874.

SIR: I have to-day for the first time seen the report on the gold-panic investigation, made in March, 1870, by the Committee on Banking and Currency, of which you are chairman. In the testimony accompanying it I find the following statement attributed to C. C. Norvell, the financial editor of the Times of this city:

"Q. Was there an editorial on financial subjects presented to you for insertion in the New York Times, some time in the month of July or August, by Jay Gould?

"A. No, sir; not by Mr. Gould nor by anybody from Mr. Gould. Mr. Bigelow took charge of the editorial department of the Times about the 1st of August. About the 5th of the month he had an interview with the President, probably at Mr. Corbin's house. On the 6th appeared an editorial wholly irrespective of any matter of gold. Mr. Bigelow requested me to furnish him the figures to which reference had been made in his interview with the President. I wrote out a general article; it was published on the 7th. This article on the 6th, which had nothing to do with the gold speculations, seems to have been in some way confounded with the article of the 25th.

"Q. What article was that?

"A. That was what we call in our office an 'outside article.' Articles come to us well written on the topics of the day and we adopt them as our own. How this article reached the office I only know from hearsay. As to whether Mr. Gould, Mr. Corbin, or who sent it, I have no knowledge. I did not see the manuscript for some time after, and not until this controversy arose. That article was represented to have come from some particular friend of the President. I have every reason to believe it was put in type just as it was written, and double-leaded to be published as an editorial leader. I had gone home to Staten Island, and my assistant in the money department told Mr. Bigelow he had better leave it over until he could see me; that, whether it was written in the interest of the Administration or not, it certainly seemed to compromise the Administration, and utterly to stultify our own position in regard to gold, especially the last paragraph, which was most illogical and seemed to be a plausible plea for the highest possible gold that the market could be brought up to. I will do Mr. Bigelow the justice to say that he could not have believed it to come from any inspired source. General Grant had left the city on the 20th. This came to me about the 23d. It was to have appeared on the morning of the 24th; and when the suggestion was made to Mr. Bigelow that it was in my department, as he had just come into the office, and had not watched our course on this subject, it was proper that he should turn it over, which he did, and which I am sure he would not have done if he had believed that General Grant had seen it before it came into the office. I have no doubt that it was sent under false pretenses, and I do not think Mr. Bigelow had any doubt after the occurrence of September that it was intended to be imposed upon us as a semi-official expression by the President."

While this investigation was progressing I was living at my home in the country and seeing but few of the public prints. I regarded it as a sort of partisan war upon the President, which would come to nothing, and in which I, at least, had no personal interest. I naturally inferred that if the relations of the Times to the controversy took a shape that concerned me personally I should be sent for as, in a legal sense, the most competent witness. I was never sent for, however, nor did any of my friends or enemies, if I had any, in Washington or elsewhere, give me any intimation that my personal or professional character was in any way involved in your investigation. Owing, I suppose, to my absence from the country from April, 1870, until the last summer, I never saw a copy of your report until prompted to inquire for one by a quotation from it which I casually met with about a week since. A friend sent me yesterday the copy from which I have made the foregoing quotation.

I will not disguise from you my surprise and indignation at finding myself thus paraded in an official document as the possible accomplice or dupe of a knot of gold-gamblers, and the sanction of your committee given to the implication that it was only through the greater shrewdness or virtue of one of my subordinates that the journal I had been directing was not taken in the trap that had been laid for it. Though whatever mischief such a calumny could do me, if any, is now nearly, if not quite, irreparable, I cannot afford to let it go for one unnecessary day or hour unchallenged.

I will not waste any time in conjecturing why, if the newspaper article in question was worthy of the curiosity manifested about it by your committee, I, who necessarily know more about it than any one else, was never sent for, nor why secondary testimony was preferred to such as I could have given. Neither are the reasons any longer perhaps, if they ever were, matters of much consequence. It is, however, a matter of supreme consequence to me, and I feel that I have a right to ask, as an act of simple justice, that my version of the incident, referred to in Mr. Norvell's testimony, should go upon the records of Congress where it may endure at least as long as the rest of the testimony embodied in your report.

Assuming, as I feel I may do with entire confidence, that you will not hesitate to recognize the propriety of this request, I hasten to submit to you, and through you to Congress, the following statement:

As I approached my residence, about four o'clock in the afternoon of a day in the latter part of September, 1869—if Mr. Norvell's dates are correct, it was on the 23d—I found a carriage in front of my door and Mr. James McHenry just getting in it to drive away. Seeing me, he returned, and after an exchange of salutations, proceeded to say that he had come to bring me an article, presenting the views of the President on the financial situation, which he, as well as the President, desired to see in the Times. He added that he thought the article of sufficient importance to merit being leaded conspicuously, and if it appeared the following morning, he would have it telegraphed to the London Times.

I took the manuscript, and as I slipped it into my pocket said I would look at it, and of course would do what I could to oblige him. After answering a friendly inquiry about his family which I addressed to him he drove off, and I went on my way. This was all that passed between us, and discloses all that I knew of the origin and purpose of the article which he left with me. I had had too much familiarity with the ingenious artifices by which newspaper contributors often seek to enhance the value of their wares to place as high an estimate upon it as Mr. McHenry did. At the same time I knew that he enjoyed exceptional means of knowing what might be the financial views of the Administration, if it had any; and, of course, as a large railway operator, he had the greatest interest in possessing himself of them. I felt, therefore, in what he had given me, I was quite likely to find an instructive and available contribution.

When I reached my office that night, to save my time and eyes, I sent the manuscript at once to the printers, presuming that part or all of it would be available in some way. I did not examine it at all, I think, till it came to me in proof. I was not long in discovering, when I did read it, that it was unavailable as a whole, and not only that, it would take more time to put it into shape than I could then give to it, but even when revised would fall far short of the value, to us at least, which Mr. McHenry seemed to attach to it.

As soon as I reached this conclusion I gave orders to let the article lie over, and directed a message to be left for Mr. Norvell, who resided out of town and rarely came to the office in the evening, to call upon me upon his arrival in the morning. When he came the following day I handed him a proof of the article, told him all that I knew of its history discussed with him such of its objectionable features as were most obvious, told him we could never recommend the Government "to foul its own nest;" and as it was desirable, if possible, to oblige Mr. McHenry, that I had sent for him to say that if he could make anything of the article, and harmonize it with the previous course of the Times, I would thank him to do it. I the more wished to show a disposition to oblige Mr. McHenry because we could not serve him. Mr. Norvell took the article and modified it as it finally appeared in the Times. He knew, when he returned the proof to the printer, just as much of its origin as I did. It was kept over and referred to him, not upon the suggestion of his assistant nor of any one else, nor because of any suggestion, for none was ever made to me, that it was in Mr. Norvell's department; neither because I had any doubts about publishing the article as written, for I had decided against that before I had finished my first perusal of it, but because I had no time at that hour of the night to correct it, or even to ascertain whether it was worth correcting.

If blame attached to any one for what did appear of Mr. McHenry's article in the Times, it attached to me, and to me alone. If there was any merit in excluding portions of it, that equally was mine, and mine alone; for no one had anything to do with either except in the execution of my instructions. Any pretension to the contrary is simply preposterous. It is not the custom of managing editors to take directions in regard to what shall appear in their columns from subordinates, nor was it mine, happy as I always was to profit by their counsels; and if I had thought the article of Mr. McHenry suitable to print, it is scarcely necessary to say that the public would have found it in the Times on the following morning.

It is but justice to Mr. McHenry to state here that he called at my office on the day the article appeared and stated that his friends were not only greatly chagrined at the changes it had undergone, but would have preferred that it had been suppressed altogether. I told him he ought not to ask, and that it was unreasonable to expect, any responsible journal to recommend to the Federal Government a policy so obviously designed to impair its credit, or, as I repeated to him, "to foul its own nest." He then rather surprised me by the assurance that he had not read the article, and did not know that it was conceived in that spirit. I convinced him that I had stated its purport correctly, and he left me apparently satisfied with the disposition I had made of it. He did not tell me who wrote the article, if he knew, nor who, beside himself said, by a sort of implication, the President desired its publication. Neither was I myself enlightened upon either of these points, except through the report of your committee.

I am very sorry to be obliged to trouble you and your colleagues with what, by the lapse of time, may seem to have degenerated into a merely private and personal grievance; but a statesman of your experience does not need to be told that the reparation of an injustice to one is the reparation of an injustice to every one.

I am, sir, with great respect, your very obedient servant,

JOHN BIGELOW.

Hon. JAMES A. GARFIELD.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I now move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, for the purpose of considering those bills on the General Calendar pertaining to the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. DUNNELL in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole, for the purpose of considering the bills upon the Calendar relating to the District of Columbia.

INDIGENT BLIND.

The first bill on the Calendar relating to the District of Columbia was a bill (H. R. No. 184) to provide for the better education of the indigent blind in the District of Columbia.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I move that this bill be passed over for the present, as we are not now prepared to consider it.

The motion was agreed to.

ANACOSTIA AND POTOMAC RIVER RAILROAD.

The next bill was a bill (H. R. No. 2103) giving the approval and sanction of Congress to the route and termini of the Anacostia and Potomac River Railroad, and to regulate its construction and operation.

Mr. HALE, of New York. This is a bill to fix the termini and authorize the construction of a street railroad in the city of Washington by a company incorporated under a general law for that purpose. There being a possible question as to the application of a general incorporation law to railroads and street railways, a clause is inserted in this bill validating that organization, so as to put it beyond doubt.

The committee may not be aware that under the organic act creating the government of this District the entire control of street railways, the fixing of the termini, the authorizing of the construction of the roads, and the laying of the rails, is reserved to Congress; so that, whether a company be incorporated under a general act by the District authorities or by a special act of Congress, the authority is always with Congress to fix the termini of the road and to grant the right to lay down the rails. That is the object of this bill.

The road, the construction of which is proposed under this bill, is familiarly known in Washington as the Anacostia road, commencing at the end of the navy-yard bridge, running then upon a designated route, (the different streets being prescribed in the bill,) following near the line of the Potomac River, a greater or less distance from it, but most of the way upon what is known as the island, after crossing the mouth of the old canal, and terminating on Pennsylvania avenue, at Fourteenth street.

The bill also contains a provision that whenever the navy-yard bridge shall be rebuilt, so as to make it a proper bridge for the use of a railroad company, this road shall be permitted to cross on that bridge to Uniontown, on the other side of the Eastern Branch. The bill limits the fare in the city of Washington to five cents, but provides that upon an extension of the road across the navy-yard bridge to Uniontown, an additional fare of five cents may be collected.

The bill has been well considered in the committee. The sub-committee have gone over the ground carefully, and were unanimously of the opinion that the route was one upon which the construction of a road would promote the interests of the city, and that no objection exists to such construction. The committee were also satisfied that the general voice of the inhabitants of the southwestern and southeastern sections of the city, through which the road is to pass, is strongly in favor of the construction of this road.

If no gentleman has anything to say upon the subject, I move that the bill be laid aside, to be reported to the House with a recommendation that it pass.

The motion was agreed to.

WASHINGTON CITY AND POINT LOOKOUT RAILROAD COMPANY.

The next District bill was the bill (H. R. No. 2075) supplementary to the act entitled "An act to authorize the Washington City and Point Lookout Railroad Company to extend a railroad into and within the District of Columbia," approved January 22, 1873.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I move that this bill be passed over.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

BRIDGE OVER EASTERN BRANCH OF THE POTOMAC.

The next District bill on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2106) to authorize the construction of a substantial iron and masonry bridge across the Eastern Branch of the Potomac, at or near the present Anacostia bridge.

The bill was read. It appropriates the sum of $250,000, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, for the purpose of constructing a substantial iron and masonry bridge across the Eastern Branch of the Potomac River, at or near the present Anacostia bridge, in the District of Columbia, the bridge to be constructed upon plans to be approved by the Chief of Engineers of the Army, and under his supervision and direction.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I ask that the report accompanying this bill be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 775) to authorize the construction of a substantial iron or masonry bridge across the eastern branch of the Potomac, at or near the present Anacostia bridge, have had the same under consideration, and now beg leave to submit the following report:

On the 21st of February the committee reported House bill No. 2106 as a substitute for House bill No. 775.

The navy-yard bridge was built by a chartered company about fifty years since, and was maintained as a toll bridge until June 30, 1849, when Congress appropriated $30,000 for its purchase, and it was made a free bridge. Since its purchase, annual appropriations have been made for its repair and for the pay of watchmen, varying from three to five thousand dollars, and at one time the bridge has been entirely, and at another mainly, rebuilt. During the late war its uses were indispensable to the Government, and its wear was so great as to require the bridge to be almost entirely rebuilt in 1870. Since it has become the property of the United States nearly $100,000 have been expended in keeping it in condition for use. This bridge is a necessary part of the thoroughfare and only access, except by water, from Washington to the Government Hospital for the Insane, which cares for all the insane persons the Government is under obligations to support, amounting to about six hundred patients. Forts Foote and Washington also lie on the same side of the river, and receive their supplies over this bridge. A large number of Government clerks, mechanics, laborers, and employés of various kinds at the navy-yard and at the various Departments of Government use this bridge in going to and returning from their daily duties. It is estimated that fully one-fourth of the market-supplies to the personnel of the Government and the citizens of Washington are brought to the city by this bridge, The necessity for reconstructing the bridge in a more substantial manner, both as a public convenience and as a measure of economy to the Government, has been fully presented to Congress, and will appear in Senate Executive Document No. 100, first session Forty-first Congress, in a report made by the commissioner of public buildings and grounds, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate.

This officer says in this report:

"The importance of a permanent and substantial bridge across the Anacostia, at or near the point indicated, has been sufficiently well established. The present structure forms one of the principal avenues leading into the capital, and is kept in most constant use; a continuous line of foot-passengers, horsemen, carriages, and wagons can be daily seen passing over it, either entering or leaving the city; the travel seems uninterrupted. Great quantities of the products of the neighboring farms and gardens, and large numbers of cattle, sheep, and swine reach the markets by this bridge, and very considerably increase the supplies of the animal and vegetable kind needed for consumption. * * * The bridge also connects the city with that very thriving locality known as Uniontown, at present numbering very nearly three thousand inhabitants. * * * Many persons connected with the Government Departments reside there, and have daily to cross and recross the bridge."

As showing the travel over this bridge, the commissioner further says:

"The following figures will show the average amount of travel over it for one month: Foot-passengers, 21,654; horses and riders, 1,195; horses and carriages, 7,408; teams and wagons, 5,920; cattle, 367; hogs, 263; sheep, 412. It must be borne in mind that this count was kept from sunrise to sunset of each day, and that a large proportion of those engaged in marketing pass generally during the night in time to be at their stands by the break of day."

This was in 1869, since which time the travel has much increased.

This officer recommends that the bridge should be a permanent structure, possessed of such durability and strength as would be sufficient to support the heaviest weight that any future and sudden emergency may require. He submits five different plans for bridges, varying in cost from $175,000, to $319,670.

The present engineer in charge of public buildings and grounds was before the committee, and strongly urged the necessity for the building of a new bridge. He reported the present structure as dangerous, and that it is liable to go down at any day. He submitted plans for an iron bridge to cost $367,536.

The superintendent of the Government Hospital for the Insane was also before the committee, and strongly urged the necessity for a new bridge. He stated that one of the loaded wagons belonging to the Government, while crossing the present bridge last summer, broke through, and a valuable pair of horses was drowned, while the driver barely escaped with his life.

The interest which the Government has in maintaining a substantial bridge is strongly presented by this officer in a written communication, from which some of the facts in this report are drawn.

The committee have considered the question as to the comparative economy of building a new bridge or endeavoring to maintain the present one in a safe condition, and they have been forced to the conclusion that economy as well as other interests of the Government require an entirely new structure.

Among the statements in relation to this matter made to the committee by the engineer in charge of the public buildings and grounds, the committee report to the House the following. He says:

"It is necessary, in order to an economical and proper construction of the bridge, that the entire amount needed for its construction should be appropriated by Congress at one time. The bridge could be built in a year, I presume, and without interrupting travel. The Government has a great many employés at the navy-yard, arsenal, and marine barracks, all of whom are supplied more or less with country produce from Maryland; and there is a large class of people on the other side, in addition to the Insane Asylum and the forts, that should be considered. I do not know anything about the cost of the present bridge. Last year $7,000 were spent on it for repairs; $5,000 were spent on it the year before that, and $7,000 the year before that, besides the salaries of two watchmen, who are needed there to attend the draw. If a permanent bridge were built there one watchman would be sufficient. I do not consider the bridge as it now is safe for a heavy load to go over it. It would be condemned by any corps of engineers. I do not believe it could be repaired so as to make it a safe bridge without the expenditure of an amount which would about equal that required to build a new one. It is very desirable to have the bridge located where it now is."

The committee have considered the question as to the amount necessary for building such a bridge as will be durable and lasting, and concur in the recommendation that the sum of $250,000 would be sufficient for that purpose; and they therefore recommend the passage of House bill No. 2106.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. The Committee of the Whole will bear in mind that some time since the Committee on the Judiciary were instructed by a resolution to make an inquiry as to the relative rights and interest of the Government of the United States and the people of this District in the property within the District; and in connection with that resolution was urged the importance of ascertaining what proportion, if any, of the expenditures in this District for streets, highways, public buildings—bridges, I suppose—and other matters of that kind, should be borne by the Government.

It is important, it seems to me, that that matter should be settled, if it is possible to settle it, so that it may be determined what definite proportion of the expenditures incurred here for various matters of this sort should be borne by the Government of the United States. Of course the Government owns a large amount of property in this District.

Mr. HALE, of New York. If my friend will allow me, I can perhaps obviate the difficulty he is now suggesting by an explanation which I am prepared to give.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I will wait and hear the gentleman's explanation.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I fully concur with the gentleman from Vermont, that it is desirable we should not make any appropriation for public improvements in Washington, or should not determine the amount to be paid from the Treasury for any such purpose, until we shall receive the report of the Judiciary Committee upon the questions referred to them, and perhaps also the report of the joint investigating committee upon some matters which have direct pertinence to the same general subject. The Committee on the District of Columbia therefore propose to avoid asking the House to pass upon questions of that character, involving generally the relations of the Federal Government to the District, and their respective obligations in regard to the expenditures of money by way of public improvement or otherwise, until those committees shall be able to report. The case of the Anacostia bridge, referred to in this bill, stands, however, upon an entirely different footing; and the committee saw no reason for awaiting the report of the Judiciary Committee, or any other committee, before acting on this subject, for the reason that the matter does not involve the question as to the ordinary relations of this District to the Federal Government.

This bridge was originally a private bridge, built and owned by an incorporated company. Some years ago (my impression is it was before the beginning of the late war, but unfortunately I have not my papers at hand to refer to) the Federal Government, under the authority of an act of Congress, purchased this bridge, taking a transfer from the company of all its rights. From that time to this the Federal Government has been the sole owner and controller of the bridge in every respect. The Government has kept it in repair, so far as it has been kept in repair, during that time; for I regret to say that during a large part of the time within the last few years the bridge has been in a very imperfect condition. The Government, as the assignee of the company, is, as the committee conceive, beyond all doubt bound to maintain a bridge there for the public interest. It is not a matter with which the District of Columbia as a government has anything to do. It is not a matter for which the inhabitants of the District are subject to taxation. The only question presented in this case, as the committee conceive, is, whether the Government should fulfill its duty in maintaining this bridge, which it certainly impliedly obligated itself to maintain when it took the transfer of the title from the company. This is my explanation in reply to the suggestion of the gentleman from Vermont.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. As I understood the object of the resolution of inquiry which was sent to the Committee on the Judiciary, it was to establish some new relation between the Government and the District of Columbia as to the proportions which each should pay of public expenditures in the District. But perhaps it is not wise to discuss that point except so far as it may be a ground for passing this over for the present. It might be well perhaps to pass this bill over until that committee shall come in with their report, and until the committee which has been investigating some of the expenditures of the District of Columbia shall come in with their report.

For these reasons it seems to me advisable that the consideration of this bill should be postponed. But meanwhile let me call attention to another feature of the bill. I suppose if the Government is to be at the charge of maintaining this bridge as a free bridge perpetually, the cheapest course in the end would be to build an iron bridge. But it is to be noticed that this bill makes no provision as to the amount the bridge shall cost, as to making any contract for the bridge, as to limiting the amount of expenses which may be incurred in its construction, or as to the time when it shall be built. It does nothing in fact except to authorize the appropriation of $250,000 as a starting-point toward building an iron bridge. That is all that is said about it except that it shall be a substantial iron bridge, and then at the conclusion it has the provision that the said bridge shall be constructed on a plan to be approved of by the Chief of Engineers of the Army, and under his supervision and direction. Under that provision a bridge might be built which would cost millions of dollars. I do not say that it will cost as much. But it might; and the Government is pledged to go on with the work if a plan is approved of by the Chief of Engineers. If he makes a report involving an expenditure of one or two million dollars, the Government is pledged to go on with the bridge, according to the plan approved by this officer.

If this were a work requiring to be done instantly there might be some excuse for leaving this at the discretion of an officer of the Government. But we have all of us had experience how much these public works cost at the very best, when Congress endeavors to put around them every possible limitation. But when, as in this case, Congress leaves it without any limitation whatever, we are left to imagine what may be the total that this bridge will finally cost. I am told that some estimates were before the committee that it could be built for something less than $400,000. How carefully these estimates were made, or whether they were based on any proposition showing that it could be completed for that sum, I do not know. However, according to some estimates, it was supposed that it would cost in the neighborhood of $400,000; but it is clear that as this bill now stands it may be made to cost very much beyond that. And inasmuch as there is no need of any haste, as I conceive, about this, I think the consideration of the bill might as well be postponed. I suppose this old bridge can be patched up and kept running for some months longer; and it seems to me much the wiser course for us to determine, in the first place, something definite as to what such a bridge as is desirable for crossing the river at that point will cost, made with iron, assuming that we will be at the whole expense of it.

Mr. ELDREDGE. If the gentleman will allow me, I will make a suggestion which will perhaps aid him a little in considering this subject. His experience and mine I suppose will lead us both to the same conclusion, that if we had put into the bill any sum beyond which the cost of this bridge should not go, it would at all events reach that limit. It was therefore considered by the committee that it was better to put it in this form than to insert a definite sum beyond which the cost should not go; for we supposed that in that event all the arrangements would be made to build it at a sum about what we should name as the maximum sum.

Then, again, a word as regards the necessity of this bridge at the present time. The bridge, as was proven before the committee, is now absolutely unsafe. The engineer who has examined it told the committee that he expected every time he heard from the bridge to hear that it had fallen; that he should not be surprised to hear of its falling any day or any moment. And it has fallen, and teams have been lost. It is a bridge extensively used. Yet it is entirely out of repair, and Congress has been appropriating yearly sums of money for repairs. It is useless, in the judgment of the committee, to make any further repairs on the bridge. Congress has made this a free bridge, and it is on our hands.

A question of duty arose as to what we should do in regard to it—as to what was our duty in regard to the bridge being in this state. Should we wait and leave a bridge like this, traveled constantly, liable to fall at any hour, or should we make an appropriation for it? There is not a member of the committee, in my judgment, who has a single particle of feeling on the subject at all. I believe every member of the committee rose to the consideration of his duty in the premises as to what ought to be done. And it was on that consideration, and for that reason alone, we consented to report this bill to the House.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I trust no gentleman of the committee will think for a moment I have in any respect whatever reflected upon them.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I did not so understand the gentleman's remarks. I have only taken the opportunity to say, in behalf of the committee, that we made an effort to rise to a proper consideration of what our duty was in regard to this matter.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. There is no doubt the House ought to take reasonable precautions in reference to legislation of this kind, and especially in view of the experience we have had in the construction of public works.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I meant to suggest that if there is any limitation which the gentleman from Vermont can suggest which should be embraced in the bill, I, as one of the members of the committee, will be glad to have it incorporated. I would like, and I have no doubt the Committee on the District of Columbia would like, to have it done. We have looked at it in every light we could as to how best we could build this bridge—how it could be done in the cheapest, and at the same time in the most serviceable way—what is the least sum of money for which we could put up the structure. I apprehend the bridge will not cost a very large sum, perhaps not greater than $250,000. The lowest sum, if I remember correctly, in the estimates was about $260,000. The committee thought it might be done for less than that. Those estimates were made at a time when higher prices ruled than at present. It is an important bridge, and ought to be taken care of at once.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Whether it is possible to make any limitation in reference to the expenditures upon any one of these public works, other than in the way contemplated in this bill, I confess myself ignorant. It has sometimes seemed to me utterly impossible for this Congress to in any event attempt to accomplish anything in the way of limitation upon any expenditure of the Government. We in various ways put limitations upon appropriations; we say they should be used only for specific purposes, and if not used within two years they should be covered into the Treasury; that the amount of work we appropriate for should not exceed a certain sum; but in nine cases out of ten, and I think ten cases out of ten, these limitations amount in the end to nothing substantial.

Now, it seems to me a way might be devised by which the Chief of Engineers of the Army here should be authorized by joint resolution to solicit bids for the construction of an iron bridge across this Anacostia River, and he might report to Congress the result of his solicitation for bids, and the contracts offered to him in pursuance of it. Then we should ascertain at once what the amount would be which would be required to build such a structure, and whether on the whole we desired one kind or another, on our judgment as to the comparative expense of the different kinds of bridges. Whether we shall have a substantial bridge, whether of masonry or of iron, is wholly left to the Chief of Engineers. If there should be a structure costing $100,000 more than another just as serviceable and substantial, he is at liberty to select that kind of bridge. But I do not wish to make any captious opposition to this bill, of course.

Mr. HALE, of New York. Let me ask the gentleman right here whether he does not think, upon the whole, the judgment of the Chief of Engineers as to material, style, and character of bridge, would be more satisfactory to the country even than the judgment of this body and its coadjutor body at the other end of the Capitol?

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. If I wish to get the judgment of an individual or of a body as to the kind of structure which should be put up here, as to durability and strength, of course I should prefer the opinion of the Chief of Engineers to the opinion of the Committee on the District of Columbia, as much as I esteem their judgment. But when it comes to the question of expense between two classes of structure where each may be equally serviceable, equally good as far as the purpose for which it is to be raised is concerned, then I do not know but I should prefer the opinion of the committee to the opinion of the Chief of Engineers. In other words, sir, I should regard the committee probably as having more interest in keeping down the cost of the bridge without detriment to the bridge itself, and should rely on the judgment of the committee rather than on the opinion of the Chief of Engineers. As a professional man, of course his judgment is worth more than the judgment of the whole House. I understand that very well. Still, as a question between two structures, the one equally serviceable with the other, but the one costing $100,000 more than the other, I should prefer the judgment of the gentlemen on the Committee on the District of Columbia to the judgment of the Chief of Engineers. If it were a question only as to the strength or durability of the bridge, I would, of course, prefer the opinion of these officers, but not upon the question whether a cheaper or more expensive bridge shall be constructed. It does seem to me that there ought to be some limitation upon the cost of the proposed bridge.

Mr. HALE, of New York. Will the gentleman suggest what the limitation should be?

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I wish that the committee would state what their judgment in the matter is from the estimates that have been submitted to them, and what, in their opinion, would be a fair cost of the bridge.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I would say that, from the estimates made to us, $375,000 would a little more than cover the highest estimate made.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I would suggest, then, that we put in the words "the expense not to exceed in all $250,000."

Mr. HALE, of New York. I think that is too small a sum.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Then make it $300,000.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I do not think we ought to say less than $300,000.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Well, I will move to add to the proviso the words "the whole expense thereof not to exceed $250,000."

Mr HALE, of New York. For the purpose of testing the sense of the House, I will move to amend the amendment so as to make the sum $350,000 instead of $250,000. I think I am quite as desirous as the gentleman from Vermont that rigid economy should be observed in the building of such structures; but if we build an iron bridge, which I believe is true economy, I think there is no doubt, from the information given to the committee from official sources, that $250,000 would fall very considerably short of the amount for which it can be built. I think we have reason to believe that $350,000 will build it, although the estimates run a trifle over that. I trust that in a matter of this kind the House will not hesitate between an appropriation of $250,000 and $350,000. There is no danger in leaving the question of the construction and the character of the bridge to the Chief of the Engineer Corps. Certainly if he cannot be trusted with that matter, it is hard to say whom we shall trust. I do not desire to take up the time of the committee in discussing the matter further, and I hope we shall have a vote.

Mr. CLYMER. Can the gentleman state when the estimate was made by the Chief of Engineers for an iron bridge?

Mr. HALE, of New York. It was made within the last six weeks or two months.

Mr. CLYMER. I have been informed that it was made about a year ago.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I do not understand it so. The estimates were sent to us six weeks or two months ago, and we understand they were made then.

Mr. RICE. No; the estimates were made a year ago.

Mr. HALE, of New York. My colleague says the estimates were made a year ago, and he is doubtless correct.

Mr. CLYMER. If that be the case, it is very evident that, if the estimate was $367,000 then, the bridge could be built for $250,000 now. It is a well-known fact that the iron which will enter into the construction of this bridgs is about 33 per cent. cheaper to-day than it was a year ago, and that all the materials that enter into its construction have fallen in cost about in that proportion. If, then, the contract were made now for it, I think $250,000 would be ample, considering the great fall in the price of iron.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. How about the masonry?

Mr. CLYMER. I do not know anything about the masonry, but I presume the piers and abutments are there now.

Mr. RICE. Inasmuch as there are other important matters to come before the House to-day, I do not desire to prolong this debate; but I wish to say a few words about this bridge. This bridge is within the District of Columbia. It belongs to the Government of the United States. It was altered by the Government of the United States to answer their purposes during the war, and it is now so far decayed that it is dangerous to use it. If it belonged to a private corporation, they would not venture to allow persons to pass over it, because they would be responsible for damages in case of accident. The bridge is very much used, and a new bridge is wanted, and wanted now. I believe that the expense for that bridge must be put at the lowest mark, in order to get anything with which to build a bridge at all, and for that reason I shall consent to the limitation to $250,000; not that I believe that that sum will build as good a bridge as $367,000 would, but I believe that it will build a bridge that will answer the purpose now, and for that reason I shall vote for the amendment of the gentleman from Vermont.

Now, sir, when it is provided by this House and the Senate that the bridge shall be built, proposals are advertised for building a bridge of a certain class, which is laid down plainly before those who desire to build it, by a competent Government officer, and then they come in and see it, and say what they will build the bridge for. An accomplished and competent officer designs the bridge, a competent man advertises for proposals to build the bridge, and if a man comes in and offers to do it for so much, and it is agreed upon, he builds it. Can this House better that? Is there any opinion to be got from the members of this House that is going to make that better? Certainly not. And if we do defer to that sort of opinion, it may be next year or the year after before this bridge is built. It is located in this District; the United States should bear the expense of building it. If you believe the United States ought to build that bridge, then I hope you will also believe that it should be built now. If you say that the District of Columbia, as a government, should pay for a part of it, Heaven knows we will never find out where that government would begin nor end. I say to you that the government of the District of Columbia has no money, and it will build no part of this bridge, and therefore you will have no bridge. I believe the United States should build it entirely. I believe that $250,000 will build a bridge that will be useful and valuable for fifty years to come. I hope that amount will be given. Although I should be very sorry to vote against anything the chairman of my committee proposes, yet I believe $250,000 will build a bridge that will answer all desirable purposes. You do not want beauty or grandeur there; what you want is a useful bridge. Pass this appropriation now, get it through the Senate, build the bridge, and the people will be satisfied.

Mr. COBURN. It seems to be generally conceded by the gentlemen who have spoken so far that it is the duty of the Government of the United States to build this bridge. I understand that this is not a national work, not a thing in which anybody is particularly interested outside of the people of the District of Columbia. In my judgment, if anybody should build this bridge it should be the people of this District. It is a mere local matter. You might as well call upon the people of the United States to build a bridge anywhere else as to build this one. Why should we go outside of the public grounds for the purpose of expending these large sums of money? It strikes me that it would be bad policy to do so.

Gentlemen say that this bridge belongs to the Government of the United States; that the Government bought out the old bridge, and have been repairing it and maintaining it as a free bridge for several years. If so, then that much gratuity has already been given to the people of the District, and they should be thankful for it. But that does not imply any obligation on the part of the Government to build a new bridge. For one, I will vote for a proposition to give this bridge, which is now free, to the people of the District of Columbia, and let them build a new one if they want it. I see no reason why we should make any appropriation for this purpose. Let the people of this District build this bridge if they want it; and if they do not want it, let them cease to travel there. Let them build their own bridges, as the people in other parts of the country do. It is for their own exclusive use, of purely local interest, and a burden that in no sense should be imposed on the nation.

Now, a word or two about the plans for the bridge. It is not safe to trust the Chief of Engineers, the Supervising Architect of the Treasury, or any other officer, with the construction of public works. Not that they would do it dishonestly, but every officer of the Government, when allowed to construct one of these public works, wants to build himself a monument. We have an instance of that in the great building which is now being put up at the other end of Pennsylvania avenue for the State, War, and Navy Departments, full of costly ornaments and expensive work. In New York City we have another building, with all manner of frosted fretwork, in ornate style, fastened upon it—the post-office building. It is beautiful, it is true; but it is not the duty of the people of this country to cultivate the fine arts, particularly in their public buildings. That which is plain, substantial, or even massive, may be built, fit for every use, and designed with all modern improvements, without the extravagant display made on some public structures.

And here, if you allow an Army engineer to build this bridge as he chooses, you will have a costly structure, a perfect model of an iron bridge, something beyond anything to be seen on the Thames or the Seine, or in any of the great capitals of the Old World. I warn gentlemen against this step. I remember some years ago the debate which occurred, and which was brought to my mind the other day by the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, [Mr. DAWES,] when he talked about the folly and the extravagance of the United States in the construction of Government buildings. I remember very well when the New York post-office was still below the surface of the ground, when you were laying the foundation and building the basement, a proposition was then made by myself on the floor of this House that, as a general principle, we should not go on and make public structures until plans, working drawings, specifications, and all the estimates were submitted to Congress, so that we could see in advance, as any private citizen would, what money we were about to expend. That is the only true way to do this business; that is the key-note in all this matter of public structures. This system would save millions that now go without a thought, and hang upon the breath of an officer that never looks to the question of expense, and to whom the people have intrusted no responsibility.

If we now had established as a part of the law of the country, and as the practice of Congress, that we should have plans and specifications and drawings, to show exactly what kind of structures we were called upon to make, there would be no complaint on the part of the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, or any other person anywhere, that the Architect of the Treasury, or the Secretary of the Treasury, or Congress, or anybody else, had gone into unreasonable extravagance. The true way is, lay your plans as a man of common sense and economy does, and work up to them. What is there, sir, in the plan of a building that will cost millions of dollars that makes it too contemptible a matter for us to consider? We will debate an hour over paying a widow a pension of $100; we draw the line and plummet in little things; we wrangle about the monthly pay of a doorkeeper. We will debate sometimes a whole day over a trivial expenditure that would not lay the corner-stone of one of these great public structures; yet, when we come to consider these buildings, nobody is thought competent to have an opinion about the matter but an Army engineer or the Supervising Architect of the Treasury. Why, sir, if I were the Supervising Architect of the Treasury I would build a monument in everlasting stone wherever the people of the country would appropriate money enough. I would rival the architect of Saint Paul's, Sir Christopher Wren, or the architect of Saint Peter's, at Rome, if I had at my back the people of the United States, with a treasury into which I could put my hand. Architects will do this; engineers will do it; every man of science and art will do it, if he has the treasury of a great nation into which to reach and from which to draw his supplies. My judgment is that we should not go on with this structure, even if the House should determine to go on with it eventually, until we know exactly what we are going to do.

But, in the first place, I hold that this bill should be rejected entirely. Let the people of the District build their own bridges. It is enough that we erect the great public buildings here; it is enough that we make enormous expenditures for their maintenance and adornment; it is enough that we improve the surroundings of the Capitol and our public grounds; it is enough that we pay four-fifths of the expenses of all the streets surrounding these grounds. It is asking entirely too much to call upon us to bridge the Potomac at either end of the city. One of these bridges is away to the westward, six miles out of the city, and this other bridge connects a part of the District outside of that intended for general national use.

Mr. HOLMAN. My colleague [Mr. COBURN] has so clearly established the proposition that this bill should not pass, that it seems to me there can be no serious purpose to fasten upon the General Government the duty of building such structures. Without entering into any argument, I move to strike out the enacting clause of the bill, for the purpose of testing the sense of the committee.

The question being taken; there were—ayes 72, noes 43; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. COTTON and Mr. HOLMAN were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 85, noes 33.

So the motion of Mr. HOLMAN, to strike out the enacting clause of the bill, was agreed to.

PAYMENT OF DISTRICT TEACHERS.

The next District bill on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2550) making an appropriation for the payment of teachers in the public schools in the District of Columbia.

The bill was read. It appropriates $97,740.50, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the payment of teachers in the public schools in the District of Columbia, from the 1st day of September, 1873, to the 1st day of March, 1874; and the money which may be paid under the act is to be regarded as an advancement made by the United States to said District, to be deducted from moneys which Congress shall hereafter appropriate for the reimbursement to the District of any expenditures. The money thereby appropriated is to be disbursed under the supervision of the Commissioner of Education.

Mr. COTTON. I ask that the report accompanying the bill be read.

The report was read. It states that the Committee for the District of Columbia were directed by a resolution of the House, adopted March 2, to report forthwith a bill which would compel the payment of the wages due teachers in the schools of said District; that the committee have had the same under consideration; that it appears from a statement made to the committee by the comptroller of the District that the expenses of supporting the schools throughout the entire District are in arrears from the 1st day of September last; that the amount due to teachers to March 1 is $97,740.50 This includes both white and colored schools. The school funds are exhausted; and the committee see no way to effect the payment at this time of this indebtedness except through an appropriation by Congress. Therefore, for the purpose of accomplishing what is contemplated in the resolution, the committee report a bill making an appropriation for the sum above mentioned for the payment of teachers to March 1. It is provided in the bill that the appropriation shall be regarded as an advancement to the District, to be deducted from moneys which Congress may hereafter appropriate for reimbursing to the District any expenditures.

Mr. SPEER. What paper is it the Clerk has just read?

The CHAIRMAN. The report of the committee.

Mr. SPEER. It is a very singular document. [Laughter.]

Mr. COTTON. In reporting this bill the committee has followed the order of the House, and included only an appropriation of the sum requisite to pay the teachers up to the first of the present month. I have here the report of the comptroller of the District, giving us the exact figures of the amount now in arrears. This report shows that up to the 1st of March, the present month, the amount due to the teachers is $97,740.50, being their pay for the last six months. By the same report, it appears that for other expenses during the same time there is due the further sum of $60,594.82; making the aggregate of arrears for school expenses $158,335.32.

In this bill we have included only an appropriation for the pay of the teachers. As the committee was directed to report a bill to compel their payment, we regarded ourselves as bound to execute the order of the House. We have not considered the proportion that should be paid by the General Government for school expenses in this District, but simply the sum necessary to pay the amount due to these teachers. I would say, however, that in the appropriations during past years Congress has never given anything, so far as I am advised, to this District for school purposes—not one dollar.

We have inserted in the bill a provision that the sum appropriated shall be charged against the District in any appropriation that Congress may see fit hereafter to make in the way of reimbursing expenditures; so that, if it should be decided eventually that the Government ought not to appropriate this amount for school purposes, it can be taken into account in respect to other funds when appropriations are made for the District. But in view of the fact this is the first appropriation made by Congress for school purposes, it may be a question whether this sum should be given absolutely; but the bill guards against that, in keeping this as an open account against the general appropriation made for the District.

The only action I find ever taken by Congress in regard to school funds in the way of appropriations was in 1858, when the Senate passed a bill, of which I find a synopsis in the Congressional Globe, which I will ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. No. 191) for the benefit of the public schools in the city of Washington was read the second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that so much of the fines and forfeitures hereafter to be collected in the District of Columbia as accrue to the United States shall be surrendered to the city of Washington for school purposes until the whole sum so received shall amount to $50,000. It declares the corporate authorities in the city of Washington may, with the assent of the owners of real estate in the city, levy a special tax of ten cents on each $100 worth of taxable property in the corporate limits of the city for the benefit of the public schools, and that whenever the Secretary of the Treasury shall be officially notified by the mayor that this tax has been levied and collected, it shall be his duty to pay from the Treasury of the United States to the persons legally authorized to receive the school funds for the city of Washington a sum equal to the amount thus raised by taxation, but not more than $20,000 per annum is to be paid by the United States; and these payments are to continue for five years, unless Congress shall otherwise order.

Mr. COTTON. That bill passed the Senate but failed in the House. It proposes to give $20,000 a year for school purposes for five years. That is the only attempt I can find of legislation for aiding the schools in this District. So I think if we could pass this bill, and pass it outright, even without a reservation in it to charge this sum against the District here, we would not be going very far out of the way.

Mr. SPEER. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. COTTON. I was going to yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. G. F. HOAR,] who offered the resolution under which this bill has been reported, as I understand he desires to make some remarks.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, although I hoped the committee would have adopted a different solution of this problem, yet, on the whole, they have reported the only one practicable on the subject. There are three alternatives.

In the capital of this nation, the conducting and management of which of course peculiarly affects the national honor—which is peculiarly an example to mankind of the working of republican institutions—to which the representatives of other countries look with especial interest as affording an example of the working of our public-school system, of which we are all so proud, and the exclusive legislation over which is by the Constitution confided to Congress, it is admitted there is a scandal, which, I undertake to say, would in every city or considerable town in this country, if it existed there, create such a feeling of personal disgrace that every considerable inhabitant would not rest easy until the scandal was removed. Ever since the 1st of September teachers, a large proportion of them women, persons rendering an important public service, but humble and dependent on their daily labor for their support, have been, by a breach of faith on the part of the authorities of this capital, deprived of their wages. Some of them are without shoes. Some of them have been compelled to pawn their clothing and their jewelry for their support. Some of them have been compelled, by the necessities of the boarding-house keepers where they lodged, to change their place of boarding because they could not obtain their wages. I have received letters and a communication signed by a very large number of these ladies, and the facts I state are unquestioned.

Now, we have to do one of three things, either to leave this scandal to continue, having the duty attendant upon our sovereignty in this District, or we have to provide for a system of assessing and collecting taxation upon the inhabitants of the District, or we have to adopt the plan of the committee.

To provide for taxation require time which must elapse to make a proper valuation of the personal and real property of the District. So before such a tax could be properly assessed and collected months would ensue. Another objection to doing that is this: There is a joint committee of the House and Senate engaged in an investigation of all these matters which have been charged as abuses upon the existing District government. And whatever outside information any of us may have, it does not seem to me that it would be becoming or just to adopt a permanent system of policy toward the present authorities of the District, or any of them, based on any opinions as to their responsibility or their previous action until we have got the result of that investigation. Their opponents are heard, and heard by able and skillful counsel, and they are able and experienced men, some of them, themselves. And the authorities of the District are to be heard. And until some result is arrived at it would be unjust for this House now to undertake to determine what policy it shall adopt in dealing with the District authorities, what proportion of the public expenditure for the future the Government shall assume, and what method shall be adopted of compelling the citizens, if they have been in any way delinquent hitherto, to pay their proper share of this municipal and other public funds.

It therefore follows that the only alternative is the one which the committee, it seems to me, have very wisely adopted; and that is that Congress shall say, "We will pay these District school-teachers ourselves this small sum of $97,000, and we will regard the nation virtually as having taken an assignment of their claims; that is, from whatever sum, be it more or less, and to whatever purpose devoted, which Congress shall hereafter provide for the purposes of the District of Columbia, this sum that we now advance shall be deducted." If it is determined that nothing hereafter shall be paid by the nation for the schools of the District, as it has been determined in the past, but that three, five, ten, or any other number of hundreds of thousands of dollars is to be paid for streets, when you come to make that payment into the Treasury it will be considered that you have paid already $97,000 of that sum.

Mr. MELLISH. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question for information?

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Certainly.

Mr. MELLISH. I have not heard all the gentleman's remarks; but he said we had a duty to perform, and that was a duty contingent upon ultimate sovereignty. I would ask the gentleman, what is our immediate specific duty and responsibility in the premises?

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I understand, Mr. Chairman, that the Constitution of the United States imposes upon us the duty of exclusive legislation in all cases. The last Congress determined that that was a duty which they could constitutionally perform by delegation. I do not agree with that constitutional opinion. But no doubt that is the opinion upon which Congress acted. And therefore one branch of the District government being elected by the people of this District, the other branch being appointed by the President of the United States, and the governor being appointed by the President of the United States, that composite government exercises, as the delegate of Congress, the duties of legislation over this District. But we are responsible if that machine to which we have delegated our duty fails to work. If the agents who are doing the duty which we are sworn to perform when we swore to support the Constitution fail to do their duty and to maintain the credit of the Government in the discharge of its obligations to this District and its citizens, Congress is bound, in my opinion, to furnish the remedy, to see that the evil is cured, and to restrain the citizens if they are in fault; if it is not the fault of the citizens but of the nation, then to make good the deficiency ourselves. The question which of those two things is to be done, does not arise in connection with this bill. We simply make an advance to be deducted ultimately from whatever sum shall be appropriated to the District.

Here the committee informally rose, and Mr. TOWNSEND took the chair as Speaker pro tempore, to receive a MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, informed the House that the Senate had rejected the bill (H. R. No. 216) granting a pension to Timothy Page.

The message also informed the House that the Senate had passed, without amendment, the bill (H. R. No. 2422) to approve an act of the Legislative Assembly of the District of Columbia relating to parishes of the Protestant Episcopal Church.

The message further announced that the Senate insisted upon its amendment to the bill (H. R. No. 1923) authorizing the payment of annuities into the treasury of the Seminole tribe of Indians, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, and had appointed Mr. BUCKINGHAM, Mr. INGALLS, and Mr. STEVENSON to be the managers of the conference on the part of the Senate.

PAYMENT OF TEACHERS IN THE DISTRICT.

The Committee of the Whole resumed its session.

Mr. FRYE. I do not know, Mr. Chairman, that it is of any kind of use to say one word in support of any proposition which favors the District of Columbia. The truth is, the air is entirely replete with charges of corruption, of fraud, of stealing, of wrong of every name and kind in everything that the District of Columbia undertakes to do. And that has a very decided influence upon this House in the consideration of any proposition whatever which comes before it favoring the District of Columbia.

Now, sir, just look at what occurred a few moments ago. The Government owns a bridge across this river, owns it to all intents and purposes, and every hour of the day men and women traveling across that bridge endanger their lives. The Government of the United States owns it, owns each terminus of the bridge, owns the land on which each end of it rests. The Government owns also the National Insane Asylum, costing, perhaps, a million dollars, having six hundred inmates, lying right across the river, the only access to which is over this Government bridge. And yet, notwithstanding all these facts, when a proposition is made to build a bridge, instead of considering the question at all what kind of a bridge shall be built, whether the proposition of the committee is too much or too little, the House, by a large majority, votes at once that we will build no bridge whatever, but will let the thing stand as it is to-day. Now, sir, I cannot account for the action of the House upon any hypothesis other than this——

Mr. RANDALL. I deny the right of the gentleman to reflect on the past action of this House.

Mr. FRYE. I am merely stating the action of the House, and I believe I state it correctly.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman is reflecting on the action of the House. I make the point of order that he is not in order in reflecting on the past action of the House, which he has no right to do.

Mr. FRYE. I do not know what I might have arrived at, but I had not got to the reflections.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not mean to allow the gentleman to do so, beyond what is due in courtesy to the House, if I can prevent it.

Mr. FRYE. Very well; then I will say that now there is another proposition before the House.

Mr. RANDALL. That is right.

Mr. FRYE. And that proposition is to raise money for the support of the schools in the District. Now, as to that, I do not know what its fate may be. But I do have an opinion of my own in regard to the propriety of the measure under discussion.

Here are forty thousand black people, a great number of them paupers, a great number of them unable to read or write, who were forced into the District of Columbia after the war. They have children. Ought they to be educated? No man will say for a moment they ought not to be, because the very foundation of this Republic is the intelligence of its citizens. These black men are to be the men one of these days taking part in the Government, as they are doing even now. Their children are to take their places, and they must receive education in order to become good citizens.

Again, there are some twelve or fourteeen thousand Government clerks and employés in this city. I venture to say that a large majority of them do not pay one dollar of taxes in the city.

Again, there are members of Congress here who send their children to the public schools. They do not pay one dollar of taxes in support of those schools. Now, sir, shall the District of Columbia be compelled out of their poverty, because they are poor, to pay for the support of all these schools, and the Government of the United States, owning all this property here and bringing all these people here, contribute nothing whatever to their support?

I said members of Congress sent their children to the public schools. I do, sir. I came here, and having that care for my children which all fathers do, I went and examined the public schools of this District; I examined them with care, to see whether or not I should intrust my little girls in the public schools of the District, and I dare say here that there are very few States, and very few cities in the United States of America, which have a school superior to the Franklin school, where my children go. I dare say that there are few cities in the United States having a corps of teachers superior to the corps of teachers in that Franklin school; and I will say here, sir, that I am delighted with the progress my children have made since they have been there.

Now, sir, those teachers in that school have not been paid one dollar for seven or eight months. Three of them came from my own city, were educated at the normal schools of my own State, and they come to me personally with their complaints. How much longer can the existing state of things be permitted to go on? The District has no money with which to pay them. The United States, in my judgment, owes a contribution to the support of the schools of the District; and I trust that the House will now consent to this advance, if they do nothing more for the District of Columbia.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I have not any doubt that on some adjustment of the relations between the United States and the people of the District of Columbia, a portion of the public burdens of this District ought to be borne by appropriations from the Treasury of the United States; as to that I make no question; but as to some of the reasons which are given for this appropriation, and for many other appropriations for this District, I have a word to say.

In the first place, I desire to notice the remark made by the gentleman from Maine who has just taken his seat, and which I have frequently seen in the newspapers of the District, that a large portion of the people of this District are employés and officers of the Government, who were not taxed here, and who did not contribute toward the expense of this District. Why, Mr. Chairman, what sort of a notion is that of taxation? Taxation in this District is on real estate; and the later, and, as many think, wiser economists, hold that that is the true system of taxation. That it is an equal and just system of taxation, and that when real estate is taxed equally, then all persons in the community, whether they own real estate or not, will bear their fair proportion of taxation.

Why, sir, we collect taxes on tobacco and taxes on whisky; and what would be thought if a gentleman should come in here and say that the manufacturers of tobacco and the manufacturers of whisky pay the whole of those taxes; they do not pay them at all, any more than that they contribute their share on the quantity of the articles which they consume themselves. Every dollar that is charged to them of that tax is charged over by them when they sell the whisky and tobacco to the persons who use that whisky and tobacco, and they are the persons who pay the taxes. It is so with the taxes which we collect from customs, and that is the only theory upon which that tax or any of our internal-revenue taxes can be based. They must be uniform, and as far as possible bear upon all alike; and they do bear upon all alike, as near as we can make any taxation so bear.

How is it here in this District? Every acre of the real estate of this District, except what is owned by the Government, is taxed. And you, Mr. Chairman, and every one else here, pay a part of that tax. You cannot stay in a hotel over night or go into a restaurant for a meal of victuals in this city without paying a portion of that tax.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Of the whisky tax? [Laughter.]

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I do not mean the whisky tax, because you, Mr. Chairman, and the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. G. F. HOAR,] and every member of this House, cannot be supposed to pay any portion of the whisky tax. [Laughter.] The taxes of this city are charged up in expenses on the part of everybody who pays for anything here. Every member of Congress who hires a house, or a room in a house, or who pays for board, in this city, contributes to paying the taxes imposed in this District. Every clerk in a Department who lives in the District has a portion of this tax charged over to him in one way or another, and he pays his full share of the taxes that are imposed upon the real estate of the District. He cannot have a roof to shelter him without paying a portion of that tax. I say, therefore, that this idea, that because a portion of the people of this District are not borne on the tax lists of the District, therefore the taxes of the District are paid by a small proportion of the people, and the employés of the Government pay nothing, is absurd and ridiculous, and there is nothing to justify it for a moment.

Now, what further? This bill is a confession on the face of it of the bankruptcy of this District government. It is also one of the severest reflections that could be made by a committee of this House upon the original organic act of this District which authorized these two separate and anomalous governments here.

Mr. HALE, of New York. Allow me to interrupt the gentleman for a moment.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Certainly.

Mr. HALE, of New York. The gentleman speaks of this bill as a reflection by the committee.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I do not mean that it is intended as a reflection.

Mr. HALE, of New York. The gentleman ought to bear in mind that this bill is not the act of the Committee on the District of Columbia, but the act of the House of Representatives, which instructed the committee to report it. If there is any reflection it is made by the House and not by the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I have not now in my mind the terms of the resolution of instruction passed by the House. As I understood it, it was to instruct the committee to provide some means by which the District government should pay these teachers.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. To provide the means to compel the payment of the dues of these school-teachers.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. The gentleman from Massachusetts says that the resolution of instruction to the committee was that they should provide means to compel the payment of these school-teachers the amount due them. I agree that these school-teachers should be paid. I am not by any means certain that I am not ready to say that the District government, having had their services, and not paying them, Congress shall pay them out of its liberality, if they do not do so because it is their duty to do so. No class of public servants are entitled to more generous consideration by the Legislature than the teachers of our schools. As I was saying, this bill is a reflection, from whatever source that reflection may have come, upon the form of government in the District.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Allow me a moment to suggest to the gentleman from Vermont that this bill merely appropriates a sum for the payment of these teachers, to be deducted from any sum that may be hereafter appropriated to the District of Columbia. It compels payment by the District by deducting the amount from what they may receive hereafter.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. As I said, it is a confession of the bankruptcy of the District, which bankruptcy grows out of this anomalous form of government, by which the board of public works do what they please, run in debt to any extent they see fit, for there is no limitation whatever upon them; and then they turn around and come back to Congress, when their creditors are pressing them and asking for their dues, and say that their treasury is empty, that they are bankrupt, and that the United States owe it to the people who have done services under contracts with the board to pay them for those services. Now, sir, that will in my judgment go on just as long as these two forms of government continue here. Just so long as the board of public works in the District of Columbia are authorized to make the expenditures they are making year after year, to incur the debts they are incurring year after year, just so long will we, session after session, have their creditors here asking for relief at the hands of Congress. The contractors for work on the streets, the persons who have bought the District bonds at fifty or sixty cents on the dollar, the persons who have taken the District certificates for indebtedness, will be coming to Congress and saying, "You created this board of public works; its members are your officers, and you must see that their obligations are not dishonored." And I am not by any means certain but that when they present such a consideration to Congress, we shall be obliged to say that the credit of a board of officers whom we have ourselves established, to whom we have given almost irresponsible power, is not to be dishonored; that we will see that their debts are paid. I have no doubt that to-day the credit that this board of public works or the District of Columbia has in the markets of the country proceeds not from any reliance upon taxation in this District for the payment of its debts, not from any reliance on the board of public works for payment, but a reliance that in the end these obligations will be met from the Treasury of the United States. This is something worthy the consideration of this House. Whatever action may be taken upon this bill, it is worthy the consideration of the House whether some means cannot be devised to put an end to a condition of things under which there is apparently irresponsible authority to contract debts for which in the end we shall be held responsible in honor, if not under any strict contract.

Mr. COTTON. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SPEER] for five minutes

Mr. SPEER. Mr. Chairman, when I heard read the report accompanying this bill, it struck me as a most singular document. It was impliedly an argument against the passage of the bill. The bill seemed to be reluctantly reported, in obedience to what was conceived to be the compulsory instruction of the House, and was accompanied by a report which was an indirect argument against its passage.

Now, it is always ungracious to oppose any measure looking to the support of education; and I am not prepared to say that I would oppose this bill, if the proper information were before the House. But upon what principle alone can this House be justified in voting an appropriation for the support of schools in this District? In the first place there should be before the House a statement of the assessed value of the real estate of the District, showing how much is owned by private parties, and how much by the Government.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Such a statement has already been furnished.

Mr. SPEER. Where?

Mr. ELDREDGE. In a report which has been made to the House.

Mr. SPEER. It is not in the report accompanying this bill.

Mr. ELDREDGE. It is in a document of the House, which has been in the hands of every member during the entire Congress.

Mr. SPEER. It may have been in the hands of gentlemen on the Committee for the District of Columbia, but I have never seen it.

Mr. ELDREDGE. It has been furnished to everybody who desired it.

Mr. SPEER. But certainly it has not been examined by the House.

I was saying that we should know what is the actual assessed value of real estate in this District, how much of that is owned by private persons, and how much by the Government, and also what is the rate of taxation. Upon a reliable exhibit of this kind, it might be claimed, perhaps, that the Government would be bound to pay its proportion of the taxation according to the rate of assessment upon the property owned by the Government. That, at most, would be the extent of the duty of Congress.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I can tell the gentleman what the proportion is. The proportion which the property of the Government bears to the property owned by citizens is as ninety to one hundred.

Mr. SPEER. Well, I have not that information; perhaps the gentleman from Wisconsin has. In the absence of such information, to ask Congress to make a lumped appropriation of nearly $100,000 to the schools here, is a most extraordinary proposition. We might with the same propriety be asked to make an appropriation for paying the school-teachers of a Territory. The government of a Territory is under the control of Congress much more emphatically than is the government of this District.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Will the gentleman allow me to call his attention to a single point?

Mr. SPEER. Certainly.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I wish to remind the gentleman that this is not an appropriation objectionable on the ground which he is urging. It is simply an advancement of money, putting the United States in a position to say, whenever the first appropriation may be made for this District for any purpose—for highways, aqueduct, or anything else—that this appropriation shall be deducted.

Mr. SPEER. I am unwilling to legislate to-day upon the assumption that we are hereafter to make such appropriations for this District. When that question comes up we will meet it.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I believe there is an existing law which requires us to make appropriations for highways.

Mr. SPEER. If I am not in error as to the legislation of the last Congress, the appropriation then made for this District was upon the express condition that the District authorities should not on any account exceed in their expenditures the amount of money previously appropriated. Yet in the face and teeth of that law they have in fact, as I understand, exceeded the amount appropriated by the last Congress. I understand that the District authorities have gone on in violation of the express letter of the statute, and have expended $2,000,000 more than the Government of the United States at the last Congress appropriated.

Now, what is the argument in favor of this bill? It is that the school-teachers are unpaid. Well, that is unfortunate. The District authorities should have regulated the terms of their schools according to the amount of their school fund. That is the way this matter is arranged in the States. Having ascertained the amount to be derived from taxes, the school comptrollers or directors get together and say, "We will keep our schools open five months, or six months, or seven months; we will keep them open only so long as the funds at our command will justify." But here in this District, for six months past, these schools have been kept open, although there were no funds to pay the teachers, and I suppose they will be kept open for the next year, or the next two years, without the District providing any funds, if Congress will only have the generosity to step in and appropriate money for the support of these schools.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. COTTON. I yield now to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ELDREDGE] for three minutes.

Mr. ELDREDGE. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SPEER] has taken, in my judgment, a very improper view of the basis upon which appropriations should be made for the benefit of this District by the United States. That is one of the questions which has troubled the District Committee in all of our investigations, in all of our examinations, and on questions in reference to any recommendation in favor of appropriations by Congress; that is, upon what basis it should be done. Here is the Government of the United States, owning about $90,000,000 of the property in this District, while $100,000,000 of the property is owned by citizens of the District. That would require the Government to pay almost one-half of the tax, if it paid in proportion to the valuation of the Government property.

In regard to this school matter, so far as this bill is concerned, I feel no special interest in it. We felt in the committee it was our duty to report the bill. The instructions of the House were absolute; we had no choice in the matter but to report, upon the best judgment we had, what should be done, and we have reported the best bill we could, in compliance with the orders of the House.

But this subject, Mr. Chairman, is entirely too vast to be considered on a question of this sort. I myself feel the United States should pay as much taxation upon its property to support the government of this District as the citizens themselves. The streets and avenues are owned entirely by the United States, and in that respect it is unlike any other place in the United States. The Supreme Court have held that the fee in the streets here is in the United States; instead of the owners of lots abutting upon streets owning to the center, the Supreme Court have held the whole title is in the United States. Look at these avenues, look at the immensely wide streets, and then say whether the people having property along them should be required to pay for all of the improvements made; for the improvements of all these wide avenues—whether they should be required to pay for the improvements of all the public squares. And that question, it seems to me, is not an irrelevant one here. The board of public works has nothing to do, so far as it is concerned, with the general business of the District—with the payment of school-teachers. They have nothing to do with it. They have not spent the moneys appropriated for school-teachers. On the contrary, it appeared before our committee that $173,000 were overdrawn from the general fund to meet school expenses.

The necessity for this appropriation is this: The taxes assessed for the payment of schools are unpaid. They are due. Many of them have been collected; but the taxes are almost altogether assessed upon real estate; the certificates have been issued upon real estate, but they do not become absolute, so as to require payment, until June next. They have been unable, therefore, to collect the taxes they assessed in this District for carrying on the public schools.

There is manifest equity in the United States paying something toward the schools of this District. In all of the public schools here only 27 per cent. of the children who attend are children of property-owners of the District. Only 27 per cent. of the children of this District are the children of tax-payers. Is there any other such community? Do gentlemen know of a city with such a like state of things? Members of Congress send their children to school here. Large numbers of Government employés send their children to school here. These schools have been made free. They are free schools, and all these children are to be educated at the expense of the tax-payers. There is no discretion here whether they shall be free or not; the law says they shall be free. Members of Congress send their children, and those they have appointed to office in this city send their children, to the same free schools. Is it right, is it just, when citizens only own one-half of the property, that property should be assessed to pay the entire tax for the support of these public schools? These schools have been made free without regard to the will of the people who reside here.

Mr. SPEER. Is there no per capita tax?

Mr. ELDREDGE. None, I believe. There is a small fund provided out of the fines imposed upon small crimes committed in the District, but that is a mere bagatelle—it amounts to nearly nothing. I submit, instead of appropriating this money as this bill provides, to be repaid to the United States or to be deducted from any money due by the United States to the District of Columbia, it should be absolutely given for the support of these schools. It is not right we should pass an act of Congress making these schools free and fill them with children of Government officers, requiring large buildings to be erected, and then compel the tax-payers of the District of Columbia to support them. It is not right; it is not just.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. GUNCKEL. Before the gentleman from Wisconsin resumes his seat, will he tell us why the children of members of Congress and of Government clerks should be educated free in the schools of the District?

Mr. ELDREDGE. The gentleman is aware that the system of free schools has taken very deep hold of the people in this country; and, for one, I am not prepared to say that the schools should not be free, even to the children of members of Congress, and of the employés of this Government. I am rather inclined to think that it is in consonance with the spirit of our institutions that these schools should be free to all. It is a manifest injustice, however, to require the tax-payers of this District to bear the expense of educating the children of members of Congress or of Government employés.

Mr. GUNCKEL. Are not non-tax-payers in every other city compelled to pay if they send their children to the public schools?

Mr. ELDREDGE. I do not know how that is; but here you have made these schools free by your votes, and then you are unwilling to pay anything for them.

Mr. COTTON. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. PELHAM.]

Mr. PELHAM. I am aware that any proposition coming from the District looking to an appropriation is likely to meet with opposition in this House. But as this bill was referred by the House to the Committee on the District, as it has been reported by the committee exactly in accordance with the instructions it received from the House, and as it only provides for the payment of these teachers up to the 1st of March, I had not expected that it would have met with the opposition which bills coming from the District usually meet with in this House.

The committee were of opinion that $300,000 should be appropriated by this bill. I urged and insisted that that report should be made. And I wanted to offer an amendment to this bill, so as to appropriate $300,000 instead of $97,000. But it was considered in the committee that we were instructed by the House to do a certain thing, and that, if we exceeded what we were instructed to do, the House might refuse to pass the bill. In accordance with that view the committee has merely reported a bill providing for the payment of the teachers from the 1st of September to the 1st of March. They have given in their report the exact amount that is due, and how it is due, and have reported that the teachers cannot be paid any other way that is known to the committee except by an appropriation by the Congress of the United States. According to the report accompanying this bill there is owing to the teachers $97,000 to the 1st of March. They are still teaching. This bill does not provide for paying the teachers for this month, or the next month, or the month following. And I desire to move to amend the bill so as to make the appropriation $300,000 instead of $97,000, which would be more than sufficent to pay the teachers for the time they are engaged, or will be engaged, during the present session.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I ask the gentleman from Alabama if he will not consent to withhold his amendment for the present. After the amounts now due to the teachers have been provided for, what he proposes can come in afterward as a separate thing.

Mr. PELHAM. In answer to the suggestion of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. G. F. HOAR,] I will say that I think there is just as much opposition here to an appropriation of $97,000 as there would be to an appropriation of $300,000. I do not conceive that the change in the amount of the appropriation would make any difference in the opposition that is experienced here. Those who want these schools kept up and the teachers paid will be willing to pay them for the whole session. Those who do not want to pay the District anything will not vote for the $97,000. I do not think, therefore, that I can consent to withdraw my amendment.

Mr. KELLOGG. I desire to ask the gentleman a question. If $97,000 pays the teachers for six months, is an appropriation of $300,000 necessary to pay them for the three months following?

Mr. PELHAM. This bill, appropriating $97,000, only provides for the payment of teachers. But there are the people who sweep the school-houses who have to be paid; there are the rents due for some of the school-houses; there are a number of other necessary expenses for keeping up and carrying on the schools; all of which, according to the best estimates the committee could get, would require an appropriation of $300,000 for the present session.

Mr. KELLOGG. I am willing to vote for all that is necessary, but I want to get the teachers paid first.

Mr. PELHAM. I desire to state that a great deal of money has already been borrowed by the teachers. It has been advanced to them by liberal-minded citizens of the District, and this bill will merely pay back their creditors. It will not give them anything. It merely pays their expenses that have already accrued and relieves parties who have loaned them money. To the teachers the $97,000 is scarcely any relief at all.

Mr. COTTON. I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] one minute.

Mr. COX. I had the honor to introduce a resolution into this House some time ago as to paying the police of the District. The firemen have sent a complaint that they are not paid. And now the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. G. F. HOAR] makes the argumentum ad misericordiam for the school-teachers. I appreciate all those arguments to the misery they have suffered in this District. I think the policeman is almost as indispensable as the schoolmaster or the schoolmistress.

I do not propose, in the one minute I have, to discuss the relations of the Federal Government to the Federal city, nor the relation which education bears to the Government. But I must say a word for my constituents, who are made up of men of all nations—who are the very intelligence of all nations, I may say, [laughter]—Hebrews, Catholics, Hard-shell Baptists, all men of all religions, and of all nations; and some of them are reluctant to pay any school tax for any State or city system of education. Some of them have peculiar scruples about paying that tax, unless they can direct the use of their own share of it, and there is some reason in it. But when it comes to taxing the people of my district by a forced loan—for that is all this ninety-odd thousand dollars is—by a forced loan on the whole people of the United States, to pay for this school business in advance, then I would not be a square, fair representative of my district if I did not vote "nay" on that proposition.

I do not propose now to discuss the peculiar relations which this District bears to this Congress. I will not follow the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. ELDREDGE,] who has discussed our obligation to sustain this District. Why, sir, I can raise a joint-stock company out on the prairies of the West, and get money enough to buy up all the public buildings here, and remove your capital to somewhere in the West. And even in the East or in the Northeast, perhaps, where money is supposed to be always thrifty and careful in its investment, I could do the same thing, and make a new capital and a better capital, and have none of these taxes coming back year after year, taxes on the people of the whole United States for the benefit of the people of the District of Columbia alone.

[Here the hammer fell.]

[Cries of "Go on;" "Go on."]

Mr. COX. O, no; I think what I have said settles the bill. [Laughter.]

Mr. COTTON. I now yield three minutes to the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. O'BRIEN.]

Mr. O'BRIEN. Mr. Chairman, I propose to vote for the bill under consideration. The proposition contained in the bill is to appropriate a sufficient amount of money to compensate the teachers of the public schools of the District for their services during the past year, to pay them the salaries due, and unpaid because of the want of funds on the part of the District government. In the face of the investigation now going on before the joint committee of this Congress, I would not vote a single dollar to support this District, nor would I aid it in any way until that investigation decides whether the board of public works is free from guilt of the charges alleged against it. But, sir, there is a higher, and I think a worthier motive, which urges me to pass over my opinions of the District government and its management of its own affairs, and that is justice to the teachers of the District of Columbia, who are educating the children, who in their time will contribute their part in controlling public affairs in this capital. I am unwilling that mismanagement and misappropriation of funds belonging to the schools, if such has taken place, should seriously interfere with their prosperity, or deprive the teachers of their well-earned salaries, especially as a large percentage of the scholars are children of the employés of the General Government, and to a certain extent of members of Congress. Besides, sir, the cause of education should suffer no detriment, and its usefulness should not be impaired for the want of a reasonable appropriation by Congress, as it is doubtless the fact that the General Government is indebted to the District in a sum considerably larger than the amount appropriated by this bill, for improvements made in and about the public buildings of the capital.

But my main reason for the support of this bill is because I believe that the present government of the District was illegally constituted. The power to control the legislation of the District is vested in the General Government, under the Constitution, and I do not believe that a republican Congress, even were it aided by democratic support, had any right to delegate that authority to any legislative body, or to constitute such an authority as the present District government, with its unrestricted and unexampled powers, powers which have been exercised to impose upon the people an immense debt, and reduced them to bankruptcy, and thus led to the practical repudiation of their plighted faith and inviolable contract to pay those who are educating their children. These teachers, male and female, should not be allowed to go home to their children starving for bread. They should be enabled, even if it requires a vote of this Congress taking money out of the Treasury, to contribute to the support of their families. They ought to receive the pay which the District government now fails to give them, a government which was constituted by this Congress without authority and in defiance of the Constitution, which imposes the duty on Congress of exercising exclusive legislation in all cases over the District of Columbia.

I know, Mr. Chairman, that the right of Congress to constitute the present form of government in the District is claimed, but I would refer gentlemen to a comparison between the present and the former government of the District. When was it charged that the old government failed to meet its obligations or support its schools? In any event, I claim that the present government has exceeded its powers, and as it is the agent of Congress and of the General Government in providing legislation for the people of this capital, and as its obligations to the teachers of the schools have been repudiated for an entire year, that it is the duty of this House, in the interest of humanity, in the interests of justice and good faith, to pass this bill, pay these teachers, succor the schools, and by its paramount authority impose the burden of repaymant on the District government.

The constitutional provision vesting in Congress exclusive authority over the District is in article 1, section 8, as follows:

> The Congress shall have power to exercise exclusive legislation in all cases whatsoever over such District.

This, I take it, is mandatory, and therefore the responsibility of legislation for the people of the District is laid at the door of Congress. We are bound on every principle of honor, law, and justice to see that the legitimate creditors of the District are paid; not out of the Federal Treasury, but by the government that we may constitute as our agent, out of proper funds legitimately raised and required from the people of the District, from the property of the District, and the public property of the Government should pay its fair proportion of the expenses of the District government.

From statistics of the public schools of the District I find that nearly one-third of the children attending these schools are the children of parents in Government employment, most of whom pay no taxes, owning no property in the District. The schools are free to all, and the education of so large a number of the children of many who claim no legal residence in the District and pay no taxes should urge the General Government to exercise a liberal policy in giving such aid for the support of the cause of education at the Federal capital as would compare favorably with the assistance given to many of the States of the Union. The General Government is entirely without authority over the system of education in the States, but in the District its authority being exclusive in all cases, it is evidently proper and just that the assistance, temporary in its character, asked in this bill should be accorded. The manifest injustice of a contrary view is apparent when we admit that the form of government which has been illegally constituted in this District by Congress has brought this evil and wrong on the people. I have the authority of the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. G. F. HOAR,] who is so familiar with constitutional authority over education and other matters, that the District government was illegally constituted by Congress, and in that view, I repeat, Mr. Chairman, that this bill should pass, the schools should be sustained by the payment of the teachers, and all questions of the proper relations of the Federal Government to the District be considered at another and a more appropriate time.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. COTTON. I think the committee is now ready to vote on this bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask the Clerk to read the proviso to the act of January 8, 1873.

Mr. COTTON. I believe I still have the floor.

Mr. HOLMAN. Then I will wait until the gentleman gets through.

Mr. COTTON. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask the Clerk to read the proviso I have indicated.

The Clerk read as follows:

And provided further, That the said board of public works be, and they are hereby prohibited from incurring or contracting further liabilities on behalf of the United States in the improvement of streets, avenues, and reservations, beyond the amount of appropriations previously made by Congress, and from entering into any contract touching such matters on behalf of the United States, except in pursuance of appropriations made by Congress.

Mr. HOLMAN. That is a proviso in an act passed at the last session of Congress.

Mr. KELLOGG. Under which class do teachers come—streets, avenues, or reservations? [Laughter.]

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman's technicalities would better come in play in some place other than the House of Representatives.

I ask the Clerk now to read the clause of the pending bill which I have marked.

The Clerk read as follows:

And the money which may be paid under this act shall be regarded as an advancement made by the United States to the said District, to be deducted from moneys which Congress may hereafter appropriate for the reimbursement to the District of any expenditures.

Mr. HOLMAN. I am especially anxious to call the attention of members to this provision of the pending bill, for I regard it as, if possible, one of the most objectionable features of the bill. The only possible liability of this Government to the District of Columbia must grow out of contracts made and expenditures incurred by the board of public works in connection with the improvement of the streets and reservations of this city. I call the attention of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. COTTON] to the fact that it is proposed by this bill to recognize the obligation of the Government for contracts which this board of public works may have made in defiance of the law of the last session expressly prohibiting the exercise of any such power by that board.

Mr. PELHAM. We are perfectly willing that that portion of this bill should be stricken out.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I would suggest to the gentleman to amend the sentence, so that it will read "deducted from moneys which Congress may hereafter appropriate." The purpose is that whenever any money is given to the District for streets, or for any other purpose, the bills of those teachers, to be paid by this appropriation, shall be turned in as so much money.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman will observe that the board of public works is authorized to make any expenditure on behalf of the United States; that when appropriations are made they are to be for work hereafter to be done; the appropriation is made for a specific object, and of course the money must be applied to that object alone. It seems to me to be far better to put this appropriation on the ground of a clean and clear gratuity, than even by implication to relieve the board of public works from the restraint we sought to impose upon them.

Mr. PELHAM. I am willing to have that portion of the bill stricken out.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. WILLARD,] who discussed this subject very calmly and well, seemed to apprehend, not only from the reading of the bill but from the general drift of the debate, that the intention was to recognize the action of the board of public works, and he suggested to the House the possibility that the United States is to be made responsible for the contracts of this board

Now, the whole country believes, whether it be so or not, that this District is run simply in the interest of a real-estate ring; the design being to enable the members of that ring to amass enormous fortunes. That is the conviction on the part of the people of this country. Now, I hope that the House will see to it that the provision incorporated in the act of the last session, which I have read, shall not be impaired, and that there shall be no pretense that the Government is to be held responsible for every act of this board of public works.

Now one word in regard to the ostensible object of this bill. I do not think that my constituents should be compelled to provide for the education of their own children and at the same time to bear a portion of the burden of supporting the public schools of this District, when the people of this District have heretofore been more highly favored than those of any corresponding section of the country. In this District, where the Government is now spending millions each year, and, indeed, almost supporting the entire population of this city, I think the drain upon the public Treasury is now large enough, and that we should not now begin to inaugurate a system, such as this bill would seem to contemplate, of providing for the relief of the citizens of this District from the ordinary duty of maintaining their own system of education. I move therefore, Mr. Chairman, to strike out that portion of this bill which speaks of refunding this appropriation out of moneys that may be due the board of public works. The clause which I propose to strike out is as follows:

And the money which may be paid under this act shall be regarded as an advancement made by the United States to said District, to be deducted from moneys which Congress may hereafter appropriate for the reimbursement to the District of any expenditures.

Mr. MERRIAM. Will the gentleman allow me to offer an amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. There are two amendments now pending.

Mr. MERRIAM. I ask that my amendment may be read for information.

Mr. COTTON. I would have no objection to striking out this portion of the clause to which the gentleman from Indiana refers—"for the reimbursement to the District of any expenditures." Is that satisfactory to the gentleman from Indiana?

Mr. HOLMAN. I think the whole clause should be struck out. We ought to know what we are really doing, that we are simply making an appropriation for the District of Columbia. That is just what it means—nothing more and nothing less.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Indiana accept the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. COTTON?]

Mr. HOLMAN. No, sir; and I move to strike out the whole clause. We ought to understand the real effect of the bill, which is simply to pay so much money to the District of Columbia.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. I desire to ask the gentleman a question for my information. Is not the money for the support of these schools raised by taxation upon the real estate of the District of Columbia?

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the gentleman will allow me to answer that question in this way: I understand that real estate is the only property taxed in this District; that the personal wealth of the District is subjected to no taxation whatever.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. Then I ask the gentleman why property in this District should be entirely exempted from any taxation for the payment of this school indebtedness, in order that we may vote a gratuity for this object, with no expectation of being reimbursed?

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not think that the Government of the United States ought to provide for the support of the schools of this District, simply as a District. In any measure of education in which the whole country is interested, an appropriation from the national Treasury might be urged with more propriety; but I do not think Congress should tax the industry of the whole country to support educational institutions for the benefit of this District, which is certainly sufficiently wealthy to bear such expenditures without our assistance.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I desire to appeal to the House not to mix the question presented in this simple bill with that great question which gentlemen here are disposed to discuss to-day. The House and the Senate have appointed a very able and efficient joint committee, who are laboring to ascertain and report who is to be blamed for the condition into which the District treasury has been brought; and we cannot, with justice to ourselves or anybody concerned, undertake to consider that question now. We have also imposed upon a committee of this House the duty of investigating the historical and constitutional and pecuniary relations of the Government of the United States to the District of Columbia. The report of that committee may enable us to solve, if we can ever solve, the problem discussed by the gentleman from Indiana, the gentleman from New York, and other gentlemen.

This bill simply provides that, as there is not at present money in the District treasury to pay these school-teachers, (we do not undertake to determine now whose fault that may be,) we will make an appropriation now to pay the teachers, which appropriation shall be charged against the District of Columbia whenever it may apply to us for any sum of money to which it may be entitled in any way; that, in such an event, our present payment for this purpose shall be counted as so much cash which we have paid in behalf of the District authorities. That is the whole substance of the bill.

The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] is quite right in insisting that this bill should contain nothing which by implication or intendment shall allow anybody to argue that the force of the legislation of last winter restricting expenditures by the District authorities to the amount of appropriations previously made has been in any degree impaired. If that provision is to be impaired in any way, it ought not to be done in this bill. That question ought not to be raised here now.

On the other hand, I think the gentleman from Indiana is entirely wrong in saying that this bill should grant a gratuity for this purpose. I do not think we ought to consider now the question whether it is proper to grant a gratuity for educational purposes to the District of Columbia. The District Legislature and the public officers authorized by us and appointed by the President have allowed the school-mistresses to wait several months without receiving wages. We are bound to see this injustice arrested, if we can, postponing entirely the question who is to blame or where the burden shall ultimately fall. Without affecting either of those questions, we can now make this advance for the relief of the school-teachers for the time being. I implore the committee not to be diverted from the simple proposition now before us—an effective and clear remedy which the committee have reported for an existing evil—to any discussion of the great constitutional and public question as to the relation of the Federal Government to the Federal capital.

Mr. MERRIAM. I have an amendment which I think will obviate many objections in the minds of members who now propose to vote against the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the government of the District of Columbia is hereby authorized and directed to levy and collect a tax to an amount equal to the amount appropriated in this bill, upon banks and other corporations in the said District, and pay the same into the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Is that in order?

The CHAIRMAN. It is not in order just now.

Mr. HOLMAN. I contend the proposition of the gentleman from New York is in order. I move to strike out any part of the bill recognizing the power of the board of public works to bind this Government.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is first on the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. PELHAM,] which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out "$97,740.50," and insert in lieu thereof "$300,000," so it will read: "The sum of $300,000 is hereby appropriated," &c.

The amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs on the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out these words: "And the money to be paid under this act shall be regarded as an advancement made by the United States to said District, to be deducted from moneys which Congress may hereafter appropriate for reimbursement to the District of any expenditures."

Mr. HOLMAN. It will be seen by the committee at once that if that be stricken out there can be no pretense that we recognize the power of the board of public works to bind this Government. Then the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. MERRIAM] will leave this measure free from the objection that it is in the nature of a gratuity.

Mr. COTTON. I wish to say, if the House will listen to the reading of my amendment to the amendment, it will be seen it will accomplish the purpose.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I understand the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa perfects what the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana strikes out, and therefore his amendment is first in order as an original amendment to the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. That is so.

Mr. COTTON. I ask to have my amendment read, and then the section read as it will be after it is amended as I propose.

The Clerk read as follows:

Except from the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana so it will read as follows: "And the money which may be paid under this act shall be regarded as an advancement made by the United States to said District, to be deducted from moneys which Congress may hereafter appropriate."

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I propose to amend the sentence "may hereafter appropriate" by striking out all after the word "appropriate." That is an amendment to perfect the sentence before the motion to strike out is put.

Mr. COTTON'S amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question recurs on the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] as amended, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out these words: "for reimbursement to the District of any expenditures;" so it will read:

And the money which may be paid under this act shall be regarded as an advancement made by the United States to the said District to be deducted from moneys which Congress may hereafter appropriate.

Mr. HOLMAN. If that is stricken out, then the amendment of the gentleman from New York will perfect the bill. There can be no advancement to the District of Columbia except through the board of public works, and therefore I have moved to strike out these words.

Mr. COTTON. That will make the appropriation absolute.

Mr. HOLMAN. Of course it will; but then comes in the amendment of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. MERRIAM,] which proposes to raise this money out of the District of Columbia.

The CHAIRMAN. The question recurs on the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] as amended.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 56, noes 60; no quorum voting.

Mr. HOLMAN demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. COTTON and Mr. HOLMAN were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 61, noes 86.

So the amendment, as amended, was disagreed to.

Mr. MERRIAM. I move to strike out these words:

And the money which may be paid under this act shall be regarded as an advancement made by the United States to said District to be deducted from moneys which Congress may hereafter appropriate.

And in lieu thereof to insert these words:

That the government of the District of Columbia is hereby authorized and directed to levy and collect a tax to an amount equal to the amount appropriated in this bill, upon personal property, including banks and other corporations in said District, and pay the same into the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. HOLMAN. That is right.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I rise to a question of order. After the committee has voted not to strike out certain words, I submit that it is not in order to move to strike out and insert others.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair rules that the point of order is not well taken.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. If the Chair will permit me, I would say that when an amendment is offered to strike out certain words and that is negatived, the committee has then determined not to strike out those words for any purpose, and it is not then in order to move to strike them out for the purpose of inserting others.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order. The Clerk will read the rule.

The Clerk read as follows:

A motion to strike out and insert shall be deemed indivisible; but a motion to strike out being lost, shall preclude neither amendment nor a motion to strike out and insert.

Mr. RANDALL. Will the Chair state what was the date of the adoption of that rule?

The CHAIRMAN. It is Rule 46, and is an old rule. The question recurs on the motion offered by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. MERRIAM.]

Mr. CESSNA. I desire to submit a single remark. Any further consumption of time by offering or discussing amendments must defeat the object of this bill. If it be not passed to-day it can do no practical good. The Committee on the District of Columbia will not have the floor again for one month. I believe the bill ought to pass, and I therefore make a motion looking in that direction. I move to strike out the enacting clause of the bill. Then if that motion is carried I will move that the committee rise, and that will bring the bill as the first question in order before the House.

Mr. DAWES. The rule is perfectly explicit, that if the House does not concur in that motion to strike out the enacting clause, it goes back to the committee.

Mr. CESSNA. And I hope the House will not concur.

Mr. DAWES. Then nothing will have been gained by the committee rising.

Mr. CESSNA. I will withdraw my motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. MERRIAM.]

Mr. MERRIAM. Permit me to say a single word to the committee. It is evident to the entire country that the teachers of this District should be paid. But there is a sentiment in this House that we ought not under any circumstances to advance more money to the District of Columbia, since they have spent the money already advanced in violation of the laws of Congress. But presenting this in the nature of a loan we are enabled to meet the objections which many would have to an absolute appropriation. I hope, therefore, that my amendment will be adopted.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I hope the gentleman will not insist on mixing up the question of taxing banks with this.

Mr. MERRIAM. The gentleman must remember that in the District of Columbia hitherto, personal property has not been taxed.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. But why should it be mixed up with this matter?

The question being taken on Mr. MERRIAM'S motion to strike out and insert, it was agreed to—ayes 100, noes 63.

Mr. COTTON. I move that the bill be laid aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass as amended.

Mr. KELLOGG. I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment just adopted. I move to insert, after the words "personal property," the words "and other taxable property." I do not see why we should insert one species of property in this bill and not another.

Mr. MERRIAM. It is not necessary to insert property which is already taxed.

Mr. KELLOGG. I do not insist on my amendment.

The question being taken on Mr. COTTON'S motion that the bill be laid aside to be reported favorably to the House, there were—ayes 86, noes 46; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. HOLMAN and Mr. COTTON were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 99, noes 52.

So the motion was agreed to.

Mr. COTTON. I now move that the committee rise and report its action on the bills which have been considered.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker, having resumed the chair, Mr. DUNNELL reported that the Committee of the Whole had had under consideration the Calendar of bills reported by the Committee on the District of Columbia, and had instructed him to report sundry bills.

ANACOSTIA AND POTOMAC RIVER RAILROAD.

The SPEAKER. The first bill reported from the Committee of the Whole is the bill (H. R. No. 2103) giving the approval and sanction of Congress to the route and termini of the Anacostia and Potomac River Railroad and to regulate its construction and operation. The bill is reported without amendment.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HALE, of New York, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HALE, of New York. If the House shall now adjourn, will the disposition of the remaining bills reported from the Committee of the Whole be unfinished business coming up to-morrow morning?

The SPEAKER. It will.

Mr. HALE, of New York. Then I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. RANDALL. O, no; let us finish.

WISCONSIN CENTRAL RAILROAD.

Mr. BRADLEY, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on the Public Lands, presented a report on the bill (S. No. 512) to extend the time for the construction of the Wisconsin Central Railroad in Wisconsin; which was ordered to be printed and recommitted.

REPRINTING OF BILLS.

Mr. WOODFORD. The printed copies have been exhausted of the bill introduced by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SMITH,] being House bill No. 2474, to regulate commerce among the several States and with foreign nations. I ask unanimous consent to have reprinted the usual number of copies.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has been asked to make a similar request in regard to the pending bill on the same subject reported by the Committee on Railways and Canals. If there is no objection the order will be made in respect to both bills.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. BIERY was granted leave of absence for five days.

Mr. ST. JOHN was granted leave of absence for two weeks.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Massachusetts, was granted leave of absence for ten days from Monday next.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE EASTERN BRANCH.

The SPEAKER. The next bill reported from the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union was the bill (H. R. No. 2106) to authorize the construction of a substantial iron and masonry bridge across the Eastern Branch of the Potomac, at or near the present Anacostia bridge.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I insist on my motion that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at five o'clock and twenty minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following memorials, petitions, and other papers were presented at the Clerk's desk under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. BECK: The petition of Will R. Hervey, of Louisville, Kentucky, relative to the payment by him of a certain forged check as a United States officer, to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. BERRY: The petition of 43 workingmen and citizens of Sandusky, Ohio, in opposition to the imposition of a tariff duty on tea and coffee, in opposition to any increase in internal taxes, and in favor of the repeal of the second section of the act of June 6, 1872, which reduced by 10 per cent. the duties on imported goods, to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. BIERY: The petition of 54 persons of Montgomery County, Pennsylvania, praying for the appointment of a commission of inquiry in reference to the liquor traffic, to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. BLAINE: The petition of tobacco manufacturers and dealers, praying for the abolition of the import duty on mass or stick licorice, to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Also, the petition of certain citizens in the State of Illinois, in relation to the present system of carrying newspapers without prepayment of postage, to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

Also, the petition of certain citizens of Pennsylvania, of similar import, to the same committee.

By Mr. CLAYTON: Concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of California, asking Congress to declare the meaning of the joint resolution of Congress of June 28, 1870, in reference to the reserve for a land grant to the Southern Pacific Railroad Company in California, and to restore certain lands on said reserve to the public domain, to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Also, concurrent resolution of the Legislature of California, relative to increase of service on mail-route No. 46265, to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

Also, concurrent resolution of the Legislature of California, instructing their Senators and requesting their Representatives to use all their influence to defeat the granting of an additional subsidy to the Pacific Mail Steamship Company, to the same committee.

By Mr. COMINGO: Resolutions of the Patrons of Husbandry in the State of Missouri, in regard to the disposition of the public domain, to the Committee on the Public Lands.

By Mr. COX: The memorial of Lucius Hopkins, in reference to one of the Floyd acceptances owned by him, to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. DANFORD: The petition of Joseph Thomas, late private of Company G, Sixty-second Ohio Volunteers, praying for a pension, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. DONNAN: The petition of citizens of the city and county of Dubuque, Iowa, relative to settlers upon the lands which form the site of the town of Peru, Iowa, to the Committee on the Public Lands.

By Mr. HOLMAN: The petition of Henry Olive, praying payment for commutation of rations from the 9th day of December, 1843, to the 31st day of July, 1851, inclusive, which remains due and unpaid, to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. KELLEY: The petition of 98 citizens of Plymouth, Luzerne County, Pennsylvania, asking for an increase of currency and three-sixty-five convertible bonds, to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

By Mr. LAWRENCE: The petition of John Myers, of Kenton, Ohio, praying for a pension for services in the war of 1812, to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions and War of 1812.

By Mr. McDILL, of Iowa: Memorial of the members of the bar of Harrison County, Iowa, asking for legislation to lessen the great expense of litigation in the United States courts of Iowa, to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. ORR: The petition of John S. Corlett, praying for a pension, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. SAWYER: The memorial of citizens of Appleton, Wisconsin, against the resolution of duties on tea and coffee and any increase of internal taxes, to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. SCHUMAKER, of New York: Memorial, preamble, and resolutions of the Medical Society of King's County, New York, asking Congress to place the Medical Corps of the Army upon the same footing, as to rank, pay, and promotion, with the Medical Corps of the Navy and with other corps, to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. SMITH, of Virginia: The petition of Thomas H. Fox, of Hanover County, Virginia, praying compensation for supplies furnished a disabled Union soldier, to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. STANDEFORD: The petition of Charles T. Dick, Patrick Hardaman, and Charles F. Dantic, praying for pensions, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. WARD, of Illinois: The petition of F. W. Nye, first sergeant Company C, Forty-eighth Wisconsin Volunteer Infantry, praying for a pension, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr.———: The petition of 25 citizens of Carter County, Kentucky, in opposition to the imposition of a tariff duty on tea and coffee, in opposition to any increase in internal taxes, and in favor of the repeal of the second section of the act of June 6, 1872, which reduced by 10 per cent. the duties on foreign imports, to the Committee on Ways and Means.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, March 21, 1874.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

QUESTION OF ORDER.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, on last evening, pending your statement of the vote of the House on the motion to adjourn, I raised a controversy as to your right to interject public business from the Speaker's table, when you had knowledge of the disposition of the House as to its adjournment. I would like to ask the Speaker in perfect politeness by what rule he claims the right to interject business under such circumstances?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is slightly in error as to the facts of the case.

Mr. RANDALL. Then correct me.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not interject public business. He interjected what has always been deemed to be a matter of privilege, and of every high privilege, for the convenience of members, the asking of leave of absence. That was all he interjected. The motion to adjourn had been carried obviously by the sound, but the rules especially provide that it is not a vote until it is declared by the Chair that the motion is carried; and even upon a yea and nay vote, and when the Chair holds in his hand the record of the tally clerk, showing it to be carried, it has always been the usage of the House, and always will be unless the present occupant of the chair shall be ordered differently by the House, to ask leave of absence for members. If an adjournment had been carried by a yea and nay vote, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania desired leave of absence from the House for any length of time, the Chair would recognize his right to submit that question; but it is, of course, the right of every member to object to the leave of absence.

Mr. RANDALL. There is where my point comes in. I was objecting to the Speaker putting those questions.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman had no right to object to the questions being submitted; but he might object to the leave of absence being granted.

Mr. RANDALL. I had a right to demand a division on the motion to adjourn pending your decision.

The SPEAKER. Of course the gentleman had, and the Chair did not deny him that right. The Chair, after leave of absence had been granted to three gentlemen, said, "The ayes appear to have it," and the gentleman then had a right to ask for a division.

Mr. RANDALL. Then if I understand the position of the Speaker, it is that he does this by sufferance or by unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. By immemorial usage.

Mr. RANDALL. Well, immemorial usage does not vitiate the rules; I was standing here objecting.

The SPEAKER. To what?

Mr. RANDALL. To the unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. Did the gentleman object to the leave of absence being granted?

Mr. RANDALL. No, sir; I demanded a division on the motion to adjourn, which the Chair saw fit not to recognize.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman could have called for a division after the leave of absence was granted.

Mr. RANDALL. The Chair proceeded to take business from the Speaker's table which could only be reached under the rules by a motion to go to the Speaker's table.

The SPEAKER. O, no; there never has been an instance when a proposition for leave of absence was entertained under a motion to go to business on the Speaker's table.

Mr. RANDALL. The Chair rests upon the leaves of absence?

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not proceed to any other business.

Mr. RANDALL. You took up bills from the table.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. RANDALL. I go upon the record.

The SPEAKER. The Chair asked for leave of absence for three members. That was all that was done.

Mr. RANDALL. This is the point to which I rise: to know whether under the rules the Chair possesses any power as Speaker to interject public business at any time except in accordance with the rules?

The SPEAKER. The Chair never has presumed that he had such a right.

Mr. RANDALL. You did it yesterday.

The SPEAKER. Not at all; leave of absence for three members is not public business.

Mr. RANDALL. I contradict your statement in that particular; you did other business.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman states that?

Mr. RANDALL. Yes, sir.

The SPEAKER. That is a question of fact which the Chair will have settled by the Journal. The gentleman from Pennsylvania maintains that pending the motion to adjourn, and before the announcement of the vote, the Chair interjected public business into the proceedings. The Chair will beg the Journal clerk to ascertain whether any public business was interjected. (After a pause.) The Chair presented nothing whatever but three requests for leave of absence.

Mr. RANDALL. That is the Journal, is it?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. RANDALL. That is not my recollection.

The SPEAKER. What does the gentleman recollect different from that?

Mr. RANDALL. My recollection is that you presented a number of enrolled bills.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not. At the same time, if the gentleman makes a point on that, the Chair will maintain that he had a right to do so. The Chair, however, did not do it. But, lest hereafter the gentleman should raise a point on that, the Chair maintains his right to do it, though as a matter of fact he did not do it. If enrolled bills were lying before the Chair, and were signed, and a motion to adjourn had been made and agreed to on a yea and nay vote, and the Chair held the record in his hand of that fact, before declaring the result of the vote the Chair would consider himself justified, not only by convenience, but also by immemorial usage of the House, to lay enrolled bills before the House. Although it was not done, the Chair begs to say that he would do it.

ANACOSTIA BRIDGE.

Mr. McCRARY. I call for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the consideration of the bills reported from the Committee of the Whole, relating to the District of Columbia. The first is House bill No. 2106 to authorize the construction of a substantial iron and masonry bridge across the Eastern Branch of the Potomac, at or near the present Anacostia bridge. The bill is reported from the Committee of the Whole with a recommendation that the enacting clause be stricken out. The question is upon concurring in the recommendation of the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HALE, of New York. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. HOLMAN. I believe this motion is not debatable.

Mr. RANDALL. I object to debate.

The SPEAKER. The motion to strike out the enacting clause is debatable.

Mr. HOLMAN. It is not debatable in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. It is not usually debated in Committee of the Whole. There is no express rule prohibiting its being debated in Committee of the Whole. The impression prevails that it is not debatable from this fact, that the motion is usually made in Committee of the Whole after debate has been closed, or when the five-minute debate is in order. The motion in Committee of the Whole to strike out the enacting clause would never, by any usage of the House, be debated over five minutes on each side, and generally not debated at all. But there is nothing in the rules that prohibits its debate in the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. I suppose, that whatever rules prevailed in Committee of the Whole in regard to a given motion would prevail in the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has stated what the usage is in Committee of the Whole. The motion not being amendable, the debate could not be prolonged by submitting amendments, as is the case with ordinary motions in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I beg to ask the patient attention of the House for a very few moments while I state the condition of this bill; and I would be very much gratified if members would kindly give me their attention. I say this, knowing that subjects of this character do not press themselves upon the attention of any considerable portion of the House. This bill is reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia, and accompanied by a printed report without a dissent from that committee, which report shows these facts: There is now across what is known as the Eastern Branch of the Potomac a bridge immediately adjacent to the navy-yard, and commonly called the navy-yard bridge. That bridge is now in a dilapidated condition, so as to be positively dangerous for use by the public. Those facts were fully shown to the committee by the evidence of the officers whose duty it is to have knowledge upon the subject.

The bridge is owned by the United States. It abuts upon land owned by the United States on both sides of the stream. The title of the United States was acquired, not by right of eminent domain, but by purchase under authority of an act of Congress from the private corporation which built and owned the bridge. That purchase, vesting the title of the bridge in the United States, clearly imported, in the judgment of the committee, at least a contract on the part of the United States that that bridge should be maintained, if the convenience of the public required it. Whether it did or not, it is plain that it debarred any and every other person from interfering with the bridge, repairing or rebuilding it. No local or municipal authorities, no private enterprise, no other power than the United States, has authority to intermeddle with the bridge in any way.

Not only that; the bridge is a most important one for the public uses of the United States, being the only means, except by ferriage, of communication between this city and the Government hospital or asylum on the other side of the Eastern Branch. It is in every respect of importance to the public interests, the governmental interests, as well as those of the adjacent dwellers, that the bridge should be kept up.

Now, the committee reported a bill for the rebuilding of this bridge, based upon estimates and information received from the proper governmental authorities. The bill went to the Committee of the Whole, where it was discussed at some length upon questions as to the proper cost of the bridge, and the proper method of providing for its construction. No question was raised as to the obligation of the United States or the duty of the Government to build this bridge until the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. COBURN,] the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, took the floor, and with the vigorous and somewhat soaring eloquence that that gentleman is so gifted in using, made an assault, from the root up, on the proposition to rebuild this bridge. That gentleman discussed the question with his usual vigor and ability, bringing into the case fretting, and frost-work, and frescoes, and Saint Paul's at London, and Saint Peter's at Rome; and his own proposition as to what he would do if he were an architect, and how he would rival Sir Christopher Wren and Michael Angelo. It was evident that his eloquence made an impression on the committee. Immediately following this speech of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, and before any other person could be heard, before any member of the District Committee could have an opportunity to say one word, the gentleman's colleague on the other side [Mr. HOLMAN] rose, and expressing his entire satisfaction with the speech of his colleague, moved to strike out the enacting clause—a motion which, by practice in Committee of the Whole, as I understand, is not debatable—and brought the committee at once to a vote without hearing one word in support of the proposition from the committee.

The eloquence of the first gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. COBURN,] backed by the indorsement of his colleague, who deals rather in figures of arithmetic than with figures of speech, was apparently conclusive with the committee; and thus, without any opportunity for vindicating the necessity, as well as the propriety of this bill, the Committee of the Whole, by a vote of more than two to one, voted to strike out the enacting clause.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I wish to appeal to this House to say whether this is such treatment as the District of Columbia and the Government interests in connection with the District should receive properly from the House?

Mr. HOLMAN. Let me ask my friend from New York whether there had not been quite a previous discussion on the merits of this proposition before my colleague submitted his remarks, and uniformly up to that time in favor, I think, of the proposition, unless the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. WILLARD] had raised some question against the propriety of the bill? Is not that the fact?

Mr. HALE, of New York. If the gentleman had listened to what I said he would know that I stated something entirely different to have been the fact—that not a question had been raised as to the obligation of the Government to build this bridge; that the only questions discussed were questions of detail, of amount, of method, and not questions of liability.

Mr. HOLMAN. My colleague only discussed the question of the propriety and necessity of the Government appropriating money for such a purpose.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I so understand it; I have so stated. It is unnecessary for the gentleman to interrupt me to restate precisely what I have said. I have said that precisely.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I know how much of feeling there is in this House adverse to any proposition to do anything for the benefit of the District of Columbia or the city of Washington. I know how thankless and ungracious a task it is to attempt to stem the tide of that sentiment, and to advocate before this House measures of the most ordinary justice to the District. I thought I knew something of that, when, sir, you proposed to place me at the head of this committee; and I appeal to you to confirm my statement that I accepted the position most unwillingly, and after long-continued protest against being required to undertake its duties.

The question of this bridge, however, stands on different ground from the general questions about appropriations for the benefit of the District. This question is simply whether the United States shall perform the obligations imposed upon it by its undertaking, and by the public interests which are prejudiced by the present condition of the bridge. This bill does not in the least involve the question of expenditures for improvements in the District, or questions of the relations of the Federal Government to the District, or of the obligation of the Government to contribute to the ordinary expenses of the District. The question here is simply whether the Government shall perform a plain, unmistakable public duty, arising out of its ownership and assumption of the management of this particular bridge, irrespective of all other questions. Now, if the temper of this House is such that a proposition of that kind is to be voted down by a majority of two to one, without opportunity for one word of reply to such an attack as that made upon it by the gentleman from Indiana yesterday, it seems to me it is utterly useless to attempt to present to this House for its action any measure whatever for the expenditure of moneys upon public institutions of any kind in the District of Columbia. It certainly is not giving that fair consideration to the action of a committee of this House, to whom a particular branch of duties is assigned, and who undertake to examine subjects they report here, and then report upon their judgment upon that—it certainly is not giving to that committee reasonable opportunity for presentation, explanation, and answer to attack, and defense against attack, that the courtesy of this House always affords to every other committee.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Is not this bridge in part for the convenience of the citizens of Washington, as well as for those connected with the Government? And if so, should not the property-holders of Washington contribute to make it? The Government has but little interest in the bridge. It is not mainly for the convenience of the Government.

Mr. HALE, of New York. Excuse me, sir; I prefer to make my own speech in my own order, and not in the order of the gentleman from Ohio. I am not to be switched off from the line of discussion I am taking to the line which he suggests.

I do not propose to go into a general discussion of all the obligations of the General Government in regard to this District, as I should not feel justified in taking the time this morning for that purpose. I have not prepared to discuss it fully; but recently it has been most fully discussed in a speech by the Delegate from this District, [Mr. CHIPMAN,] which has been printed in the RECORD, and which I sincerely wish members of this House could be persuaded to read. It contains information as to historical facts, and propositions as to the true relation between the Federal Government and this District, which I think are worthy of the attention of any and every member of this House. Nor do I propose to go at length into the discussion of the merits of this bill to-day.

I now simply desire, Mr. Speaker, to say I trust this House will disagree with the action of the committee in striking out the enacting clause, the effect of which vote will be to send the bill back to the committee, there to be considered giving proper opportunity for debate. I think it is due, fairly due by the ordinary rules of courtesy which prevail and which should prevail in this House, that the Committee on the District of Columbia should have at least some opportunity to answer the assault made upon the bill reported by them. If the House thinks otherwise, it is for them to say. I find no fault, and assume to find no fault, with the vote of any member of the House, in committee or in the House, on any question; but I do submit that such a course of action by the House puts the Committee on the District of Columbia in a position in which no man with proper self-respect can continue to serve. I trust the House will disagree with the action of the Committee of the Whole, the effect of which will be, Mr. Speaker, as I understand the rule, to recommit the bill.

Mr. RANDALL rose.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I did not surrender the floor.

Mr. RANDALL. I thought you were through.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I will yield to the gentleman, if he desires it.

Mr. RANDALL. I wish only to direct the attention of the House to one fact.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I will yield to the gentleman for any given time

Mr. RANDALL. I wish only to direct attention to what is the fact in every other city.

Mr. HALE, of New York. How much time do you want?

Mr. RANDALL. Half a minute.

Mr. HALE, of New York. Very well.

Mr. RANDALL. In every city in this Union where the Federal Government possesses itself of property it has secured from the State Legislature the fee-simple title to that property; and not only that, it has also secured exemption from every sort of taxation, whether under municipal or State authority. Now, why should it not be so here? A different rule, according to the argument of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HALE,] should prevail in this District of Columbia; and not only that, they claim the right to impose the great burden of taxation in this District, by reason of the necessary ownership of property by the Government, upon the United States, making the gentleman's constituents and my constituents contribute, as I think without justice and without equity, to maintain this District government.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Let me ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. RANDALL. I will.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I do not yield further to the gentleman at present; I have the floor.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman yielded to me.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I did for half a minute. I ask the Chair whether his time has not expired?

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman yielded to me, and I now yield for a question to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. HALE, of New York. The gentleman resumed his seat.

Mr. RANDALL. No, sir.

Mr. HALE, of New York. Has the gentleman's half minute expired? Mr. Speaker, am I not entitled to the floor?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has that impression.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I fail to see the slightest pertinency in the remarks of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL.] What on earth the question how the United States obtains jurisdiction of property ceded to it in the States has to do with this question I cannot imagine. Here is no question about jurisdiction. No action is necessary of any State Legislature or other tribunal. The jurisdiction is unquestionably in the United States under the Constitution, and, as I have stated, the ownership—not the jurisdiction, but the ownership—is perfect by actual purchase. I am at a loss to conceive what possible connection the gentleman from Pennsylvania traces between the question in regard to the jurisdiction of property ceded in the States to the General Government and the question in regard to this bridge.

Then came the other proposition which I have declined to discuss in full. I cannot go into it at length. It is a repetition of the old cry, that this District is constantly calling upon Congress for appropriations; that there is no reason why Congress should provide by taxation of the whole country, of the gentleman's constituents and my constituents, for the expense of the government and improvement of this District any more than it provides for the improvement of districts and cities in States. It does seem to me that that proposition on its face ought to require no answer; but that the very relations which of necessity exist between this District and the Federal Government sufficiently justify the requirement that the United States shall contribute some portion towards the expenses of improving this District and this city, and of running the local government of the city. And I mention a single fact, one out of many which I could readily state if I had time. It is this: that of the entire real estate of this city the Federal Government is owner in fee and absolutely of almost one-half, which does not pay a dollar of taxes. Does my friend from Pennsylvania know any State, any other district of a State, any city in a State, where such a state of things exists; and will he claim on that ground alone, nothing else considered, that it is just or fair or decent that the owners of the other half of the property of the District should pay the taxes of the District?

I have already said that I did not propose to argue this general question to-day. I cannot go into it without consuming more time than circumstances would permit this morning. I simply ask that the bill may, by the action of the House, be sent back to the Committee of the Whole, where an opportunity may be given for a discussion of the question, which has not yet been had.

Mr. RANDALL rose.

Mr. HALE, of New York. What time does the gentleman from Pennsylvania desire?

Mr. RANDALL. I only want a few moments.

Mr. HALE, of New York. Then I yield a few minutes to the gentleman.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, if my memory serves me right, in every organic act as to a Territory, or as to the admission of a State into this Union, there is in terms embraced an exemption of the Federal Government from the payment of any tax whatever. That is the law. I did not design to rely upon the law solely in that particular; but I wanted to give to this House an exemplification in that connection of the manner in which Federal property is treated within the States and Territories, and within this District. I maintain, sir, that there is just as much of equitable demand on the Federal Government to build a bridge between two States as there is to build a bridge in this District.

Mr. LAWRENCE. More.

Mr. RANDALL. Now, sir, this bridge at both ends is within the District. It is a matter of convenience to the general public of the District; and when the gentleman from New York asserts here that the ownership and the use rest with the Government, I venture, in contradiction to that statement of opinion, to say that there is not one man in a hundred who crosses that bridge, or one wagon in five hundred that crosses that bridge, that does it for any purposes of the Government.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Exactly. That answers my question.

Mr. HALE, of New York. It does not answer my assertion. I have made no such intimation as the gentleman has stated.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman is quite loose in his assertions, and I had to go, perhaps, somewhat loose in answering him.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I think the gentleman's statement about the looseness of my assertions is not quite within the usages of the floor.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, informed the House that the Senate had passed, with amendments, in which the concurrence of the House was requested, bills of the following titles:

A bill (H. R. No. 1009) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes; and

A bill (H. R. No. 1037) making appropriations for the construction, preservation, and repair of certain fortifications and other works of defense for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875.

BRIDGE OVER THE EASTERN BRANCH OF THE POTOMAC.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill in reference to the construction of a bridge across the Eastern Branch of the Potomac.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman from New York now proposes to recommit this bill for the purpose of giving the Committee on the District of Columbia an opportunity of fair discussion on its merits. I am surprised at the assertion of the gentleman that there has not been such an opportunity.

Mr. HALE, of New York. The gentleman from Indiana is entirely in error. My proposition is simply to disagree with the report of the Committee of the Whole, which will send it back to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HOLMAN. That is substantially what I said. The difference is a matter of words. The gentleman proposes that the bill shall go back to the Committee of the Whole for discussion; that is to say, he wishes to give the Committee on the District of Columbia an opportunity of further arguing the question of the propriety of this appropriation. The gentleman must know that the subject has been very fully discussed in the Committee of the Whole already. His colleagues on the committee had the report of the District Committee read, and that report certainly sets forth all the facts. The report undertakes to show, among other things, the importance of this bridge. It says that the bridge connects the city with the very thriving locality known as Uniontown, at present numbering very nearly three thousand inhabitants; and then it goes on to show the extent to which travel passes over the bridge. And then the gentleman's colleague on the committee, the gentleman from the Chicago district, [Mr. RICE,] presented arguments in favor of it.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. HALE] argues the proposition that Congress, having purchased the bridge from some bridge company, ought to maintain it. He shows very conclusively that the thriving town on the other side of this branch of the Potomac, and the real-estate operations which have spread from this side of that branch of the river to the other, make it exceedingly desirable that the Government should expend a very considerable sum of money to facilitate the business operations of the citizens living on the other side of that stream.

Now I do not propose to discuss the question of the necessity of this bridge, but I do propose to say that to recommit this measure or to non-concur in the action of the Committee of the Whole, for the purpose of further debate, after the committee has presented its case by a proper report, is asking what I believe I have never heard asked for in this House. Did the gentleman think, when he made his report, that the House intended to appropriate this large sum of money unless some substantial reasons were assigned in favor of it? Did not the gentleman attempt to set forth such reasons? Were they not read at the Clerk's desk?

I am aware that there has been, through the social influences of the capital, which are growing stronger and stronger year after year, a strong influence brought to bear on Congress to make appropriations of money for this District, and there is always a plausible case made out. Why, sir, the astonishing fact is brought to our notice in the interest of extravagant appropriations for this District that even the streets that have been used for three-quarters of a century belong to the Government. Every mode of presenting plausible reasons for such expenditures has been resorted to for the purpose of increasing the expenditures of the Government here, as though the money expended necessarily in the capital were not sufficient to satisfy the extraordinary cupidity which prevails here.

The gentleman should also bear in mind another fact, that right here at the political heart of the nation, we are building up influences which are exceedingly unfavorable to our system of Government. We are contributing money for this District which tends to increase the extravagance and luxury which have grown up here far beyond any other city in the Union, and which are certainly the result of the vast sums of money which are, some of them necessarily and others unnecessarily, spent here in this capital. No citizen who has spent any time here can fail to have noticed the steady growth of luxury and extravagance, and there is no citizen who must not deplore the necessity of expending money here, even for necessary objects, and must not certainly regret the appropriations of money simply to enhance the wealth and increase the luxury of this capital.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I desire to ask the gentleman a question; and that is, whether the luxury he sees manifested in this city in public and private life is, in his judgment, a controlling reason why the United States should not build a bridge if they are under obligations to build it?

Mr. HOLMAN. It is a controlling reason why the Government should not unnecessarily appropriate money here that is not intended for some public purpose. No argument can be strong enough to prevent the appropriation of money which the Government is bound to appropriate for the purpose of carrying on the departments of the Government; but here is a proposition to expend money simply to promote the convenience and the business facilities of the citizens of this District. My friend says expressly that the object of this appropriation and of this bridge is to furnish means of connection between Uniontown, with about three thousand inhabitants, which is growing up as a colony out of the vast expenditures in the city of Washington. That shows beyond question that the object of this appropriation of money in the main is simply to promote the local convenience of the citizens here, and add to the wealth that has already been created by our policy of excessive expenditures. I know of no policy that would justify us in appropriating money here for the benefit of the citizens of this District that might not be made with the same force and the same honesty of purpose for an appropriation anywhere else. What appropriations may be necessary for public purposes I am willing to acquiesce in, but to appropriate money for the convenience of the citizens of this District merely is to do that which we have no right to do.

I desire to state another thing in this connection. My friend has referred to the fact that officers of the Government live upon the other side of this branch of the Potomac River, and that this bridge will afford them increased facilities. Sir, the Government fixes the salaries that its officers shall receive, and yet there seems to be no end to the means of adding in some way or other to those salaries by appropriations for the convenience of officers of the Government.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I ask the gentleman if I am to understand from his argument, and the House is to understand, that he thinks a bridge across the Eastern Branch at the navy-yard can be dispensed with?

Mr. HOLMAN. I think there should be a bridge there.

Mr. HALE, of New York. Well, then, I ask the gentleman how he proposes to have a bridge there as long as nobody can build it, or has the right to build it except the owners of the present bridge, the United States?

Mr. HOLMAN. Why cannot others have the right to build it? If the gentleman will bring forward a bill to authorize this thriving city that is building up on the other side of this stream to build a bridge, using the public grounds for that purpose, not a member in this House will object to it. Facts which have been forgotten for one or two generations are brought forward here and urged in favor of these appropriations. One is, that in laying out this city the Government made no solemn dedication by record of the streets and public grounds for the public use of this city, and that they were reserved for the use of the whole nation. Last night this city was alive everywhere with the argument that as the Government owned the land on the banks of the Potomac, just as it does along the streets, therefore the Government is required to expend this money. I trust that so long as the Committee on the District of Columbia is willing to come before this House upon this pretense of the ownership of the grounds dedicated to the public use for three-quarters of a century as an argument in favor of this expenditure of the money, its report will receive the careful scrutiny of the House.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Allow me to inform the gentleman of a fact, of which he does not seem to take notice, that the Supreme Court, in a case before it, has actually decided that the United States had a right at any time to close up any street or avenue which it had reserved in the city of Washington, and to hold it closed, because the fee of the streets and the avenues was in the Government of the United States; thus reversing the rule which obtains almost universally elsewhere, that the lot-owners abutting upon streets owned to the center of the streets. It is held here that the Government owns the entire streets; that the fee is in the Government, making it an entirely different thing, I presume, from the cities and villages in the gentleman's State, certainly from those in my own State.

Mr. HOLMAN. It is assimilated merely to the right of eminent domain. These beautiful little parks all over this city, in the vicinity of private residences, where the green grass is growing, giving a home-like aspect to various parts of the city; the title to these plats of ground may in the abstract be said to be in the Government of the United States, but does any person believe that the Government in fact has any more interest in those little plats of ground than it has as the representative of the whole nation in the streets, and lanes, and highways all over the country? The idea of bringing forward such an argument as that shows the groundlessness of this whole thing. It is upon such an argument as that we are asked to expend millions of money here, as we have been doing heretofore, until the plain public sentiment of the country is shocked by the exhibition of profligate luxury in the streets of our capital. Millions of money have been expended here, the burden of which falls upon the people of the whole country. I have always been in favor of giving a liberal support to the District of Columbia; but I have never been in favor of that kind of policy which would unnecessarily oppress all other industries in order to promote the wealth of the favored class of people who happen to be here in this capital. The establishment of the form of government now in operation here, under which has been inaugurated this ring which now controls affairs in the District of Columbia, has exerted a powerful influence by which enormous fortunes may be built up at the expense of the general industries of the country by direct appropriations from the Treasury.

We are asked to appropriate $300,000 for a work which anywhere else in the United States would be built by the citizens themselves. Here is a town of three or four thousand people springing up under the influence of the expenditures made here by the Government; it wants connection with Washington City. Here is quite a large expanse of country, wealthy and populous, that wants access to the capital. The Government has an asylum on the other side of the Potomac in which the people of the United States feel a hearty interest. It is said that we ought to contribute something to afford means of communication. We will contribute a reasonable sum in proportion to the interest of the Government in the matter. But the idea seems to be that the Government must do everything, and the people of this District nothing; that the Government should pay the whole expense from the Treasury.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I would inquire how much more time I have?

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish but a moment or two more.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I trust the gentleman will not consume all of my time.

Mr. HOLMAN. The following figures show the average amount of travel over this bridge for one month: Foot-passengers, 21,354; horses and riders, 1,195; horses and carriages, 7,408; teams and wagons, 5,920, &c. That shows the vast public interest in this work. Anywhere else but here the people to be benefited would build the bridge. If the gentleman will ask for twenty-five or thirty thousand dollars to be appropriated out of the Treasury, I presume nobody would object. But I do object that my constituents should be taxed to promote a purely local interest of the favored people of this District and the people on the other side of the Potomac.

Mr. HALE, of New York. How much time have I left, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. There are ten minutes of the hour remaining.

Mr. HALE, of New York. Will I be entitled to another hour after the previous question is seconded?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that the gentleman in charge of the Georgia contested-election case desires to have that case come up as soon as possible.

Mr. HALE, of New York. Well, I will use the ten minutes.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. The Chair rules, of course correctly, that the motion to strike out the enacting clause of the report of the Committee of the Whole is debatable in the House. I desire to ask whether, pending that recommendation to strike out the enacting clause, a motion to lay this bill on the table is in order? That is to say, is there any undebatable motion by which a bill thus reported to the House from the Committee of the Whole can be summarily disposed of?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the spirit of the rule is adverse, under such circumstances, to the motion to lay on the table; nor would such a motion be necessary, because a gentleman who might have the floor to move to lay on the table could call the previous question upon the motion to strike out the enacting clause, which would bring the House to a vote just as quickly as the motion to lay on the table, and would, if a majority so desired, remove the question from the House.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. But the call for the previous question would be within the discretion of a single member.

The SPEAKER. But the motion to lay on the table could only be carried by the same majority which would second the demand for the previous question.

Mr. RANDALL. But, Mr. Speaker, there is another point. The motion for the previous question gives to the member making it the right to an hour's debate, while a motion to lay on the table would bring the House directly to a vote.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Mr. Speaker, this is the first time during the three Congresses of which I have been a member, that a bill has been reported from the Committee of the Whole with a recommendation to strike out the enacting clause, and has been debated upon that recommendation. Of course the ruling of the Chair permitting debate is entirely correct; but I thought it would be of interest to the House to have the Chair state the parliamentary power of the House over a bill in such circumstances.

The SPEAKER. In the judgment of the Chair, the motion to strike out the enacting clause of a bill in Committee of the Whole entitles the gentleman making that motion to the floor upon the bill.

Mr. RANDALL. That right has not been recognized in this case.

The SPEAKER. It was not claimed, nor was the question raised. But gentlemen will see the propriety of the rule which the Chair now states. When in Committee of the Whole a motion has been carried adverse to the gentleman having charge of the bill, it seems to the Chair that when the bill comes before the House the member whose adverse motion has been sustained by the committee is entitled to the floor in the House. A notable instance of this kind was the tariff bill in the Forty-first Congress.

Mr. TREMAIN. But the question not having been raised——

The SPEAKER. The question not having been raised in this instance, the Chair of course is ruling on an abstract case.

Mr. RANDALL. Then I understand from the decision of the Chair that he has wrongfully, or at least by oversight, assigned the floor to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HALE.]

Mr. HALE, of New York. I beg the gentleman's pardon——

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state——

Mr. RANDALL. Hear me out. "Strike, but hear."

The SPEAKER. The Chair would state the matter a little differently from the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL.] The gentleman from New York [Mr. HALE] being the only member who addressed the Chair, he was recognized.

Mr. RANDALL. Well, then, I want to know whether the Chair will recognize the right of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] who in Committee of the Whole made the motion to strike out the enacting clause, to make a motion that the bill do lie on the table? I only raise this question because of the disposition of the gentleman from New York to abridge the remarks of the gentleman from Indiana when they seemed to cut deeper than he liked.

Mr. HALE, of New York. That remark is very ungracious, after I have given so liberally of my time to those two gentlemen.

The SPEAKER. As the motion to strike out the enacting clause of a bill may be frequently used hereafter, the Chair, if the House will give its attention, will state very briefly the history of the rule on the subject. Previous to the revision of the rules in 1860, the motion to strike out the enacting clause was used in one notable instance to bring a bill from the Committee of the Whole, and the bill when reported to the House was regarded as before the House for whatever action it might see fit to adopt. The Nebraska bill was brought out of the Committee of the Whole on the motion to strike out the enacting clause; and when the House refused to concur in that motion, the Speaker ruled that the bill was before the House. The House, however, was dissatisfied with that construction, because it enabled the majority in the Committee of the Whole at any time to terminate debate, thus practically carrying into the Committee of the Whole the full force and effect of the previous question, which it is one object of the Committee of the Whole to get rid of. Hence in the revision of 1860, which was a very notable revision of the rules, there was added to the rule a provision that when a bill should be reported from the Committee of the Whole with the enacting clause struck out, the first question in the House should be upon concurrence in that recommendation; that if the House should non-concur in striking out the enacting clause, the bill was thereby at once recommitted to the Committee of the Whole, and stood upon its original place on the Calendar, while, if the motion was concurred in, the bill of course would be dead. The operation of this rule was found inconvenient in practice, as it really kept the House in a parliamentary strait-jacket. In the summer of 1870 a lengthy tariff bill was under discussion in Committee of the Whole, under the charge of the then chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, a very skillful parliamentarian, now minister to England. The House found that it had before it in Committee of the Whole a bill of several hundred pages, which could not be got rid of except by going through every paragraph. It was found that striking out the enacting clause would do no good, because when the bill was returned to the House the House must either concur or non-concur. If it concurred, the bill was dead; and the House did not desire to kill the bill. If it non-concurred, the bill was put right back to its original place in the Committee of the Whole. In view of the difficulty thus arising, the rule was subsequently amended by the addition of this clause:

But before the question of concurrence is submitted, it is in order to entertain a motion to refer the bill to any committee of the House, with or without instructions, and when the same is again reported to the House, it shall be referred to the Committee of the Whole without debate, and resume its original place on the Calendar.

Under this rule, when the Committee of the Whole reports a bill to the House with the enacting clause struck out, the House can send the bill to the standing committee from which it came, with instructions to report it in a new form; and when so reported it goes back to its original place on the Calendar.

Now, the Chair thinks that, when a bill is reported from the Committee of the Whole with the enacting clause struck out, this rule, fairly construed, prohibits any motion whatever, except those specifically defined in the rule: first, will the House concur or non-concur with the recommendation of the Committee of the Whole; or, secondly, will it prefer to refer the bill to some standing committee, with or without instructions? The Chair thinks that it will simplify the practice to hold the House rigidly to the motions provided for in the rule.

Mr. RANDALL. Just here let me ask the Chair a question as to debate upon a motion of this sort. When a bill reaches the House, having been reported from the Committee of the Whole with a recommendation that the enacting clause be struck out, where does the ownership of the floor rest? Who has the control of the floor? Or is the right to debate unlimited?

The SPEAKER. The ownership of the floor belongs of right to the member upon whose motion the enacting clause was struck out in the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. RANDALL. What are the rights of the member upon whose motion the enacting clause was struck out in committee, in connection with debate on that question in the House?

The SPEAKER. He has a right to debate it. The only motion the Chair would recognize would be a motion to call for the previous question on concurrence in the report to strike out the enacting clause or to refer to any committee in the House. It brings the House to a direct and square vote on the recommendation of the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. Suppose the member upon whose motion the enacting clause was struck out does not avail himself of the right to debate in the House.

The SPEAKER. There is no question on that point, as the gentleman did not claim the floor.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. But suppose he does not avail himself of his right to the floor, and then some gentleman on the other side should make a motion to refer, with or without instructions, to some standing committee of the House, does not that motion entitle him to the floor?

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman should get the floor he has a right to submit such a motion, but as the rule was not before fully explained, the Chair would not like any particular advantage should be taken because of the inattention of members.

Mr. RANDALL. The Chair has given the House not only an interesting but a most lucid historical explanation of the reasons for the present status of this rule, and for one I am obliged to him for it.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. Suppose the House should non-concur in the recommendation of the committee to strike out the enacting clause of this bill, what then?

The SPEAKER. The bill goes back to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. If the motion to strike out the enacting clause is concurred in, then the bill is dead; if non-concurred in, the bill is recommitted.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. And when recommitted it is in the same position as it was before?

The SPEAKER. Precisely.

Mr. TREMAIN. Mr. Speaker, I hope the House will not agree with the Committee of the Whole in striking out the enacting clause of this bill. I hope it will not do so, as a matter of courtesy to the committee. I hope it will not do so, because it seems to me that justice demands this matter should not be left in the position in which it will be left if the report of the committee is agreed to by the House. It is true, as said by the very indefatigable chairman of the committee, [Mr. HALE, of New York,] when this motion was made, it involves questions which have not been discussed, no opportunity having been given to the members of that committee to show upon principle this Congress ought to provide for the construction of this bridge, the discussion having been confined to collateral matters. Immediately after that speech had been made, the motion having been made by the colleague of the gentleman who made an eloquent speech to the House, the chairman of the committee had no opportunity to meet this question as a matter of principle. I hope, therefore, on an appeal by a gentleman who has accepted this undesirable position of chairman of the Committee for the District of Columbia, intimating if an important bill which has been matured by the committee cannot be considered and discussed, it will be a question even for his consideration whether he should retain his position as chairman of that committee, this House, as a matter of comity and courtesy, will not hesitate to allow this matter to be referred back to the Committee of the Whole.

And again, what is the position in which this bridge is left if the action of the committee should be concurred in by the House? There is no other body on earth that has power to repair or rebuild this bridge except the Congress of the United States. It is admitted on all hands this bridge is so dilapidated it is liable to fall at any time, and is there a lawyer in this House who does not know if any men should lose their lives by the fall of this bridge a claim would exist in equity against this Congress for remuneration? Suppose this bridge were still under the control of the corporation chartered and allowed to charge toll for crossing it, they would be responsible. This Congress has substituted itself in their places. It has purchased the bridge. It has paid $30,000 for it, and ever since 1849 it has been in the habit of making appropriations for the repair of this bridge, until more than $100,000 have been expended from the public Treasury in keeping it in repair. Congress is therefore bound, upon every principle of law, and of honor, and of justice, to maintain that bridge.

There is no power on the part of the District to maintain it. Congress has exclusive control over that bridge; and if this House should now refuse to take any action by which a bridge shall be constructed there, what is the consequence? In the capital of the nation, that capital in which every citizen should feel an equal pride, you find in your public streets a bridge, for the construction and repair of which no one is responsible, in such a condition as to be a stigma and disgrace to the nation.

I have no sympathy with the outcry which I hear from gentlemen who are clamorous for economy when they denounce the extravagance of the people of this District. On the contrary, sir, when I remember the aspect which Washington presented during the war, when every street except Pennsylvania avenue was cut up by ruts, which it was scarcely possible to pass, and when its sewers and its mud-holes and its ponds were disastrous to the public health; and when I now find it beautified as it is, so that there is not a city in this country, or as I believe in Europe, that is better paved, or, as far as the board of public works have been able to accomplish it, more beautiful and adorned than the city of Washington, I think every American citizen, instead of being clamorous against these improvements, should be proud of his capital. We are all interested in it. It is capable of being made one of the most beautiful cities on earth. There is little prospect of the capital being changed. The public buildings are here. It was intended by the fathers who founded our Government that this should be the seat of the national Government. The States which ceded this territory to Congress gave the jurisdiction of it to Congress. It is Congress alone that has power to provide for the construction of these bridges.

If, however, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] is correct in his idea that some portion of the expense should be borne by the citizens of the District, then he should consent to have the bill referred back to the Committee of the Whole, that it may be amended so as to give power to the District government to raise by local taxation such an amount as may be necessary to construct this bridge. But for the honor of the United States I trust that this matter will not be left in its present condition. It seems to me that in this clamor for reform, in this wild shriek by which we seek to please our constituents by endeavoring to excite prejudice against this District, we are inflicting dishonor and disgrace on the nation. It is a discredit to the nation that we should refuse to have proper bridges and proper streets in the city which is the capital of the nation.

I heard yesterday my most esteemed and brilliant colleague from New York [Mr. COX] saying that he would not have his constituents taxed for the benefit of this District; that he represented the Hebrews and the Germans and the Irish of his district, and that they were against it. Now, I have no doubt that my friend represents his constituents truly. I have no doubt he has felt their pulse correctly, and nobody doubts his right to vote as he chooses on such questions as this. But, Mr. Speaker, I represent a broader constituency than my colleague; I have in my constituency others beside Hebrews, Germans, and Greeks; I have Americans, native and adopted. And in behalf of the constituency I represent I assert that we have an interest in the District of Columbia, and that we are not, and will not be, parties to the clamor that is made against the people of this District. I feel that we stand in a peculiar relation to this District. I feel that it is in some sense in the attitude of a ward of the nation.

I hope this bill will be referred back to the Committee of the Whole, that we may be able to devise some scheme by which we may be relieved from the stigma and disgrace of having out of repair this bridge which we have in our possession, which no other power on earth can repair, and which we refuse to repair, leaving it in a condition which is a shame and a burning disgrace to the nation.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I now call the previous question.

Mr. RANDALL. In order to make the record right, I move that the bill be laid on the table. I desire the decision of the Chair whether that motion is in order or not, so that it may govern the action of the House in future.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I raise the point of order that the motion to lay on the table is not in order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair rules that the motion to lay on the table is not in order. The Chair will recognize only the motions specifically laid down in the rule, which are sufficient for full expression of the opinion of the House. If the House should now vote to concur with the Committee of the Whole in striking out the enacting clause, the effect of that is equivalent to a vote to lay the bill on the table.

Mr. RANDALL. As I understand it, if the motion to lay on the table had been allowed there would not then have been permission for debate.

The SPEAKER. No; but the same gentleman who might desire to lay the bill on the table could call the previous question, which is not debatable, on the question of concurrring in the report of the committee striking out the enacting clause.

Mr. RANDALL. I only desired to have the decision of the Chair put on record for the future guidance of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is aiming at the same point as the gentleman. Under the ruling of the Chair debate may be stopped just as promptly by the previous question as by laying the bill on the table.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. HALE, of New York. Will the Chair inform the House of the position of the question?

The SPEAKER. The question is, will the House concur in the report of the Committee of the Whole? that is, shall the enacting words of the bill be stricken out, as recommended by the Committee of the Whole?

Mr. SPEER. On that question I call for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will first submit the question to a viva voce vote.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 82, noes 74.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I call for the yeas and nays.

On the question of ordering the yeas and nays, there were—ayes 42.

So (the affirmative being more than one-fifth of the last vote) the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 121, nays 84, not voting 85; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Arthur, Ashe, Atkins, Barber, Beck, Bell, Bland, Blount, Bowen, Bright, Bromberg, Buckner, Buffinton, Bundy, Burchard, Burleigh, Caldwell, Cannon, John B. Clark, jr., Clements, Clymer, Stephen A. Cobb, Coburn, Conger, Cook, Cox, Crossland, Crutchfield, Danford, Darrall, Davis, Dobbins, Donnan, Durham, Eden, Fort, Freeman, Giddings, Glover, Gunckel, Hagans, Hancock, Henry R. Harris, John T. Harris, Hatcher, Havens, John B. Hawley, Hays, Hereford, Herndon, Holman, Howe, Hubbell, Hunter, Hunton, Hyde, Kasson, Knapp, Lamar, Lawrence, Loughridge, Luttrell, Marshall, Martin, McCrary, James W. McDill, McKee, McLean, Merriam, Milliken, Neal, Niblack, Nunn, O'Brien, Orr, Packer, Hosea W. Parker, Isaac C. Parker, Phillips, Pike, Randall, Rawls, Read, Robbins, James C. Robinson, James W. Robinson, Ross, Henry B. Sayler, Milton Sayler, John G. Schumaker, Scofield, Sener, Shanks, Sheats, Sherwood, Lazarus D. Shoemaker, A. Herr Smith, John Q. Smith, Snyder, Southard, Speer, Standeford, Stone, Storm, Taylor, Tyner, Vance, Waldron, Wells, Whitehead, Whitehouse, Whiteley, Whitthorne, Charles W. Willard, Charles G. Williams, Willie, James Wilson, Wolfe, Woodworth, and John D. Young—121.

NAYS—Messrs. Averill, Barry, Berry, Cason, Cessna, Clayton, Cotton, Crooke, Crounse, Curtis, Duell, Dunnell, Eames, Eldredge, Farwell, Field, Frye, Gooch, Eugene Hale, Robert S. Hale, Harmer, Benjamin W. Harris, Harrison, Hathorn, Joseph R. Hawley, Gerry W. Hazelton, Hendee, E. Rockwood Hoar, George F. Hoar, Hodges, Hooper, Hoskins, Houghton, Hurlbut, Hynes, Kelley, Kellogg, Kendall, Lansing, Lawson, Leach, Lowe, Lynch, Maynard, Alexander S. McDill, MacDougall, Monroe, Negley, O'Neill, Orth, Packard, Page, Pelham, Pendleton, Perry, Phelps, James H. Platt, jr., Thomas C. Platt, Poland, Rainey, Ransier, Rice, Ellis H. Roberts, Sawyer, Sessions, Sheldon, Smart, H. Boardman Smith, Sprague, Starkweather, Strawbridge, Charles R. Thomas, Thornburgh, Todd, Townsend, Tremain, Wallace, Walls, Jasper D. Ward, Marcus L. Ward, Wheeler, White, William Williams, and Woodford—84.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Albert, Albright, Archer, Banning, Barnum, Barrere, Bass, Begole, Biery, Bradley, Brown, Burrows, Benjamin F. Butler, Roderick R. Butler, Cain, Amos Clark, jr., Freeman Clarke, Clinton L. Cobb, Comingo, Corwin, Creamer, Crittenden, Crocker, Dawes, DeWitt, Elliott, Foster, Garfield, Hamilton, John W. Hazelton, Hersey, Jewett, Killinger, Lamison, Lamport, Lewis, Lofland, Lowndes, Magee, McJunkin, McNulta, Mellish, Mills, Mitchell, Moore, Morey, Morrison, Myers, Nesmith, Niles, Parsons, Pierce, Potter, Pratt, Purman, Rapier, Ray, Richmond, William R. Roberts, Rusk, Henry J. Scudder, Isaac W. Scudder, Sloss, Small, George L. Smith, J. Ambler Smith, William A. Smith, Stanard, Stephens, St. John, Stowell, Strait, Swann, Sypher, Christopher Y. Thomas, Waddell, Wilber, George Willard, John M. S. Williams, William B. Williams, Wilshire, Ephraim K. Wilson, Jeremiah M. Wilson, Wood, and Pierce M. B. Young—85.

So the enacting clause of the bill was stricken out.

Mr. TYNER moved to reconsider the vote by which the enacting clause was stricken out; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. I ask the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia if he will not yield now to allow the Committee on Elections to go on with the Georgia contested-election case.

Mr. RANDALL. O, no; let us take up the next bill reported from the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. I ask that that be postponed until we dispose of the Georgia contested-election case.

Mr. HALE, of New York. If there is an understanding that the bill reported from the Committee of the Whole shall remain as unfinished business to come up after the election case is disposed of, I have no objection.

Mr. RANDALL. I object to that.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New York [Mr. HALE] propose to allow debate on the bill reported from the Committee of the Whole?

Mr. HALE, of New York. It is in charge of my colleague on the committee from Iowa, [Mr. COTTON.]

Mr. COTTON. If the bill will come up as unfinished business I do not object to its postponement.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman propose to debate the bill, or to have a vote upon it?

Mr. COTTON. I propose to allow debate for half an hour. Several gentlemen desire to make remarks upon the amendment to the bill. The debate will be very brief; perhaps it will not even take half an hour.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. I understand that both of these matters—the bill of the gentleman and the election case—are pending as unfinished business; and if the Committee on the District of Columbia will yield, I suppose the election case will come up.

Mr. RANDALL. Under the rules the bills reported from the committee must be disposed of now, or else be passed over by unanimous consent.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I beg to ask the Speaker a question. If the Committee on the District of Columbia shall now yield to the Committee on Elections, both matters being pending as unfinished business, would it leave the remaining bill of the Committee on the District of Columbia as unfinished business, to come up after the close of the election case?

The SPEAKER. It would.

Mr. RANDALL. Let me interject that that can only be done by unanimous consent; and I make objection.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has been somewhat in doubt as to which would take precedence this morning, the election case or the business of the District of Columbia. The Committee on the District of Columbia has superior privileges to any Committee of the House. It is called regularly every third Friday of the month, and the Chair thinks that they ought not to let anything go over as unfinished business to the next day, as it is to the detriment of the order of other business in the House.

Mr. RANDALL. I suggest that the unfinished business of the committee go over until the next Friday assigned to that committee.

The SPEAKER. The Chair could not hold that, for it would deprive the Committee on the District of Columbia of an opportunity to bring the House to a vote on its measures. That question has been adjudicated.

Mr. RANDALL. The Chair will certainly entertain my objection to passing over the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to have the question on the bill reported by the Committee on the District of Columbia settled as promptly as possible. The bill was elaborately discussed in Committee of the Whole. The gentleman will have to make a formal motion to postpone it if he desires to have it postponed. That can be done by a majority of the House; but the Chair desires to make this statement, that a bill goes to Committee of the Whole for the purpose of being debated, and it will lead to inconvenience of no small dimensions if bills are to be debated again when they are reported from the Committee of the Whole. If the bill is to be debated again at length the Chair suggests that it be recommitted to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. A bill when reported from the Committee of the Whole is supposed to be ready for action by the House, not reported back for debate.

Mr. COTTON. I have no objection to calling for a vote. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. G. F. HOAR] desires to address the House for a few minutes.

The SPEAKER. Even on large appropriation bills it is never asked that extended debate shall take place after the bills have been reported to the House.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I do not think that during this whole session any bill reported from the Committee of the Whole, from the General or Private Calendar, has been debated in the House after being so reported.

The SPEAKER. One hour after calling the previous question is all that has ever been asked for debate upon the largest appropriation bills. The Chair desires to keep the House to the regular routine of business.

PAYMENT OF TEACHERS IN THE DISTRICT.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I desire to occupy the attention of the House certainly not over five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. COTTON] can yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. G. F. HOAR,] after the previous question shall have been ordered.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. COTTON. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I desire to call the attention of the House to the amendment which was put upon this bill in Committee of the Whole upon the motion of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. MERRIAM,] providing that a tax shall be levied on personal property, including bank stock, in this District. Now, that is a very good thing to do; but the amendment which has been adopted does not provide any possible mechanism by which it can be done. It does not provide for administering any oath; it does not provide what personal property shall be subject to taxation, or how you shall get at the amount of property which a man holds, what amount is due him, or what he owes. Moreover, a fatal defect in the whole proposition is that it does not provide any exemption from taxation. If this amendment should become law, every servant girl's wardrobe and her dollar jewelry must be assessed and taxed; every poor widow's cow and her household furniture must be valued and taxed.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I thought the gentleman said it was a very good thing to do.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I say that in the abstract the taxation of personal property for public burdens is a very good and proper thing to do.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I understood the gentleman to say——

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I have but five minutes, and I do not want to be interrupted. The amendment which the gentleman from New York [Mr. MERRIAM] proposes, as it stands, is a more tyrannical proposition for taxation than ever was before proposed in any legislative body in this country. I desire to ask members of this House if they are willing to put their votes on record for a measure which is to subject to taxation the cow of the poor widow, the wardrobe of every servant girl, the furniture of every laboring man in this District; and, as a friend near me suggests, all the institutions for education in this District? There is no provision by which any corporation is bound to bring in a list of its property and stockholders. There is no machinery provided for carrying this proposition into effect. The amendment, uncouth, unlicked, unconsidered, is utterly impossible of execution.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. I ask the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. COTTON] to yield to me one minute.

Mr. COTTON. I will do so.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. I am recorded in the RECORD this morning as having spoken of this sum proposed to be appropriated by this bill as a gratuity to the District, for which we could have no expectation of being reimbursed. I said no such thing. And as I was misunderstood by the reporters, I fear I was misunderstood by the members of the House. I asked the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] what right he had to speak of this sum as a gratuity to the District, when it was no more than the Government ought to pay upon a fair assessment of the valuation of its real estate within the District.

And let me add a single word further. For myself, I believe it is the duty of the Government, that it is the only just and square thing the Government can do, to treat its property within this District as subject to assessment and taxation, and to pay its proportion of the expenses of the government of the District, of the improvement of the District, and of the school expenses of the District. I do not join in any crusade against this District. I bear cheerful witness for myself and my constituents that in assuming the onerous burden of taxation which the residents of this District have assumed in the improvement of this capital city, they have "done the country proud."

Mr. LUTTRELL. Let me ask the gentleman, as he proposes to tax the Government property here, if he is willing to have Government property taxed all over the country from one end of the Union to the other?

Mr. SMITH, of New York. This capital was located in a waste—almost in an unsettled wilderness. Every citizen who has come here and invested in property here, is drawn hither by the fact that this is the capital of the Government. It is the duty of the Government to pay for the gas-lights which burn at night, and which light the gentleman and me home from our dinner-parties. There is no adornment of this city except for the benefit of the country at large, and we ought to do the square thing by this District.

Mr. LUTTRELL. What induces men to come here except to make money?

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman by his vote provides for the erection of a magnificent building in my district, and we in the district have to guard and protect it. But the Government having erected that building, it said that the city of Philadelphia shall not assess a single dollar of taxation upon that property. Now, what more right has the Government to claim that public property in the States and Territories shall be exempted from taxation than that such property in this District shall be so exempted?

Mr. SMITH, of New York. The gentleman's question is predicated on the theory that might makes right.

Mr. RANDALL. Not at all.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. I say that the Government property in this District should not be exempted from local taxation for such purposes as this. Now, sir, we have passed, within a few days, in Committee of the Whole, an appropriation for police for guarding this building. I wish to know whether it is not the duty of the Government to educate the people of this District so that they may not be here plundering and stealing public property—whether it is not the duty of the Government, owning a large proportion of the real estate within this District, to aid in the education of the people who are about us, and in whose education and moral character we are, more than all others, interested.

Mr. RANDALL. I agree that the interest of the Government is in behalf of education; but it has just as much interest in the education of the people of my city and my State as in the education of the people of this District. In my State we have provided in the fundamental law that the Legislature shall each year make an appropriation of $1,000,000 for the education of the children——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. COTTON,] who holds the floor, desires to resume it.

Mr. RANDALL. I supposed I was speaking. [Laughter.]

Mr. COTTON. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. ELDREDGE.]

Mr. ELDREDGE. I understood the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. G. F. HOAR] to say that the proposition contained in this amendment was a very proper thing to do. I do not know that that was the way he intended to be understood. I gave him an opportunity to explain; but in his self-occupation he felt it not of importance enough to explain what he did mean. As for myself, I say that I never heard a more absurd proposition presented to a legislative body than the one contained in that amendment.

What are we doing? What is the attitude and position in which we are placed? The Congress of the United States, by an organic act, has required the government of the District of Columbia to provide a system of free schools. That organic act is explicit on this subject; it is mandatory; there is no escape from it; the schools are to be free. Now, this city is the great center where all the paupers of the whole United States come and settle; they are invited here by the legislation and action of Congress. Forty thousand or more people here, without a dollar of property, are encouraged to settle and remain in the District of Columbia. I understand that a hundred members of Congress have brought their children with them to the city of Washington and are sending them to the District schools. Many thousand—I am not aware precisely how many—of the Government employés, holding residences outside of the District of Columbia in various States of the Union, have come here with their children and are sending them to the schools in this District.

As I have said, you have, by the organic act, required the District authorities to provide a system of free schools. In accordance with your mandate they have gone on and assessed a proper sum, as they thought, to support the schools during the current or fiscal year. They have undertaken to collect those taxes—and have succeeded in some degree—upon real estate located in the District of Columbia. Some property-holders have not been able to pay their taxes; some have been unwilling to pay them; and many of the taxes assessed for school purposes remain unpaid. Certificates have been issued against real estate; and those certificates have been offered in the market; but from some circumstance or other the District authorities are not able to realize upon those certificates; so that the school-teachers employed under your mandate requiring that the schools shall be free are unpaid.

What is this position in which we are to-day? By this amendment we propose to require the people of the District of Columbia, for the purpose of educating the children of members of Congress and of employés of the Government, to assess upon themselves and their property another tax to support these schools, because they have not been able to realize the full amount already assessed for the same purpose under your mandate.

Mr. FORT. Will the gentleman allow me to correct him in one respect?

Mr. ELDREDGE. If the gentleman has a question, I will hear it; but otherwise I do not wish to be interrupted in my remarks.

Mr. FORT. The gentleman speaks of this District educating the children of members of Congress. Now, I have one little fellow for whose tuition I pay ten dollars a quarter in this city, and there are other members to my knowledge who do the same thing.

Mr. RANDALL. I am better off than the gentleman; I have to pay for two.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I do not know how much the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FORT] pays for his "little fellow." [Laughter.] I do not know how much any one pays for such purposes; but your organic act requires that the schools here shall be free. I suppose the District authorities here obeyed your mandate in that regard, and that the schools are free; and that there is no power on the part of the District authorities to reject a scholar who applies in this District for admission to the schools. Your organic act is general; it requires the schools to be free. And the attitude in which you are now placing yourselves is requiring that the citizens of the District shall be assessed twice for the support of the schools—once upon real estate, and again by taxation upon corporations and personal property in the District.

Mr. SHANKS. I wish to ask the gentleman this question: Is it not the fact that Congress also compels the Territories belonging to the Union to establish a common-school system, while at the same time the public lands in the Territories are prohibited from being taxed for any purpose?

Mr. ELDREDGE. Yes, sir; and the Congress of the United States has given to every State and Territory a munificent bounty in lands to support the public schools; but in this District you have never given one dollar in that form. In many of the States every sixteenth section has been given by the Government for the purposes of education; but in this District no such donation has been made. Members of Congress may come here to this District and force their children into the schools, and refuse to pay a cent for the support of those schools.

Mr. SHANKS. I am sorry to hear it stated—I never heard it before—that any member of Congress has forced a child into any public school here.

Mr. COTTON. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. MONROE.]

Mr. MONROE. Mr. Speaker, I do not understand any member of this House to contend that the Congress of the United States will not be called upon some time in the future to make appropriations for the District of Columbia. It has been done repeatedly by Congress in the past, going back through a long period. It will certainly be done again.

My colleague on the Committee on Education and Labor [Mr. G. F. HOAR] reminds me there is a permanent law now for making appropriations for the District of Columbia. Something of this kind must always be done. Without attempting to settle here the question what appropriation should be made, or how much should be made, there is no doubt Congress will have to make some appropriations for the District.

Now, sir, this being admitted, the bill before the House, as I understand it, perfectly protects the Treasury of the United States against any improper drafts upon it. This bill provides that the $97,000 which shall now be advanced for payment of the teachers in the District of Columbia shall be charged against any appropriation to be made hereafter for the benefit of the District. It seems to me that settles the question, and we need not give ourselves any further concern about it.

The question before the House really is not whether Congress should pay this or the District should pay it. The discussion of that question is deferred to a future time. The practical question is this: shall these hard-working and poorly paid teachers receive the compensation which has been promised them, and which by law and by equity is their due? That, it seems to me, is the practical question before us.

Mr. SPEER. Let me interrupt the gentleman.

Mr. MONROE. I have but five minutes, and shall not be able to get through with a single thought. The gentleman can get five minutes, I have no doubt, for himself.

Mr. SPEER. Have not the teachers been paid, and have they not sold their certificates, which are now held by money-shavers in the District?

Mr. MONROE. There may be some such cases, but generally they have not been paid. The only practical question before us is whether these teachers shall be paid or shall wander about this capital as beggars, when the money is honestly due them for faithful service? I say further, even if this bill had not this safeguard, even if this provision had not been introduced into it that this money should be paid from future appropriations, I should still feel it to be my duty to vote for this bill, because it seems to me the question which of two parties shall pay these teachers is a matter of far less moment than the question whether they are to be paid at all. And I say frankly to the House I would rather a mistake should be made, I would rather the wrong party should pay these teachers, than they should not be paid at all. I care much less about the question which of these two parties shall pay them than about the question whether they are to be paid. Even if a blunder should be made and the wrong party should pay them, I will thank God they are to be paid by somebody.

I think it would be better for the ends of justice, better every way that this miserable scandal, which to my personal knowledge has been a most painful thing in the city of Washington—I say I believe it to be better every way this scandal should be removed, by having Congress pay these teachers, even if a mistake should be made as to the party paying it, than to have this thing continue any longer. I have been mortified, I have been distressed, by occurrences here, and I can assure my friend from Ohio, [Mr. LAWRENCE,] who wants to interrupt me and whom I cannot permit to have the floor, and my friend from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SPEER,] who wanted to interrupt me, and all the gentlemen whose faces I see are full of questions they are anxious to interject into my poor five minutes—I wish to say to all these gentlemen if they had these poor teachers call at their doors and come into their rooms, with the marks of distress, evident distress, upon their faces and upon their persons; if you gentlemen had visits from these teachers, as I have had on account of my relation to the Committee on Education and Labor, and been compelled to hear their appeals, my impression is you would be a good deal quieter on this floor and less disposed to ask questions in opposition to the passage of this bill.

Mr. LAWRENCE rose.

Mr. MONROE. I have only a second left, and cannot yield the floor. There are about forty gentlemen trying to interrupt me; and, while I have the greatest esteem and respect for them, I cannot yield.

I wish to say one thing more, and then I will take my seat. Gentlemen talk about their constituents being taxed to pay the teachers of this District, and they say they do not believe the people would approve of it. Mr. Speaker, so far as I am concerned, (and I believe all gentlemen, if they rightly understood their constituents, would have the same feeling)—so far as I am concerned, the only thing about this matter I should be ashamed of or fearful about if I was to go home to my constituents would be my having voted against a bill like this.

Now, I believe that the constituency which I represent, and the constituencies, the intelligent constituencies, which other gentlemen represent, would condemn us if we allowed these poor people to go up and down these streets shoeless and in distress, with the honest wages for their honest day's work unpaid them. I believe the whole people of the United States would condemn us.

Sir, the yeomanry of the United States, the great American people, are not ungenerous; still less are they unjust. They do not wish us to deal in a small and narrow way with these poor teachers. Sir, there is not a man to be found among the honest yeomanry of the United States who would take such a position as that. The whole American people, if they could speak here to-day, would say, "Pay these teachers; pay them the last cent that is due them, and give them a cent over if you cannot make the change exactly right; do not leave this miserable and wretched scandal to disgrace the capital and the whole nation."

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. MERRIAM. Before the gentleman resumes his seat, I desire to ask him a question. The committee of which he is a member is the committee not only on education but on labor. And I ask the gentleman if he does not think that the laboring classes of this community, who have not received the wages due them by the board of public works, and who are suffering as much as the teachers, should also have provision made for them?

Mr. MONROE. I am glad to answer the gentleman. I should have the greatest pleasure in seeing that object secured. I supposed that I was advocating the interests of the laboring classes when I was speaking for the teachers. But my friend from New York [Mr. MERRIAM] must not forget that this bill does not propose ultimately to pay anything out of the Treasury. It is proposed to return every cent of this sum out of the next appropriation which we make for the District.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment to the bill reported by the committee. It will be read by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out these words:

And the money which may be paid under this act shall be regarded as an advancement made by the United States to said District to be deducted from moneys which Congress may hereafter appropriate.

And in lieu thereof insert these words:

That the government of the District of Columbia is hereby authorized and directed to levy and collect a tax to an amount equal to the amount appropriated in this bill, upon personal property, including banks and other corporations in said District, and pay the same into the Treasury of the United States.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 79, noes 77.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. RANDALL. I move to recommit the bill.

The SPEAKER. That cannot be done, as the previous question is operating.

Mr. RANDALL. Then I move that the bill and amendment be laid upon the table.

Mr. PAGE. I ask that the bill and the pending amendment be again reported.

The bill and amendment were again read.

Mr. RANDALL. I should like, by consent, to make a motion to recommit the bill to the Committee of the Whole. It is now in a shape, as I understand it, in which neither the friends nor the opponents of the bill are likely to vote for it.

The SPEAKER. That would require a reconsideration of the vote by which the main question was ordered.

Mr. RANDALL. Then I will make a motion to reconsider, with a view to ultimately reaching a vote upon the motion to recommit the bill to the Committee of the Whole. This is not killing it outright, but allowing it a little breathing time.

Mr. MAYNARD. I hope the gentleman will press his motion to lay the bill on the table, that it may be known whether the House is in favor of passing a bill of this general character or not. If the House is not in favor of passing such a bill we need not waste more time upon it. And if we do not wish to kill the bill, it is important that what we do now shall be done with reasonable promptitude. I think the motion to lay the bill on the table will best test the sense of the House.

Mr. RANDALL. I will withdraw my motion to recommit the bill, and now move to lay the bill on the table.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Is that motion in order while the House is executing the previous question?

The SPEAKER. It is. It is in order at every fresh stage of the bill.

The question being taken on Mr. RANDALL's motion to lay the bill on the table, there were—ayes 80, noes 83.

Mr. RANDALL called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 91, nays 115, not voting 84; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Arthur, Ashe, Atkins, Barber, Beck, Beil, Bland, Blount, Bowen, Bradley, Bright, Buckner, Buffinton, Burchard, Caldwell, Cannon, John B. Clark, jr., Clements, Clymer, Cook, Crossland, Crutchfield, Danford, Darrall, Davis, Donnan, Durham, Eden, Fort, Freeman, Giddings, Glover, Gunckel, Hancock, Henry R. Harris, John T. Williams, Wilshire, Ephraim K. Wilson, Jeremiah M. Wilson, John D. Young, and Pierce M. B. Young—84.

So the motion to lay on the table was not agreed to.

During the roll-call,

Mr. O'BRIEN said: My colleague, Mr. ARCHER, is detained at home; if here he would vote "no."

The result of the vote having been announced as above recorded, the question recurred upon agreeing to the amendment reported from the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. RANDALL. I move to reconsider the vote by which the main question was ordered, with a view of moving to recommit the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The question was taken; and the motion was not agreed to.

The question was then taken upon agreeing to the amendment; and there were—yeas 112, nays 84, not voting 94; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Arthur, Ashe, Atkins, Banning, Barber, Beck, Begole, Bell, Bland, Blount, Bowen, Bradley, Bright, Bromberg, Buckner, Buffinton, Bundy, Burchard, Burleigh, Caldwell, Cannon, John B. Thomas, Waddell, Wilber, John M. S. Williams, Wilshire, Ephraim K. Wilson, Jeremiah M. Wilson, John D. Young, and Pierce M. B. Young—94.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The question recurred upon ordering the bill, as amended, to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. RANDALL. I move that the bill be laid upon the table.

The question was put; and on a division there were—ayes 67, noes 85.

So the motion was not agreed to.

The question was taken upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time; and on a division there were—ayes 89, noes 61.

So the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. RANDALL. The title of the bill is not right; the bill does not contain an appropriation.

The SPEAKER. The title will be the last thing to be acted on. The question now is on the passage of the bill.

The question was put; and on a division there were—ayes 86, noes 64.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 105, nays 86, not voting 99; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Averill, Barry, Begole, Berry, Bradley, Bromberg, Bundy, Burleigh, Cason, Cessna, Clayton, Stephen A. Cobb, Coburn, Conger, Cotton, Crooke, Crutchfield, Darrall, Dobbins, Dunnell, Eames, Field, Frye, Gooch, Gunckel, Hagans, Eugene Hale, Harmer, Benjamin W. Harris, Harrison, Hathorn, Joseph R. Thomas, Walls, Marcus L. Ward, Whitehead, Whiteley, Wilber, John M. S. Williams, Wilshire, Ephraim K. Wilson, Jeremiah M. Wilson, Wood, John D. Young, and Pierce M. B. Young—99.

So the bill was passed.

During the roll-call,

Mr. O'BRIEN said: My colleague, Mr. ARCHER, if present, would vote "ay."

Mr. RANDALL. I am paired in this bill with the gentleman from Tennessee, Mr. MAYNARD. He would vote "ay" if present, and I would vote "no."

Mr. COTTON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. RANDALL. Upon further examination I find that this bill makes an appropriation, but with a bankrupt indorser.

Mr. COTTON. I move to amend the title by adding "and providing for the levy of a tax to reimburse the same."

The amendment was agreed to, and the title as amended was adopted.

Mr. COTTON moved to reconsider the vote by which the title as amended was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. I move that the House now proceed to the consideration of the Georgia contested-election case.

The SPEAKER. That motion is not necessary; the case will come up of itself.

CURRENCY.

Mr. WALDRON. I ask consent to present a memorial from the citizens of Detroit, on the subject of the currency, and I take occasion to state that it is signed by nine-tenths of the merchants, manufacturers, produce-dealers, railroad-managers, and vessel-owners of that city; in fact every branch of commercial and business industry is represented in it. The memorial is the expression of nine-tenths of the active business men of the city of Detroit, and I believe I am justified in saying that it expresses, in the same proportion, the business sentiment of the State of Michigan. I ask for the reading of the memorial.

The memorial was read as follows:

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

We, the undersigned, citizens of Detroit, Michigan, respectfully represent to your honorable body that we are opposed to any inflation of the currency, and are in favor of a return to specie payments at the earliest practicable moment.

The memorial was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. NEGLEY, by unanimous consent, submitted an amendment which he proposed to offer to the bill in regard to the issue of $400,000,000 in legal-tender notes; which was ordered to be printed.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WHEELER. I ask unanimous consent that the amendment of the Senate to the Army appropriation bill be taken from the Speaker's table, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

No objection being made, it was so ordered.

FORTIFICATION APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I make a similar request in regard to the Senate amendments to the bill making appropriations for the construction, preservation, and repair of certain fortifications and other works of defense.

No objection being made, it was so ordered.

BILLS ON THE SPEAKER'S TABLE.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. I ask unanimous consent that the bill of the Senate providing for the payment of the expenses of the joint select committee investigating the affairs of the District of Columbia be taken up, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The SPEAKER. If no objection is made all the bills on the Speaker's table will be taken up, and referred to their appropriate committees.

No objection was made.

Accordingly bills were taken from the Speaker's table, severally read a first and second time, and referred as follows:

A bill (S. No. 510) donating condemned cannon and cannon-balls to the posts of the Grand Army of the Republic of Philadelphia, and other associations, for monumental purposes—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

A bill (S. No. 494) amendatory of the act entitled "An act to revise, consolidate, and amend the statutes relating to patents and copyrights"—to the Committee on Patents, and ordered to be printed.

A bill (S. No. 42) granting a pension to Caleb A. Lamb, late a musician in Company E, of the Forty-sixth Regiment of Indiana Volunteer Infantry—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

A bill (S. No. 387) granting a pension to Captain Benjamin Farley, Company C, Fifth Indiana Cavalry—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

A bill (S. No. 395) for the relief of Edward N. Calvert—to the Committee on War Claims.

A bill (S. No. 512) to extend the time for completing the Wisconsin Central Railroad in Wisconsin—to the Committee on the Public Lands.

A bill (S. No. 449) granting a pension to Mrs. Amy A. Hough—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

A bill (S. No. 527) for the relief of Anson Harmon—to the Committee on Claims.

A bill (S. No. 477) granting a pension to Jemima Maxwell—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

A bill (S. No. 518) granting a pension to Benjamin C. Skinner—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

A bill (S. No. 539) granting a pension to Eugene Smith—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

A bill (S. No. 540) granting a pension to Fanny Newcomb, mother of Irenus Newcomb, late of Company H, Sixth Regiment Vermont Volunteers—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

A bill (S. No. 161) to provide for the appointment of a commission on the subject of the alcoholic and fermented liquor traffic—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

A bill (S. No. 384) for the benefit of the Louisville and Bardstown Turnpike Company—to the Committee on War Claims.

A bill (S. No. 433) for the relief of Mrs. Susan H. Shelby—to the Committee on War Claims.

A bill (S. No. 192) for the relief of Salome Deck—to the Committee on War Claims.

A bill (S. No. 259) to authorize the proper accounting officers of the Treasury to settle with Henry C. Carey—to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

A bill (S. No. 176) to authorize the establishment of public marine schools—to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

A bill (S. No. 419) for the relief of Sebastian Reichart—to the Committee on the Public Lands.

A bill (S. No. 207) for the relief of C. E. Rogers—to the Committee on Claims.

A bill (S. No. 221) to fund the sum due the Prairie band of Pottawatomie Indians, under the provisions of the treaty of February 27, 1867, and to transfer and fund any sum which may be found due from the Citizens' band of Pottawatomies to the Prairie band, according to an agreement entered into between said bands July 18, 1873, and to use both principal and interest for the civilization of said Indians—to the Committe on Indian Affairs.

A bill (S. No. 318) to provide for the appraisement of merchandise in certain cases—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

A bill (S. No. 465) for the relief of Joseph Council, of Mobile, Alabama—to the Committee on War Claims.

A bill (S. No. 470) for the relief of James R. Young—to the Committee on Claims.

A bill (S. No. 583) making an appropriation to defray the expenses of the joint select committee to inquire into the affairs of the District of Columbia—to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I move to reconsider the various votes by which bills have been referred; and also move that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. PENDLETON, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 2423) to approve an act of the Legislative Assembly of the District of Columbia relating to parishes of the Protestant Episcopal Church.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE INVESTIGATION.

Mr. DURHAM. I am instructed by the Committee on the Expenditures in the Department of Justice to ask permission that they may sit during the sessions of the House.

There being no objection, leave was granted.

JOHN W. MASSEY.

Mr. MYERS, by unanimous consent, reported back from the Committee on Foreign Affairs a bill (H. R. No. 2117) for the relief of John W. Massey, late consul at Paso del Norte, Mexico; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

POST-ROAD BILL.

Mr. PACKER, by unanimous consent, reported from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads a bill (H. R. No. 2551) to establish certain post-roads; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, and recommitted.

GRAND MARIE HARBOR, LAKE SUPERIOR.

Mr. CONGER, by unanimous consent, presented a letter from the Secretary of War, with an accompanying report on the Grand Marie Harbor of Lake Superior, Minnesota; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

GEORGIA ELECTION CONTEST—SLOAN vs. RAWLS.

The House resumed the consideration of the following resolutions reported from the Committee on Elections:

Resolved, That Hon. Morgan Rawls is not entitled to a seat in this House as a Representative from the first congressional district of Georgia, in the Forty-third Congress.

Resolved, That Hon. Andrew Sloan is entitled to a seat in this House as a Representative from the first congressional district of Georgia, in the Forty-third Congress.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. I hope there may be an understanding that the previous question shall be called at the expiration of one hour.

Mr. SPEER. I understood, Mr. Speaker, that it was satisfactory to the chairman of the committee that those representing the views of the minority should have an hour, at the expiration of which time the previous question should be called, and that the remainder of the discussion should be left to the majority.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. That is satisfactory.

The SPEAKER. The arrangement, then, is that after one hour the previous question shall be considered as operating. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. BLOUNT obtained the floor.

Mr. NIBLACK. If the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] will yield to me for the purpose, I would like to move that the House adjourn.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Georgia yield?

Mr. BLOUNT. Yes, sir.

Mr. NIBLACK. Then I make the motion.

The question being taken on the motion, there were—ayes 73, noes 70; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. NIBLACK and Mr. HYDE were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 70, noes 83.

So the motion to adjourn was not agreed to.

Mr. BLOUNT proceeded to address the House, but without concluding yielded for a motion to adjourn. His remarks in full will appear on page 2399.

Mr. LAMAR. I move that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at four o'clock and twenty minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following memorials, petitions, and other papers were presented at the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. ADAMS: The petition of Joshua Hulse, of Powell County, Kentucky, for a pension, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. BERRY: The petition of citizens of Wyandot County, Ohio, for the removal of disabilities from soldiers who left their regiment without leave after the close of the late war, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, the petition of Peter C. Ulrich, of Upper Sandusky, Ohio, for increase of pension, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. DONNAN: The petition of E. Cartwright and others, of Decorah, Iowa, for an extension of the signal service, so as to benefit in a more direct manner public health, to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois: The memorial of 141 citizens of Bureau County, Illinois, in reference to the construction of a canal from Hennepin, on the Illinois River, to Rock Island, on the Mississippi River, to the Committee on Railways and Canals.

Also, the memorial of 112 citizens of Annawan, Henry County, Illinois, of similar import, to the Committee on Railways and Canals.

Also, the memorial of citizens of Rock Island County, Illinois, of similar import, to the Committee on Railways and Canals.

Also, the memorial of citizens of Poweshiek and Jasper Counties, Iowa, of similar import, to the Committee on Railways and Canals.

By Mr. HENDEE: The petition of Z. M. Mansur and others, of Vermont, that soldiers who have lost an arm above the elbow may receive the same pension as soldiers who have lost a leg above the knee, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. LUTTRELL: Papers relating to the Pulgas Rancho and Coppinger Rancho grants, in the State of California, to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Also, papers relating to the Visitacion Rancho and the Buri Buri Rancho grants, in the State of California, to the Committee on the Public Lands.

By Mr. ROBINSON, of Ohio: The petition of John Dewitt, of Gambier, Ohio, for correction of his military record, to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. WALDRON: The petition of citizens of Clayton, Michigan, for the establishment of a general and permanent system of international arbitration, to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. WOODFORD: The memorial of King's County Medical Society, New York, in reference to the status of the medical staff of the United States Army, to the Committee on Military Affairs.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, March 23, 1874.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

On motion of Mr. DAVIS, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of Friday last was dispensed with.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. CHANDLER presented a concurrent resolution of the Legislature of Michigan, asking that the postal laws be so modified as to permit free exchanges between newspapers and the free circulation of newspapers in the county where printed; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan, presented the petition of Rev. George Ransom and 13 others, members of the Presbytery of Grand Rapids, Michigan, praying Congress to appropriate the unappropriated portion of the Chinese indemnity fund for the education of the Chinese in the Pacific States; which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also presented a resolution of the Legislature of Michigan, favoring the repeal of any and all provisions of the existing laws which prohibit free exchanges between newspapers and other periodicals, and the free circulation of weekly papers in the county where they are published; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. CONKLING. I present a petition numerously signed by residents of the twenty-fifth congressional district, in the State of New York, praying for the formation of a high court of nations, or such other pacific measures as may lead to international arbitration as a substitute for war. I move the reference of this petition to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CONKLING. I present also the proceedings of the Medical Society of the County of Kings, New York, recently held in the city of Brooklyn, asking Congress to place the Medical Corps of the Army upon the same footing, in regard to pay, rank, and promotion, with the Medical Corps of the Navy, and with other staff corps. I move the reference of these proceedings to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CONKLING. I present like proceedings, being a preamble and resolutions passed at a meeting of the New York State Medical Society, held at Albany recently. I move their reference to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CONKLING presented the petition of E. P. Rogers on behalf of his wife, deceased, heir of John Caldwell, late of Hartford, Connecticut, praying to be indemnified for spoliations committed by the French prior to the year 1801; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented the petition of J. W. McClure, praying the payment of a moiety due him out of moneys covered into the Treasury of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. CONKLING. I present a memorial, signed by Peter Cooper, Phelps, Dodge & Co., L. P. Morton, Jackson S. Schultz, and a large number of other citizens of high character of the city of New York, reciting the legislation and the results of the legislation touching a centennial exhibition, and asking Congress to so legislate in respect to appropriations and otherwise as to redeem what is regarded as a public engagement to insure the success of the centennial exposition, and also to make it international in its character. I move that this memorial be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HAMLIN presented the memorial of A. T. C. Dodge, a resident of the District of Columbia, remonstrating against the sewerage tax, so called, imposed by the District authorities, as unjust and unconstitutional, and asking relief from the same; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. SHERMAN presented a memorial of citizens of Ohio, remonstrating against the extension of the Wells patent for forming hatbodies; which was referred to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. BOREMAN presented a petition of citizens of West Virginia asking an appropriation in aid of the Little Kanawha improvement; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. PRATT. I present fifteen petitions, containing several hundred names, proceeding from citizens of the eighth and eleventh congressional districts of the State of Indiana, in which they pray Congress to take steps, as promptly as possible, in co-operation with other governments, for the settlement of international difficulties by arbitration and the formation of a high court of nations or such other pacific measures as the wisdom of Congress may suggest, for the settlement of international difficulties without a resort to arms. I move the reference of these petitions to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. OGLESBY presented the petition of A. Chester, praying payment for services as inspector of hospitals and pensions during the late war for which he has never received compensation; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. MORTON. I present a petition on behalf of the colored citizens of the Indian Territory residing in the Choctaw and Chickasaw Nations. It is on behalf of about seven thousand colored citizens of that Territory, representing that they are deprived of all political and of most civil rights under the government of that Territory. I regard the matter presented as very important, and think it properly belongs to the Committee on the Judiciary. I move, therefore, that it be referred to that committee.

Mr. BOREMAN. I wish to make a remark in regard to the memorial just presented by the Senator from Indiana, before it is referred. There is a bill before the Committee on Territories, which has for its object the establishment of a territorial government over these Indians, and it seems to me that it would be well that this subject should be taken into consideration in preparing that bill.

Mr. MORTON. I think the subject should be referred to that committee, and I ask leave to change my motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is to refer the petition to the Committee on Territories.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MORTON presented nineteen petitions of citizens of Indiana praying the establishment of a mail-route from Newcastle to Dunreith, Indiana; which were referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. FENTON. I present the petition of Samuel Strong, of this city, who states that he entered into an engagement to execute certain extensive improvements in this District, which work he faithfully performed. He says that the contracts provided for the payment of this work to be made in lawful money of the United States, which has not been done by the agents of the Government, or officers of this District; and he says that he has expended $250,000, and in return has received nothing but certificates of indebtedness, amounting on their face to the sum of $111,000, and which he received under protest. He concludes by asking that the matters and things pertaining to the work and improvements done by him under contract be referred to a committee for investigation. As there is a joint committee authorized, which has in charge matters of a similar character, I move the reference of this petition to that committee.

The petition was referred to the Joint Committee to Inquire into the Affairs of the District of Columbia.

PETITIONS ON THE FINANCIAL QUESTION.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I present a memorial of merchants and business men of New York. To remove from the public mind the representation that has been made, that they are entirely for a contraction of the currency, I present this petition, covering some 700 names; and in this connection I desire to read an extract from a letter accompanying the petition, that will give a little idea of the sentiment that is prevailing in that city and elsewhere:

> Until within a few weeks I have been of the opinion that nearly every one in this city was opposed to any more legal-tenders or bank currency. I inferred this from the fact that many of the bankers and importers had so petitioned Congress, and also because the public press have been steadily opposing any more money and molding public opinion as far as they could in that direction. More recently, however, I have had occasion to mingle with the dry-goods and other leading branches of trade, and I find that the heads of nearly every business concern are decidedly in favor of at least the forty-four millions and free banking. From my recent observations I am of the opinion that if any one would go to the trouble and expense of getting an expression of the people of this city they would find 60 to 90 per cent. of the prominent business men, as well as the populace, in favor of the petition we herewith send. The names of many thousands could be obtained to this petition here; it is only a question of time and work in the way of circulating it.

I had the honor, I think, on Tuesday last, of presenting a petition signed by 400 business men from the same city; and my attention has been called to an implication from one of the metropolitan press that the names of the persons were not genuinely represented. I may state that I have no knowledge of the persons or of their signatures, but from my judgment of them they are sufficiently characteristic to identify themselves; at least I leave it to the New York merchants and business men to vindicate their names and their identity as well as their integrity against the unwarrantable imputation to which I have referred. I say in that regard that that petition was voluntarily sent to me as well as the present one. Now, I will read some of the names on this, and I do it the more readily that the citizens themselves may take and settle the question of identity and integrity as between them and the press.

I present now the memorial of Francis Skiddy, Von Sacks & Co., Vatable & Son, E. H. Purdy & Co., J. M. & L. de Escorza, A. A. Selover, J. de Reviera & Co., Regnal & Co., Fernandez & Calbo, Badgley & Mead, E. Goodwin & Co., J. P. Croxson & Co., A. J. Aken & Co., and 694 others, business men of New York, praying that the volume of legal-tenders be fixed at $400,000,000, and for the passage of a free-banking law; and the names will appear for themselves and show whether they are genuine. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Who was the letter from?

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I am not called upon to give the name.

I also present the petition of T. W. Noble, G. B. Stebbins, William S. Armitage, and others, citizens of Wayne County, Michigan, praying for a full legal-tender currency instead of national-bank notes, to be interconvertible with 3.65 per cent. bonds, the interest and principal of the bonds to be payable in lawful money; and further, the petition of W. H. Hatch, F. A. Bellman, and 78 others, citizens of Saint Joseph County, Michigan, praying Congress for additional issues of greenbacks and a convertible bond bearing 3.65 per cent. interest; and also, the petition of Milo Harrington and 68 others, citizens of Gratiot County, Michigan, praying Congress to provide a full legal-tender currency declared equal with coin and interconvertible with Government bonds bearing interest at 3.65 per cent. I move that these petitions be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CONKLING. I present a memorial from merchants of the city of New York, members of the cotton exchange, signed by nearly every member of that association, declaring the belief that an additional issue of paper money would be injurious to the public interests, declaring also the belief that the country is now and has been for years suffering from an excess of paper money; and praying that measures be adopted such as will lead to the resumption of specie payments at the earliest time practicable. The reading just now of a letter from New York by the Senator from Michigan induces me to ask the Senate to hear a word from the letter of Grinnell, Minturn & Co., accompanying the petition in my hand:

> We have pleasure in sending you for presentation to the Senate the inclosed memorial from the New York Cotton Exchange, which has received the signature of almost every firm belonging to the cotton exchange.
> We see by the papers that some western Senators have presented memorials in favor of expansion, which memorials were presented as being signed by prominent merchants of this city. We have to assure you that, with ample means of knowledge, we do not believe that "any prominent merchants of this city"—
> Quoting apparently from some published statement—
> have signed a memorial in favor of expansion. The sentiment of the business men of this city, except stock operators, is almost without exception earnest in opposition to the various forms of inflation which are now proposed.
> Yours, respectfully,
> GRINNELL, MINTURN & CO.

Mr. President, in moving the reference of the petition to the Committee on Finance, I ask the Senate to indulge me for a few moments, a liberty I take with less scruple because I have been sparing in my demands on time during the debate which has been waged for weeks upon the subject of finance.

Since the subject was last discussed here—last with the exception of the speech made by my honorable friend from Illinois, [Mr. LOGAN,] which I had not the pleasure to hear, being absent—I have been to the State of New York, not to the city of New York alone, but into the interior, and there I met with many persons, discerning persons, not those representing special interests, but such as one might resort to for a general average of the sense of the community, and I beg the attention of the Senate to a single statement.

There is one financial position, and one need, in which all men agree, the expansionist, the contractionist, the democrat, the republican, the importer, the business man, the workingman, every constituent of society; and that is that the great duty and need of the hour is to see to it that whatever is to be done or omitted on this subject shall be at once. Everywhere the testimony is that the spring business is halting, in a large degree paralyzed, owing to the uncertainty in which the country is kept, owing to the fact that no man knows by what yard-stick he is to measure, by what volume of currency or standard of value he is to calculate; and the whole business community is waiting, until the spring business is threatened, and until it has already been greatly injured.

I need not say, Mr. President, I do not deem all this owing wholly to the inaction of Congress. I do, however, profoundly believe and deplore that a large part of it is due to the agitation without action in Congress, and I know that the general judgment is that in all the discussion that has been carried on, so varied and so protracted as it has been, members of this body must be instructed as largely and as well prepared as they can be by discourses or debate; and I wish to testify for the people in whose name I have the privilege to speak that the sentiment is universal that we owe it to ourselves and owe it to our duty to lose not a day nor an hour in making an end of this subject one way or the other. If we are to have expansion, let us have expansion; and let the business community know it. If we are to have anything looking toward contraction, let it be known at once. If we are to do nothing in respect to the finances, not even to determine the legal footing of the $44,000,000 reserve, let us say once for all that at this session of Congress, as to this body, no action will be taken. Any one of these results when fixed and known will be the signal for an advance; activity will start. Anything certain and done will be better than to keep every business man in the country dangling longer, like Mohammed's coffin, between heaven and earth, not able to foretell or guess what the action of Congress may be month after next, or what the effect of that action may be. I do not know what the understanding of the Senate was on Friday as to an early vote on this subject.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The finance bill was made the special order for to-day at one o'clock.

Mr. CONKLING. I beg to say, then, to the honorable Senator from Ohio, who has charge of the bill, [Mr. SHERMAN,] that he shall have my vote and effort always to hasten to an end.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The memorial will be referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am requested to present the memorial of the Importers' and Grocers' Board of Trade of the city of New York, in which they recite that the experience of this nation has been such as amply confirms the truth of the theories of the wisest statesmen and the soundest financiers of previous times, namely, that an irredeemable, and therefore unstable, paper currency works grievous injury to the material prosperity of a country, causing mercantile ventures, however wisely conceived and carefully executed, to partake of the nature of games of chance, thus repelling capital, repressing enterprise, and demoralizing labor, and is therefore among the greatest evils which can befall a commercial people; that the only excuse which ever was, or ever could have been, successfully urged for its infliction upon the people of the United States has long ago passed away, by reason of the return of the nation to the arts and avocations of peace; therefore, expressing their distrust of the wisdom of any action by Congress which tends to prolong unnecessarily the existence of such a currency for a single day, and regarding with serious apprehension and alarm any proposition, emanating from whatever source or upon whatever pretext, which contemplates a further issue of legal-tender notes at this juncture as a measure in utter disregard of the plainest principles of sound finance and fraught with great peril to the vast and varied interests involved, they express themselves in favor of a return to specie payments at the earliest practicable period, and say that, "as a step preliminary and indispensable thereto, it is essential that the Government take such steps as will establish a regular redemption of the national-bank currency, as contemplated by law, without further delay." I move the reference of the memorial to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. LOGAN. I present a petition signed by business men of New York City; and I will read some of the names, and ask my friend on the left [Mr. CONKLING] whether they are recognized as business men or not. This petition was sent to me this morning with a letter from William L. Strong & Co., a business firm of the city of New York, in the following language:

> Your petitioners beg leave respectfully to represent that the commercial and manufacturing interests of the country are paralyzed, owing to the uncertainty of the financial question now under consideration by your honorable body, and urge the necessity of immediate action.
> We respectfully recommend that the volume of legal-tenders be fixed at $400,000,000 and the passage of a free-banking law.

This is signed by Anthony & Hall, Wentworth & Co., Devlin & Co., W. Z. Pomeroy, B. W. Pierce, J. Frank & Co., W. L. Strong & Co., S. S. Fisher, Aborn, Moir & Co., Paine, Goodwin & Nowell, H. B. Claflin & Co., Dexter, Abbott & Co., O. E. Tyler, and 150 other signatures, that are certainly genuine, because they are all written in different handwritings, showing that they were certainly signed. I only know that this letter I have received says they are signed and are genuine, representing 150 business firms in the city of New York, such men as Claflin & Co., and others. I move the reference of this petition to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. LOGAN. I will also ask leave to make a remark in reference to the petitions that were presented before from New York, to which certain gentleman take exception because they were presented by western Senators. I presume those petitions were presented by western Senators because western Senators indorsed their views. I do not suppose that it is an objection that a petition should be presented by any particular Senator. My friend from New York this morning took a few moments to explain the necessity of action and to reprobate a further discussion. I certainly reprobate it as much as he does; but I will say in justification of myself, and I hope of others that agree with me as to the policy that should be adopted by the Senate and by Congress, that the discussion was not brought about by us first in the Senate Chamber. We have continued to reply to speeches here, and to make such arguments as we thought proper on our side of the question. We think we have a right to do it; and I will say further, however much it may be deprecated, and much as we may desire a vote of the Senate on these questions, and however much interest the people may have, we, as representatives, have just as much interest as any other representatives, and we will on every occasion, if we think we represent the sentiment of our constituents, until Congress adjourns, if these gentlemen wish to debate it, answer and reply to arguments in opposition to our theories.

Mr. CONKLING. I ask my friend to allow me to inquire of him whether he understood me in any way to criticise debate on either side?

Mr. LOGAN. Not at all. I only spoke of the deprecation of debate. I deprecate it, too.

Mr. CONKLING. I did not even do that. If I deprecated anything, it was the fact that so much time had elapsed without the question being settled one way or the other. I am quite sure I was careful not to say anything that could be understood or misunderstood as being a criticism on any Senator.

Mr. LOGAN. I only say in answer, that in the Senate the right of debate belongs to each and every Senator under the rules, and it is not necessary for it to be deprecated, because each side on such a question will take its own course in reference to debate.

I have a letter here, written by a gentleman by the name of Barrett, with whom I am acquainted, an honorable, high-minded gentleman of the city of Mount Vernon, in my State, a considerable little town in the interior, one of the places where the supreme court of Illinois holds its sessions; and in that letter he has sent to me various kinds of money, or representatives of it, that are in circulation in that town now, on account of there not being a supply of what we call real money for the people. Here is one of the notes by a railway company, [exhibiting a printed piece of paper:] "The Saint Louis and Southeastern Railway Company. Certificate of indebtedness, good for five dollars. Payable to H. W. Gardner, paymaster, or bearer," and signed J. B. Harris, cashier. Here is a five-dollar note of a railroad company, which is circulated there because there is no money. Further, I find tickets of this character sold through the country, [exhibiting a series of tickets.] They are tickets of railroads, representing so much money, made good for a trip; another one is "good for five cents." That is the character of circulation there in that part of the State, because of the want of currency.

I also find different merchants' certificates, good for so much in goods. "A. W. Plummer, Mount Vernon, Illinois, will pay five cents to bearer;" this is good for five cents. I also find "the Southeastern Railroad Company, Saint Louis Division," the railroad presided over by Janye Winslow—a good railroad, a through route; one that I know nothing against; but managed by an accommodating set of gentlemen issuing this kind of tickets, signed by Mr. Winslow: "No board will be allowed by this company unless on these tickets. This ticket is good for twenty-five cents. It must be returned at the end of the month to paymaster at Mount Vernon, Illinois." That is the way they are paying off their employés, in tickets of this kind, good for so much.

Further, I find another character of money in circulation there by the butchers. I have one before me, "Good for beef," one to the extent of ten cents, another to twenty-five cents, and so on from five dollars to five cents.

Those are the different kinds of money, if it may be so called, in circulation in that part of the country; and yet we are told that Illinois is not suffering for currency. That is the character of circulation we have in the interior, and you, gentlemen, say that we are misrepresenting the sentiments of the people of the country. Why, sir, it is so all over the interior of the Northwest. In my State this is the character of the circulating medium they have in the different towns for the lack of currency. What we want is the right to have banks.

A SENATOR. Does it not show that you want more fractional currency?

Mr. LOGAN. This is fractional enough, so far as that is concerned. If you think we want more fractional currency, this is fractional enough.

I merely present this in connection with the statement of the Senator from New York to show the difference between the position of the people in New York, where they have the greatest supply, the greatest number of banks, and the people in my country, where they have not a supply and where they have not banking facilities.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will remind Senators that this debate is being proceeded with by unanimous consent.

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly. I merely present this as a petition from Mr. Barrett with these facts as going to prove the statement in his letter. I do not care about referring them to the Finance Committee, because they are not in need of this quality of currency just at this time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented a memorial of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Montana in favor of improved facilities for transportation between the Yellowstone Valley and the town of Bismarck, in Dakota Territory; which was referred to the Select Committee on Transportation Routes to the Sea-board.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. ANTHONY. I am instructed by the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a motion to print two hundred copies for the use of the Department, of a letter of the Postmaster-General in answer to a resolution of the Senate asking for information relative to postal service between New York and Washington, and other places, to report it back and recommend its passage; and I ask for its present consideration.

The motion to print was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am directed by the Committee on Finance to report a bill, and give notice that to-morrow I will offer it as a substitute for the pending financial bill, which is now the special order. Perhaps the bill I send up had better be read and printed.

The bill (S. No. 617) to provide for the redemption and reissue of United States notes, and for free banking, was read the first time at length.

Mr. DAVIS. That is a very important bill. I should like to have it directed to be printed as early as possible and laid on the desks promptly, as the subject will be under consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be printed, of course.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is due to the members of the Committee on Finance that I should say that the bill which I have just reported, as it appears on its face, is in the nature of a compromise measure, which is more or less acceptable all around, but at the same time there are certain features of the bill which members of the Committee on Finance will feel at liberty to express their opposition to, and also to propose amendments to. It is due to them that I should make this statement. The bill itself, as appears on its face, is the result of great labor, long consideration, and the consequence of compromise. In many cases we were not able, however, to reconcile conflicting opinions; and on those points of course members of the committee will feel themselves at liberty to oppose certain features of the bill.

Mr. THURMAN. I should like to inquire of my colleague whether he proposes to-day or to-morrow, when he makes the motion that he indicated, to state what in the opinion of the committee reporting this bill will be its practical effect, so that we may have the views of the committee as to the workings of the bill should it become a law. I am sure I, for one, should like very much to know what the committee who have devoted so much time to this subject think will be the practical working of the measure, at any time that it suits the convenience of the chairman of the committee to make such statement.

Mr. SHERMAN. When the subject is introduced, if it be convenient, to-morrow, I propose to make a very brief statement of the effect of each section, as we understand it; but I do not intend by any long speeches or any remarks to prolong this matter unnecessarily. I have expressed my own individual views, and each member of the committee, I suppose, stands to the opinions expressed by him in the speeches he has made in the Senate—speeches that were carefully considered, and by which the position of each Senator was stated; but undoubtedly I shall feel it my duty when the bill is called up to state what I regard as the actual practical effect of these different propositions; and some of them, I will now say, I assented to with great reluctance.

Mr. CONKLING, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom were referred various petitions from citizens of the United States, praying for a repeal of the bankrupt law, asked to be discharged from their further consideration; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom were referred the bill (S. No. 10) to repeal the act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States;" the bill (S. No. 12) to repeal the sections in the bankrupt law of 1867, and acts amendatory thereof, which provide for involuntary bankruptcy; the bill (S. No. 78) supplementary to the act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States," approved March 2, 1867; and the bill (S. No. 86) to amend the act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States," asked to be discharged from their further consideration; which was agreed to, the Senate having already acted on the subject-matter.

Mr. BOREMAN, from the Committee on Territories, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 44) to establish the Territory of Pembina, and to provide a temporary government therefor, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 488) authorizing the First National Bank of Indianola, Iowa, to change its location and name, reported adversely thereon, and moved its indefinite postponement; which was agreed to.

He also, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Benjamin D. Lakin, praying the repayment of $1,000 paid by him for a substitute, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the committee was discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

Mr. BOGY, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 441) enabling claimants to lands within the limits of the Territory of New Mexico to institute proceedings to try the validity of their claims, reported it with amendments.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 294) for the relief of Joab Bagley, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. THURMAN. I wish to give notice that as soon as the currency question has been disposed of, I will ask the Senate, or the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. BOGY] will, to take up the bill first reported by him this morning. It is a bill of the greatest importance to three of the Territories. It is a bill providing for settling their disputed land claims—claims that I undertake to say ought to have been settled, if this Government had done its duty, the most of them twenty years ago; and now the settlement of these Territories and their prosperity are most materially retarded by the unsettled nature of their land titles, to settle which is the object of the bill. I hope the Senate will, after the financial measure is disposed of, consent to take up that bill and act upon it. It is a bill that will not perhaps occupy more than an hour or two hours in its consideration, perhaps not half that long.

Mr. WADLEIGH, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of James V. Boughner, of West Virginia, praying confirmation of title to certain lands, and the issue of a patent therefor, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Public Lands; which was agreed to.

SCHOONER CARRIE.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to take from the table a bill which will occupy but a moment, and there is a special reason why I desire it acted on at the present moment. It is the bill (H. R. No. 485) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to issue an American register to the schooner Carrie, of Eastport, Maine.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to grant and issue an American register to the schooner Carrie, now owned in Eastport, Maine, under such name as the owners may select.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REMOVAL OF INDIANS FROM MEXICO.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. The Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 212) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to use, for the removal of the Kickapoos and other Indians on the borders of Texas and Mexico to the Indian Territory, and for their support after such removal, the unexpended balance of appropriations made for the above purpose by acts approved July 15, 1870, and March 3, 1871, have instructed me to report it back without amendment, and to ask for its present consideration.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to use, for the removal of the Kickapoos, or other Indians, from the borders of Texas and Mexico to the Indian Territory, and for their support and subsistence after such removal, the unexpended balance of appropriations made by the acts approved July 15, 1870, and March 3, 1871, (Statutes, volume 16, pages 359 and 569,) for such removal and subsistence.

Mr. SARGENT. How much is the unexpended balance of appropriation?

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. Fifty thousand and some dollars.

Mr. SARGENT. How much was the total amount appropriated originally?

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. Sixty-five thousand dollars was appropriated originally.

Mr. SARGENT. And the Department have used $15,000?

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. Between $14,000 and $15,000.

Mr. SARGENT. How many Indians have been removed?

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. Three hundred.

Mr. SARGENT. How many are to be removed?

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. About three hundred.

Mr. SARGENT. It cost the lesser amount to remove the first three hundred, and it will cost the larger amount to remove the last three hundred?

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. I cannot say as to that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. SARGENT. I do not wish to object to this bill; but I wish to remark that I think there is danger that these things slip through without sufficient examination. I have great confidence in the discretion of my friend, the Senator from Connecticut, but I should like to inquire if this bill has been specifically examined by the Indian Committee.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. It has been by the Committee on Indian Affairs. I will state in one moment the object of it. An appropriation was made, in the first place, of $25,000 for the removal of these Indians, and a year afterward another appropriation was made authorizing the use of $40,000; and a commission was appointed to remove the Indians. A great many things obstructed its execution, and there was great delay in removing them. They were not removed until last summer; but when they were, the officers had expended between fourteen and fifteen thousand dollars. The balance has not been used, simply because the Comptroller of the Treasury determined that, according to the construction of the law, these appropriations were covered into the Treasury on the 30th of June last, whereas the expense of removing these Indians had been contracted for previous to that time and the process of removal was going on. This is to reappropriate the balance for service and work already performed in the removal of these Indians. They are suffering and have been ever since they have been on the reservation, simply because the Government cannot use this fund. I think I have stated the case as it exists.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. RAMSEY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 618) granting land to the State of Minnesota for the purpose of endowing an astronomical observatory and a school of mines; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WEST asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 619) providing for the removal of certain obstructions in Red River, near Alexandria, Louisiana; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. WADLEIGH asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 620) authorizing the extension of the patent granted to John Haseltine for a new and useful water-wheel; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. MITCHELL (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 621) to incorporate the Citizens' Mutual Gas-Light Company of Washington City, in the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

EXTENSION OF MORNING HOUR.

Mr. STEWART. I submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Revision of the Rules be instructed to inquire and report as to the expediency of so amending the rules as to extend the morning hour until half-past one o'clock p. m. each day, and that during such morning hour no debate shall be in order on any subject not regularly before the Senate.

Mr. President, the rule that we have adopted for considering unobjected bills, when we come to them, operates very well. It allows the ordinary business to be disposed of without wasting time in useless discussion; and the morning hour is the only time when we can expect to have a full Senate for the disposition of business of that kind. If we could have half an hour more, and devote ourselves to regular morning business, there would be no necessity for wasting time in struggles to get up bills to which nobody has objection. I hope the Committee on Rules will take the matter into consideration.

Mr. BAYARD. Is it proposed to refer that matter to the Committee on Rules?

Mr. STEWART. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution instructs the committee to inquire into and report upon the subject.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired, the Senate proceeds to the consideration of the special order for this hour, which is the bill (S. No. 432) to amend the act entitled "An act to provide for the redemption of the 3 per cent. temporary-loan certificates and for an increase of national-bank notes," approved July 12, 1870.

Mr. WEST. It being the intention of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] to address the Senate on the bill just announced from the Chair, by his permission I will ask the Senate to take up House bill No. 2451, which was reported by the Committee on Commerce on Thursday last.

Mr. SHERMAN. Unless it is a very pressing case, the Senator must see that I am under a pledge to insist on the special order.

Mr. WEST. I think the Senator will see that this is a pressing bill when he hears it read. It is a bill to improve the mouth of the Mississippi River.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am told it will lead to debate, and therefore I must object to taking it up now.

Mr. WEST. This is a bill that I do not think one objection will carry over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Louisiana can move to postpone the pending order. Does he make that motion?

Mr. WEST. I will not do that without the consent of the Senator from Ohio who has charge of the question before the Senate.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am in favor of the bill myself, but I am told it will give rise to discussion.

Mr. WEST. I doubt if it will lead to debate. The commerce of the Mississippi River is paralyzed at the present moment for lack of the means provided in this bill; and a brief explanation will satisfy almost any Senator here that there is an immediate necessity for its passage. It has passed the House of Representatives, and now lies on our table, having been reported favorably by the Committee on Commerce last Thursday.

Mr. STEVENSON. I ask for the reading of the bill. I do not know what it is.

The Chief Clerk read the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. SHERMAN. I object, after the speeches that have been made here insisting that we should go on with the financial debate. I am sorry that my friend's particular bill stands in the way, but he can call it up to-morrow. If he had called it up awhile ago he could have had it passed ere now, perhaps.

Mr. WEST. I shall appeal to the Senate in this case. This bill came up in the morning hour on Thursday. It was objected to by one Senator, and it went over. The Senate will bear me witness that it is rarely that I intrude upon their good nature in asking them to take up any bill out of order. I do not do it now, as a Senator particularly from Louisiana; nor do I do it as a representative of the chief commercial city of the South; but I do it in the interest of the great commerce of the West, which is at the present time retarded by the want of this money. You have before you the reports of the Chief of Engineers of the Army and of the engineer in charge of this work; and I have a telegram, dated no later than Saturday, stating that the whole commerce of the West is paralyzed for the immediate want of this money. I move, therefore—we can discuss the merits of the bill subsequently when we take it up—that all pending orders be laid aside informally, and that this bill be now considered.

Mr. DAVIS. I do not object to the present consideration of the bill, but it involves an appropriation in addition to that already made for the present year. It is a deficiency bill, in other words. I wish to have some explanation of it before I can consent to act on it.

Mr. STOCKTON. I trust this bill will not be taken up now. I know it will lead to discussion; I know that any appropriation for the mouth of the Mississippi River, to be expended under the present authorities, will need a good deal of explanation before it can pass Congress. The Senate will recollect that but a very short time ago the same Senator from Louisiana brought up a bill to put the charge of the mouth of the Mississippi River in the hands of the Secretary of War. I knew nothing about the appropriation for the Mississippi River at all. I had never before paid any attention to it, but believing that it was unwise as a precedent, and having no other motive whatever, I opposed it, and urged the Senate to delay the passage of the bill. I begged the Senate not to take up out of order, in a hurry, without consideration, the grave proposition to turn over the control of the mouth of the Mississippi River from the courts and give it to the Secretary of War.

On the passage of that bill the yeas and nays were called, and there were but few Senators voting with me. That bill is in the House, as I understand, now, still unpassed; and since that time, gentlemen of high character—gentlemen known to many Senators around me—have shown me papers from New Orleans and from Louisiana, purporting to be the protest of large numbers of persons there—I think of one of their chambers of commerce, but I will not be sure about that—against the passage of that bill; and it has been alleged and asserted that all the money which has been spent for years past at the mouth of the Mississippi has been thrown away; that the engineers have been mistaken in their views. And now, not on an appropriation bill, not on a deficiency bill, but again out of order, we are to go to work to appropriate $30,000 without examining into the fact whether the money already appropriated has done any good or not, and without that bill going to the Committee on Appropriations, without coming as it should do through the proper channel to us.

Mr. President, it does seem to me that this extraordinary legislation about the mouth of the Mississippi River requires a little examination. I do not believe, from all the information I have—and I have received it all since the passage of that other bill in the Senate—that the money has been wisely expended or done any good. I believe the best thing we can do for the mouth of the Mississippi River at present is to stop these appropriations, and send proper engineers down there to find out what is the best thing to be done, and whether the money is being wisely expended.

As I stated when the other bill was before the Senate, I will assist the Senator from Louisiana or any other Senator with all my heart in any appropriation that I believe will benefit the mouth of that river and its navigation, for it is one of the most important channels of water communication that we have in the whole country. But we run great risks in taking up out of order bills of this character and passing them when they come up by the general consent of the Senate. That that Senator himself believes that this is important, believes that it is wise, of course I do not doubt; but my information is entirely to the contrary, and I am satisfied that we should not pass any appropriation until the report of the engineer on that subject for the last year, and the expenditures for last year have been thoroughly examined.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President, on the Senator's table, or he can get it by resorting to the document-room, he will find Executive Document No. 113. But before I proceed on that topic I will remind him that this bill that he refers to as not having been acted upon by any committee has absolutely been reported unanimously to this body by the committee which is intrusted with bills of this character.

Mr. STOCKTON. I beg the Senator's pardon. I think I did not say it had not been acted upon by any committee, but not acted upon by the committee who have charge of the appropriation bills for rivers and harbors. I presume, of course, it came from a committee.

Mr. WEST. I beg the Senator's pardon in return. It has been acted upon unanimously by that very committee, the Committee on Commerce. Now, sir, here is a deficiency——

Mr. STOCKTON. I should like to ask the Senator why it comes here as a special bill rather than comes in in the ordinary course, in a bill which the regular committee report yearly, the general appropriation bill for rivers and harbors?

Mr. WEST. The Chief of Engineers of the Army, under date of February 17, 1874, reports to the Secretary of War as follows:

I beg leave to submit the inclosed copy of a letter of the 14th instant, just received at this office from Captain C. W. Howell, Corps of Engineers, in relation to the necessity that will arise for the suspension of work of improvement at the mouth of the Mississippi River in consequence of the exhaustion of the funds appropriated for that purpose.

We last year appropriated $125,000 for the excavation of the Mississippi River. With what result, owing to the operation of the tow-boat monopoly which is referred to in the following words by the engineer in charge of the work:

That the appropriation has proved insufficient for this year's work is due to the blockade of last March, making necessary the working of two dredges instead of one for nearly four months.

The Chief of Engineers also reports that from experience——

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask the Chair if this is in order? We are now acting under a special order by direction of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. But the Senator from Louisiana has made a motion to postpone the financial bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. But the Senator is now discussing his bill, and reading the report of the Chief of Engineers.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Louisiana is in order. The special order being the finance bill, and that Senator having moved to postpone it, that motion opens up the whole merits; and the Chair must suppose that the Senator from Louisiana is now discussing the finance bill; and therefore he is in order.

Mr. SHERMAN. Very well; then the Senator from Louisiana shall take the responsibility. I simply submit that, when the question of taking up his bill is in order, he shall be confined to that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is not the motion, the Chair will inform the Senator. The motion is to postpone, which opens the merits of the bill to be postponed, and upon which the Chair is bound to suppose the Senator from Louisiana is now speaking.

Mr. SHERMAN. If, after the unanimous consent of the Senate making the financial bill the special order, the Senator from Louisiana can go on in this way, be it so. I only call the attention of the Senate to it.

Mr. WEST. Whence the urgency immediately to resume the discussion of the financial bill? If I have not made a speech on the financial bill, I think this ought to be my opportunity. The truth is that all that is wanted by the Senate is a moment's consideration to this question, and they would act upon it at once. I feel it incumbent upon me, representing that section of country, to press it upon the consideration of the Senate, and I believe we can get a vote upon it at once. I will not discuss the matter any more, but I ask for a vote on my motion; and I assure the Senator that when the special order is postponed, five minutes will enable us to vote on this question, and if you do not act on it to-day you have but fourteen and a half feet at the mouth of the Mississippi River, as I learn by a telegram from the engineer in charge.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Louisiana moves to postpone the present and all prior orders, and proceed to the consideration of the bill indicated by him.

The motion was not agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested:

A bill (H. R. No. 2103) giving the approval and sanction of Congress to the route and termini of the Anacostia and Potomac River Railroad, and to regulate its construction and operation; and

A bill (H. R. No. 2550) making an appropriation for the payment of teachers in the public schools in the District of Columbia, and providing for the levy of a tax to reimburse the same.

The message also announced that the House had passed the bill (S. No. 583) making an appropriation to defray the expenses of the Joint Select Committee to Inquire into the Affairs of the District of Columbia.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bill; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (H. R. No. 2422) to approve an act of the Legislative Assembly of the District of Columbia relating to parishes of the Protestant Episcopal Church.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. L. P. LUCKEY, his Private Secretary, announced that the President had on the 21st instant approved and signed the act (S. No. 302) for the relief of Dr. Edward Jarvis, and the act (S. No. 360) making an appropriation for a topographical survey of the Capitol grounds and plans for improving the same.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, transmitting the report of the report of the board of commissioners on the irrigation of the San Joaquin, Tulare, and Sacramento Valleys, in the State of California, with the original accompanying maps; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 1398) to fix the amount of legal-tender notes at $400,000,000; and

A bill (H. R. No. 2649) amending an act in relation to enforcing attendance of witnesses before committees of either House of Congress, approved January 24, 1862.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia:

A bill (H. R. No. 2103) giving the approval and sanction of Congress to the route and termini of the Anacostia and Potomac River Railroad, and to regulate its construction and operation; and

A bill (H. R. No. 2550) making an appropriation for the payment of teachers in the public schools in the District of Columbia, and providing for the levy of a tax to reimburse the same.

The bill (H. R. No. 1398) to fix the amount of legal-tender notes at $400,000,000 was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

The bill (H. R. No. 2649) amending an act in relation to enforcing attendance of witnesses before committees of either House of Congress, approved January 24, 1862, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

NATIONAL-BANK CIRCULATION.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 432) to amend the act entitled "An act to provide for the redemption of the 3 per cent. temporary-loan certificates and for an increase of national-bank notes," approved July 12, 1870, the pending question being the motion of Mr. BUCKINGHAM to refer the bill to the Committee on Finance with the instructions adopted on motion of Mr. MERRIMON.

THE CURRENCY.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, opinions on finance in the Senate may be divided into three general classes: first, those in favor of taking immediate steps for the resumption of specie payments; secondly, those who are in favor of doing nothing; and, thirdly, those who believe that the country is not now in a condition to return to specie payments; that there should be some increase in the volume of the currency to meet the increase of population and business; that the facilities and benefits of the national banking system should be extended to all the States alike, thus relieving it of its present sectional character; and that the restriction upon the amount of national-bank circulation should be removed to relieve it of its monopoly feature.

These general classes of opinions have numerous subdivisions, and among the last are those who, while opposed to what is called free banking, are yet in favor of such enlargement of the national-bank circulation as to give to the States of the West and South what their local necessities demand.

DREAD OF CONTRACTION.

We are told that business is everywhere waiting for the action of Congress. This is undoubtedly true; but business is not waiting for fear there will be free banking or more currency. Men are not deterred from embarking in new enterprises or carrying on their regular business by apprehensions that money will be plentier. Business is everywhere waiting because of apprehensions that the currency will be contracted, attended with a general decline of prices and hard times; that there will be forced resumption of specie payments, endangering the solvency of every man who is now in debt, or contracts new obligations. Threats of contraction and resumption have been uttered in this Chamber every day for months which hang over the business of the country like suspended swords. The obstructionists are those who denounced from day to day our "swindling, depreciated, inflated currency," a currency that stood the ordeal of the panic and came forth with increased credit; though it remains to be seen whether it can stand the continued assaults that are made upon it in Congress. If the people still retain confidence in it, and their fears do not swell into a panic, it will be because the statements that are daily made upon this floor are discredited, and because the good sense of the country turns back the muddy tide of financial sophistry.

Every proposition in regard to the national finances which leaves out of view the actual condition of the country is delusive and mischievous. Every legislator who prescribes a remedy for our financial ills in accordance with a favorite theory, regardless of the national situation and the relation it bears to other countries is as absurd as the physician who should prescribe without having ascertained the disease or condition of the patient.

WHERE IS THE GOLD TO RESUME WITH?

It is incumbent upon those who insist upon the speedy resumption of specie payments to show how it can be done. Failing to do that, their suggestions are as idle as the aspirations of the man who would fly to the moon, but knows not how. Few will contend that specie payments can be successfully established and maintained with less than four hundred millions of coin in the country. The highest estimate of the amount in the country now does not exceed one hundred and fifty millions, and the question how the other two hundred and fifty millions are to be obtained has not been answered by anybody. When Peter the Great was told what could be accomplished with a powerful navy, he stopped the proposer short, and said, "But how am I to get the navy?"

The first thing for those who are urgently pressing immediate resumption is to show how we can get the gold with which to resume. Vague declamation about the beauties of resumption is like the notes of the mocking-bird, which please only by their delusions.

We have told the people of the South for years that they must accept the situation. Let us try to practice what we preach. We, too, must accept the situation. The existence of our immense debt is a fact as inexorable as the abolition of slavery. That, beside individual indebtedness, we owe in various forms more than thirteen hundred millions abroad, and that the balance of trade runs against us heavily every year, are inexorable facts. A new system of currency, the loss of the greater part of our gold, and new financial and commercial relations with Europe, are a part of the consequences of the war; and the statesman who shuts his eyes to them is no wiser than the blind man who dashes his head against a stone wall.

GENERAL PROSTRATION.

The apparent abundance of money at New York and other financial centers is only evidence that enterprise is arrested, and speculation dead. Instead of the effect of the panic having passed away, it is now in its second stage. Trade goes on in its ordinary channels, because people must be clothed and fed; but nearly all that constitutes growth, development, extension, is stricken by paralysis. The body of enterprise lies prostrate. One school of physicians say, "Let the patient alone and he will get well in two or three years; let nature do the work." Another say, "Bleed him, reduce the circulation; the system must be depleted before he can recover." Another say, "Stimulate the patient, give him tonics, attempt to arouse his energies; infuse into his veins warm, fresh blood, and get him up on his feet again as soon as possible." These physicians have been in consultation now going on four months, and have agreed upon nothing; the principal obstructionists being that school which may be described as the "Sangrados" of finance, who believe in nothing but depletion and salivation, and that the patient must be worse before he can be better. They regard specie payment as the object and end of financial systems, and believe it cannot be established on the present volume of currency, and that there must be contraction. The men who believe there is money enough in the country to meet the demands of business when it is healthy and robust, because there is a plethora in the banks of New York now, are as logical as those who should argue that there is plenty of food in the land, because that which is placed before a sick man remains untasted.

The refusal upon the part of unconditional resumptionists to consider the condition of the country, and those broad differences which distinguish it from the old countries of Europe, and who insist that all times are alike, and that what can be done in one country can be done in another, remind us of the story of the man who resolved to shear the wolf. "Have you considered the danger of the enterprise and its unprofitable character?" he was asked. "No," said he, "I have considered nothing but the right."

FOUR HUNDRED MILLIONS OF GREENBACKS NEEDED.

There is much complaint against the Secretary of the Treasury for the issue of twenty-seven millions of the so-called forty-four million reserve of greenbacks. In a recent memorial, signed by many bankers, brokers, and merchants of New York, it was declared that this issue was in violation of the law, which was assuming the very point disputed by the Secretary. But there is a doubt in the public mind touching the legality of this issue, which ought to be removed; and I am of the opinion that Congress ought to declare the issue legal up to the aggregate amount of four hundred millions. The increase of the circulation to meet the demands of increasing business, wealth, and population, is not inflation in any reasonable sense. You might as well talk about inflating the population of the country.

If the volume of the currency was not too large in 1870, it must be too small now, if from no other cause, from the increase of population and business. In his annual message, in December, the President makes this statement:

In view of the great actual contraction that has taken place in the currency, and the comparative contraction continuously going on, due to the increase of population, increase of manufactories, and all the industries, I do not believe there is too much of it now for the dullest period of the year. Indeed, if clearing-houses should be established, thus forcing redemption, it is a question for your consideration whether banking should not be made free, retaining all the safeguards now required to secure billholders.

In any modification of the present laws regulating national banks, as a further step toward preparing for resumption of specie payments, I invite your attention to a consideration of the propriety of exacting from them the retention, as a part of their reserve, either the whole or a part of the gold interest accruing upon the bonds pledged as security for their issue.

I have not reflected enough on the bearing this might have in producing a scarcity of coin with which to pay duties on imports to give it my positive recommendation. But your attention is invited to the subject.

During the last four years the currency has been contracted, directly, by the withdrawal of 3 per cent. certificates, compound-interest notes, and seven-thirty bonds, outstanding on the 4th of March, 1869, (all of which took the place of legal-tenders in the bank reserves,) to the exent of $63,000,000.

During the same period there has been a much larger comparative contraction of the currency. The population of the country has largely increased. More than twenty-five thousand miles of railroad have been built, requiring the active use of capital to operate them. Millions of acres of land have been opened, requiring capital to move the products. Manufactories have multiplied beyond all precedent in the same period of time, requiring capital weekly for the payment of wages and for the purchase of material; and probably the largest of all comparative contraction arises from the organizing of free labor in the South. Now every laborer there receives his wages, and for want of savings-banks the greater part of such wages is carried in the pocket, or hoarded until required for use.

Suppose, if you please, that the population in 1870 was thirty-nine millions, and the volume of currency just adequate to their wants; and that in 1875 the population had increased to forty-four millions, and wealth and business in a still greater ratio, will any man in his senses deny that there should be also an increase of the currency?

CURRENCY SHOULD GROW WITH THE COUNTRY.

When the business of the country has outgrown the volume of currency, the effect is the same as contraction. The volume of the currency not being sufficient to transact the business of the country at the prevailing prices of property and labor, embarrassment and obstruction are the result, and all prices are gradually reduced, so that a given amount of currency will pay for more property and labor. A scarcity of money always produces a reduction of prices. When the business of the country is done with a volume of currency relatively diminishing, to bring it within the capacity of that currency, prices must diminish. Experience shows that such a diminution of prices produces a diminution of business and enterprise, and invariably checks the growth and progress of the country; and such a period is always known as "hard times."

The policy of "masterly inactivity," as advocated by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL,] is but contraction in the other direction. The process is slow but inevitable, and is illustrated by the legend of the iron shroud in which the living youth was placed, which, by his continued growth, produced pressure, agony, and death. If the dictates of common sense be applicable to the subject of currency, of which the arguments of some Senators here might lead us to doubt, we must conclude that, as currency is the instrument of business, it should increase with business; that the people were not made for the currency, but the currency for the people. A law requiring that the man should have no more food than the child would be considered absurd, tyrannical, and destructive; and yet not more so than that which declares that the volume of currency, once fixed, shall not be enlarged as the nation grows and prospers.

FREE BANKING.

I ask such increase of the currency as free banking will give. That will be governed by the law of supply and demand, and it is the only way in which what is called an elastic currency can be obtained. Not only should banking be free, but increased facilities should be afforded to banks to retire from business when they cease to be profitable, and are in excess of the wants of the country.

The establishment of national banks effected a total change in our financial system. The State-bank system had always been a burden to the country, and in the presence of war failed entirely. The notes of the State banks generally, having only a local circulation and credit, could not be received by the Government for taxes or used in payment of the Army or purchase of supplies. The object in the establishment of national banks was threefold: to furnish a currency of uniform and unquestioned value, to create a market for Government bonds, and to establish fiscal agents in every part of the United States. The State banks were taxed out of existence to make room for them, and when the United States thus took possession of the whole field of banking it was a plain and imperative obligation to adjust the system to the necessities and conditions of every part of the country, and to readjust it from time to time, according to the growth of population and business. The States were no longer at liberty to provide for themselves, and it was the duty of the Government to divide the benefits of the new system among them equitably, and make it coextensive with their wants.

ITS UNEQUAL DISTRIBUTION.

In the original act the whole amount of notes authorized by law was limited to three hundred millions; and it was provided that it should be distributed among the several States upon the following basis: one hundred and fifty millions according to the representative population, and the remainder to be apportioned by the Secretary of the Treasury, having due regard to the existing banking capital, resources, and business of each State. It was intended that the amount apportioned to each State should stand to its credit, to be taken by the citizens thereof when they were able or it suited their convenience to do so. By the table of apportionment prepared by the Secretary of the Treasury, the six New England States were entitled to less than forty millions, but, in violation of law, received one hundred and ten millions, being an excess of nearly seventy-one millions. Other Eastern States received in excess of their apportionment about ten millions. The result was, of course, that the Western and Southern States were left in deficiency.

By the act of 1870 fifty-four millions of additional circulation were authorized to be distributed among the States in deficiency. But, as shown by the report of the Comptroller of the Currency, it still required forty millions to equalize the distribution upon the basis of the act of 1865; and when we consider the rapid growth and development of the States of the Northwest, it is obvious that it would now require at least twenty millions more to effect that object. When the original limit of three hundred millions was fixed to the national-bank circulation the system was an experiment, and there were large amounts of compound-interest notes, and other forms of public indebtedness, which were used as currency, and which have now been retired. The system is now an established success, and it is manifest that no arbitrary apportionment of a fixed amount of circulation can be made to meet the wants and conditions of different parts of the country; and that the number and locality of national banks should be governed by the law of demand, as is every other kind of business.

ITS BLEMISHES.

I am a friend of the national-banking system, believing it the best the country has ever had, and wish to relieve it of a blemish which is fast making it unpopular, and if continued will make it odious. This is its monopoly feature, and those who seek to preserve this feature are the worst enemies of the system. Even if the national-banking facilities had been divided among the States according to the provisions of the law, it would be a monopoly. But when the law was violated, and a few States seized upon the greater part, almost to the exclusion, and to the great detriment of others, there is added to the monopoly an injustice which it is the part of wisdom in the friends of the banks to abolish as soon as possible.

National banking, of itself, is a profitable business, and the people of one section of the country have as much right to enjoy it as those of another. And their exclusion from it cannot be distinguished from a prohibition to embark in manufactures or any other branch of trade.

The volume of currency should not be fixed by law, but determined solely by the demand. As it is the medium and instrument of business, the volume of it should not be fixed unless you can fix the volume of business. Men will not engage in national banking unless it is profitable; and it will not be profitable unless there is a demand for its currency, and for banks as a place of deposit, and for those facilities which banks create.

WHAT IS INFLATION?

The word "inflation" has been confused in this debate with "depreciation." To inflate the currency is to increase the amount in circulation beyond the wants of business, whether it consist of gold and silver or paper money. The effects of "inflation" are the same, whether made by one kind of currency or the other. The currency of Germany has of late been greatly inflated by the acquisition of vast quantities of gold from France, just as that of Spain was, at one time, by silver from Mexico. Where the currency is increased arbitrarily, as in Germany by the accident of war, it enhances prices and produces derangement and disaster; but where it is in obedience to the demands of business, it produces no such results; and its effects are healthy and beneficial. Should the Government suddenly put into circulation one hundred millions of greenbacks, the act would be arbitrary, and the amount might exceed the demands of business and produce evil results. But were banking made free it is certain that new banks would not be established except to meet local wants and demands which could alone make them profitable. To talk about the currency being inflated by free banking is to ignore the laws of business and trade. There would be quite as much propriety in talking about the country being inflated with cotton-mills, grist-mills, and iron-furnaces, because there is no law limiting or restraining the number of such establishments, or the amount of capital they may employ. Banks and cotton-mills differ in their nature; but the motive that inspires the establishment of each is the same, profit; and the cause which will make each profitable is the same, demand.

THE PANIC.

Some time ago I showed from history that the great remedy for panics, as practiced in England and on the Continent for one hundred and fifty years, had been by the increase of paper currency. When the recent panic occurred in New York, there was immediately a universal demand for more paper currency. The President was besought by dispatches, letters, and deputations to put into circulation all the surplus currency in the Treasury, and to issue the forty-four million reserve, by the purchase of bonds. I happened in New York on the Sunday after the panic, and saw the crowds of bankers, brokers, capitalists, merchants, manufacturers, and railroad men who throughout that day thronged the halls, corridors, and parlors of the Fifth Avenue Hotel, beseeching the President to increase the currency by every means in his power, and declaring that unless the Government came to the rescue nothing could save the country from bankruptcy and ruin. Meetings were organized in the parlors, resolutions passed, and committees appointed to urge the President to increase the volume of currency, even by loaning greenbacks from the Treasury to the banks upon the deposit of bonds as security. The next day the banks declined to pay their depositors except in very small sums, issued certified checks to the amount of millions, which passed as currency; and the associated banks issued certificates to the amount of some twenty-six millions, which were used as money at the clearing-house and passed as currency on the streets. The President put into circulation some fifteen millions by the purchase of bonds, and gold declined to 6½ per cent. premium because there was no demand for it; and the things that everybody wanted and had confidence in were bonds, greenbacks, and national-bank notes.

IMPROVEMENTS IN PAPER MONEY.

Great improvements have been made in paper money since its first introduction, and our currency is as much superior to that issued by the banks of John Law, by the Congress of the Confederation, the wild-cat banks of Michigan, or the assignats of France, as gold coin is to the iron money of Sparta, or the cowries of Central Africa. And yet it is from the history of these old and imperfect forms of paper money that the chief arguments are drawn against our currency. There would be quite as much sense in arguing against the safe and splendid steamship that crosses the Atlantic in eight days, because of the weakness and imperfections of the flat-boats that first floated down the Mississippi River. The invention of the bill of exchange, it has been said, did more to develop trade and commerce than the discovery of steam as a motive-power; and the invention of a system of banking in which the bills were secured by bonds of unquestioned value was another great step in the improvement of paper money, and bringing it to that degree of perfection, and giving to it that safety and uniformity of value, which command the confidence of the country, and enable it to perform all the substantial offices of a medium of exchange. When we compare our paper currency with the old systems of banking, and with the issues by the governments of other countries, we find that it has undergone as much improvement within eighty years as has the steam-engine, and the end is not yet.

The main arguments now urged against paper money are drawn from the abuses of it under former and more imperfect systems; and such progress has it made in the judgment and confidence of mankind that political economists admit that the evils of paper money do not arise from its intrinsic defects but from its liability to abuse; and that, if it can be guarded from abuses, it may be made to constitute the most perfect system of currency in the world. Adam Smith said the substitution of paper money in the room of gold and silver money replaces a very expensive instrument of commerce with one much less costly and sometimes equally convenient. Ricardo said money in its most perfect state is paper money. McCulloch asserts that, if there were perfect security that the power of issuing paper money would not be abused, that is, if there were perfect security for its being issued in such quantities as to preserve its value relatively to the amount of circulating commodities nearly equal, the precious metals might be entirely dispensed with.

EVEN GOLD HAS ITS DRAWBACKS.

When our currency has a gold basis, that is, becomes convertible into gold, it is made subject to all the perturbations in gold in every part of the world. A scarcity of gold in England, Germany, or France, from any cause, a panic or other great disturbance, would make a draft upon our supply and threaten the stability of our banks and finances. A short crop at home or a large crop abroad would diminish our exports and make a transfer of gold necessary to pay off the balance against us. We thus make our currency dependent upon a metal of which other nations have a larger supply, and, owing no debt abroad, can better keep what they have; and owning largely the debts of other nations are annually supplied with gold in payment of interest as well as by their large commerce. In such case we meet other nations upon unequal terms, and place our home industry, business, and prosperity upon a foundation which it is in their power, by will or accident, to withdraw. These considerations should admonish us not to attempt the work of resumption until such time as the condition of the country and the whole financial situation give reasonable assurance that it can be accomplished without great sacrifice and maintained without perpetual danger of revulsion and disaster.

GREENBACKS AS MONEY.

Money is of no use except as a medium of exchange. What we want of money is to buy lands, houses, fabrics, food, and labor. Commodities are the things we need. Credit is a great power in modern society. The paper money issued by one government may be worthless, or nearly so, while that issued by another may be equal in value to gold, owing to the stability of that government and the wealthy and prosperous nation it represents. This Government has issued three hundred and eighty-two millions of greenbacks, which are made a legal tender in payment of all private debts; and this quality gives them the principal function of money, and of itself communicates to them great value. They are also made receivable for all Government taxes except duties on imports, which is another element of value. The volume of greenbacks, as compared with the population of the United States, does not exceed the volume of gold in the country at the beginning of the war as compared with the population at that time, which brings them within the rule laid down by Mill, in which inconvertible paper may be used as a substitute for gold and retain its full value.

Mr. SCHURZ. Will the Senator be kind enough to point out to me where Mill said inconvertible paper money would not depreciate if its per capita proportion was equal to that of gold?

Mr. MORTON. I think I have stated the proposition clearly from Mill. I have not got it here. When my speech is over I can send for the volume if the Senator chooses to refer to it.

Mr. SCHURZ. I do not think you will find any such thing there.

Mr. MORTON. I shall be mistaken if I do not.

The issue of greenbacks solved the financial question of the war, and from that time forward there was little trouble or doubt about the means for carrying on the conflict. The greenbacks grew steadily in popular favor, and, notwithstanding the premium on gold, became, and are to-day, the most popular currency the country has ever had. The idea that they were a forced loan never occurred to the people. They took them without force, would part from them with reluctance; and there is little room to doubt that three-fourths of the people to-day would be glad to see the national-bank notes retired and greenbacks put in their place. But the people are represented as chafing because they are compelled to take these greenbacks as money, and because the Government violates its promise in not redeeming them in gold. Is there a man to-day owning a greenback in whose hands it is not worth as much as he gave for it, and who cannot use it for all the purposes of money, unless it be to pay duties on imports? There are men holding large quantities of greenbacks who would be glad to have them appreciate in their hands, by which they would without labor or risk make a profit of 10 per cent. The debtors of the country, the laboring men, the active business of the country, would have to pay the profit.

The people take the greenback with confidence, and hold it without fear, and never dream that they are oppressed by a forced loan until they hear it from some distinguished statesman or capitalist, who would like to know that the greenbacks in his safe while he eats and sleeps are making him 1 or 2 per cent. a month.

WHO PROFIT BY RESUMPTION.

To the man whose wealth consists in money, the resumption of specie payments is a business transaction of a profitable character. If it should be brought about within one year it would be equal to a profit of 10 per cent. free from taxes, and without labor or risk. If the money be already yielding an income of 10 per cent., resumption within a year will make 20 per cent. Of course one man or class cannot make a profit without somebody else pays it. It need, therefore, excite no surprise that there is a strong pressure from many quarters for speedy resumption. It is, however, but killing the goose that lays the golden egg. The general business and prosperity will suffer the penalty, in which the capitalist must participate, and in the long run the inevitable law of retribution will turn the profits of forced resumption, like Dead Sea apples, to ashes upon the lips.

The success and popularity of the greenbacks have far exceeded the most sanguine expectations of their inventors, and their introduction has been a long step forward in the improvement and perfection of paper money.

Nevertheless, the greenback is upon its face a promise to pay dollars, which means gold dollars, and this promise was restated in the act of 1869, and declared to be an obligation to pay in coin when it was practicable to do so.

WHAT DO GREENBACKS PROMISE?

The word "practicable" in the law of 1869 is not synonymous with "possible." It does not mean at every sacrifice, or at all hazards, but when the Government is in a condition to do it, and it can be done without injury to the general prosperity and the business of the country. Upon the greenback circulation there can be no technical default by the Government. It is not a private but a public obligation, part of a general system of finance and administration issued for purposes of general policy and to be paid in the same way. The greenbacks were issued as a substitute for coin, the day of payment left indefinite and dependent upon the future condition and business of the country.

In the case of The Bank vs. The Supervisors, (7 Wallace,) the Supreme Court of the United States defined the nature and character of the greenback circulation:

> Under the act of March 3, 1863, another issue of one hundred and fifty millions was authorized, making the whole amount authorized four hundred and fifty millions, and contemplating a permanent circulation, until resumption of payment in coin, of $400,000,000. * * * Under the exigencies of the times it seems to have been inexpedient to attempt any provision for the redemption of the United States notes in coin. The law therefore directed that they should be made payable to bearer at the Treasury of the United States, but did not provide for payment on demand. The period of payment was left to be determined by the public exigencies.

People who take the greenbacks do not expect to get the gold for them; not one in ten thousand thinks of such a thing. They take them as money in which they have perfect confidence, in the way of business, and not with a view to their ultimate redemption, unless it be here and there a capitalist to whom specie payments would be a speculation like a venture in cotton or stocks. All pretenses that the people are disappointed and complain because the greenbacks are not redeemed in gold are gross exaggerations and wild extravagances of speech.

There are inconveniences attending our irredeemable currency and resulting from the fluctuations in the price of gold. No one denies it. But how trifling have they been for the last ten years when compared with the vast benefits, the growth and development, which have sprung from that currency! And how trivial and contemptible will they be for years to come, when compared to the hardships and grinding oppression to result from forced resumption!

We must take the greenback as we find it. Its character cannot now be changed, and the promise to pay it in coin is an unanswerable reason why it cannot be substituted for the national-bank note. Another reason why it cannot be substituted for the bank-note is that in the act of June 30, 1864, it was declared that—

> Nor shall the total amount of United States notes, issued or to be issued, ever exceed $400,000,000, and such additional sum, not exceeding $50,000,000, as may be temporarily required for the redemption of temporary loan.

This, it is claimed, was in the nature of a contract with the purchasers of our bonds, that the amount of four hundred millions cannot be exceeded without a breach of faith. Again, it is held by many that, although the Supreme Court has affirmed the power of Congress to create the greenback, it would be a strain upon the Constitution to make a further issue after the emergencies of the war have passed; and it is not desirable that the Government should permanently furnish the currency of the country.

COURSE OF THE DEBATE.

Let us note the progress of this discussion. The resolution, which was introduced at the beginning of the session, declaring it to be the duty of Congress to take immediate steps for a return to specie payments, after six weeks of debate, was abandoned. This resolution was supported by arguments in favor of the contraction of the currency—arguments to show that a smaller volume of currency would be better for the country; arguments to prove that by mere contraction we can come to specie payments, the great object of all governments and the chief end of man. But of late the argument for contraction has been driven off the field; we hear no more about it. The great champions of contraction have learned a new song, the refrain of which is "inflation." The present volume of currency is the result of accident and circumstance. It has been brought about by various causes, not looking to or growing out of the precise demands of the business of the country; and yet a suggestion that it is too small is denounced as a heresy, and almost as a crime. The ineffable absurdity of this position is beyond comprehension. The question whether we have enough currency is one that ought to be left open to free inquiry, without exciting animosity and vituperation. The great mass of the people, who think there ought to be some increase of the currency, and are opposed to any hot-bed, artificial process for returning to specie payments, are not heard in this Chamber. They do not send deputations here to fill the lobbies, to go before committees, and to waylay Senators on the streets and at hotels.

HOW MUCH GOLD HAVE WE?

The estimate of the Director of the Mint is that we have in this country now about one hundred and forty millions of gold. Of this amount about eighty millions are held in the Treasury belonging to the Government, or deposited by private individuals. Clearly the Government cannot resume specie payments with only one hundred and forty millions of gold in the country. How, then, shall we increase the quantity? First, we are told, by the produce of the mines, which cannot exceed forty millions per annum. Yes; but we owe full thirteen hundred millions abroad in the form of Government, railroad, State, and other corporation bonds, the interest upon which has to be paid in coin. The interest on this debt must exceed the whole annual product of the mines by from ten to fifteen million dollars. So we must look elsewhere for the increase in our stock of gold. If we turn to our foreign trade, we find that we buy much more than we sell, and that difference has to be paid in gold. Taking the last six years together, our imports have exceeded our exports by four hundred and forty-four millions. It is manifest, therefore, that we cannot increase our stock of gold by the foreign trade.

CAN WE GET IT IN EUROPE?

The next plan is to sell our bonds in Europe for gold to be brought here and put into the Treasury. But the late Secretary of the Treasury tells us that our bonds offered in the markets of Europe for such a purpose cannot be sold at all; that one hundred millions of gold withdrawn from Europe in that way would produce a panic, resulting in violent financial and commercial derangements; that our 5 per cents could not be sold in Europe by the syndicate except upon condition that they should be exchanged for our 6 per cent. bonds held there, so that no gold was transferred to this country. Even the fifteen millions, the amount of the Geneva award, the English government was not willing to pay in gold, and negotiated for its conversion into our bonds held in England, so that no gold was brought away.

SPECIE PAYMENTS RESULT FROM THE NATIONAL CONDITION.

England, Germany, and France, with the accumulations of capital through centuries, owning all their public and private bonds at home, and holding the public and private bonds to the amount of thousands of millions of other countries, which are annually drained of gold to pay the interest upon them, with difficulty maintain specie payments, and fight against the withdrawal of a few millions of gold as if it would take their very life-blood. Clearly, the maintenance of specie payments in those countries is the result of their condition, not of their peculiar financial systems. Their financial systems are themselves the outgrowth of their condition, and have not produced them.

OBSTACLES IN OUR CONDITION.
